These words drew some sighs from the breast of Pharamond, who would willingly have entertained himself more particularly with this man, if he had thought such manner of treating could have been permitted; but judging well, that in the orders he had, he would not open himself farther to him, he, with a look full of sweetness, returned him thanks for his good intentions; and seeing in the chamber Cloderic, and Albimer, who knew him, he commanded them to take care of him (since, at so late an hour, he could with conveniency return no more than Telanor, who was to go along with him) till the morrow. We will go together, said Constance, and though instead of three days, I have obtained eight, I believe that what I have enterpris'd, may oblige me to more than one Journey, and that I shall have little time to spare, though I begin to labour in it to morrow. I fear, said Pharamond, lest you should receive some prejudice by riding so soon after your wound, and you cannot deliver me from that fear, but by attending yet some days. Constance consented to him, that he felt not any thing might hinder him from a greater travel, in a less necessity. And a little after, causing Valerius to approach, Pharamond began to question him concerning what he had seen in the Enemies Camp, and principally concerning the beauty of Rosamond, and the accomplishments of his Rivals. For the beauty of the Queen of the Cimbrians, said Valerius, I confess, that it is infinitely above all that I can speak, and in what manner soever, by the general fame, I might prepare my self, all that I could imagine, was too much beneath the truth. She is a Star, (continued he, turning towards Constance) whose Rays it is impossible to support without being strook dead; however, I can speak with truth, that this prodigious Beauty, though truly the others were inferiour to it, could not defend me from the admiration which those of the Queen of the Turingiens, and the Princess of the Sueves might justly give. I expected impatiently, said Marcomire, to hear you make some mention of that of Albisinda. And I doubt not, added the young Sannon, but that of Amalazontha might well cause in you some admiration. “For the Princes which I have seen, and which were shewn, and named to me with no small care, continued Valerius, I confess, that all things in their persons are answerable to their fair reputations, and that what is reported of their valour, is accompanied with the most advantageous appearances in the world. I might possibly say more, had I seen Balamir, whom fame speaks for noble air excelling all the rest, but the wound he yesterday received in fight, made him keep his Bed. Since he made me do the same, said Pharamond, it is just he should do so too. “I have seen Ardaric, continued Valerius, who by the death of the Son of Acacer, is become King of the Alains, as he was before of the Gepides, and since we had seen him in Spain, at the time he was vanquish'd by the great Constance, I was now willing to observe him the more, and I have in truth seen nothing in his person which answers not worthily to his renown. I have seen Udegesile, a Prince of a high and magnificent appearance, but of a Spirit fierce and proud, by what I could judge. I have seen Humbert, the young King of the Basternes, who not long since, by the death of Odoacre, became possessor of that Crown, but instead of inheriting his Brother's passion, is, according to report, enamoured of the Princess Albisinda. I have seen Gondemar, all whose person and actions have admirably pleas'd me: and I have seen King Gondioch, whose extraordinary composure easily persuades a belief of what renown hath publish'd of him in the world, and I confess, that these two Brothers have appeared to me of a nobler aspect than all the rest, if possibly I may not except another Prince, whom I have seen, but whom I expected not to find there. And what is that new comer, whose rencounter hath surpris'd you? (said King Pharamond) since, in my judgment, you have named all the Princes that are in the Enemies party, if Fortune, having wrought some change in his inclination, hath not led thither Prince Viridomar? “It is not Viridomar whom I have seen in the Camp of the “ Cimbrians,

Cimbrians, said Valerius, but you will possibly, my Lord, be no less astonished, (continued he, turning towards Constance) when by the mouth of a man, whom you see nigh me, and whom you may possibly know, if you mark his countenance, you may possibly understand who it is.

At this discourse of Valerius, Constance cast his eyes upon a person that came with him, and who was in effect very near him; and having for some time beheld him, knew him for one of the Esquires of Prince Varanez. The sight of this person, with what Valerius had told him, surpris'd him, and having made him approach, and with great greediness demanded news of his Master, My Lord, (said he, in the Roman Tongue, which he spoke very well) he sent me hither to seek Mitranez, whom he left with you, to demand pardon of you, if he return'd not himself, as he had promised, and to make you a recital of what hath happened to him since your separation. I shall be always content, replied Constance, to understand news of a Prince of so great merit, and who hath promised me some part in his friendship; but I could wish with all my heart, that it be not some troublesome accident stops him so near us, and permits him not to return, as he hath made me hope. You will understand the reason, my Lord, said the Esquire, when you please to hearken to me, and since there are but few days since you have been separated, you may well judge, there cannot arrive any Adventures may oblige a long Narration. Of whatsoever length it may be, replied the illustrious Roman, I shall hear you speak with infinite pleasure of a Prince I honour as I ought, provided you have no ill news to recount me; but if you have any secret to tell me, the King will permit me to retire to my Chamber, to give you audience, when you please. Since I believe, said the Persian, that all that hath befallen my Prince before he departed from you, is not unknown to the King of the Franks, and that he hath neither power, nor design, to keep secret what happen'd since your separation, I shall make no difficulty, if you desire it, to acquit myself before the King, and before this fair company, of the order I have received from my Prince; I believe likewise to be obliged to it, having a Commission, with which I am charged to the King, and of which probably I ought not to acquit my self till he have the knowledge of those things I have to recount. Whatever be the Commission, (said the King to the Esquire of Varanez) I shall hearken to it willingly, for from such a Prince as your Master, we can expect no other than things worthy of his courage and grandeur, and therefore doubt not, if we are not suspected to you, but we shall listen with delight to the recital you make to Constance, and that we will interest our selves as we ought, in what has happen'd to the Prince of Persia, after his departure from us. The Esquire of Varanez, after this discourse, made no farther difficulty, to recount before Pharamond, what he was to tell Constance, and having for some time meditated on the discourse he was to make, he began in this manner.

The Continuation of the History of Varanez, Prince of Persia.

YOU may well judge, my Lord, that the Prince of Persia had not left you, though he left you in a place where he ought to hope you would receive all manner of good usage, if he had not been led away by that passion, which for a long time had not permitted him to taste repose, and which made him wander from Province to Province, without other design than that, to recover himself either by time, or the different objects that might divertise him; yet however, it had been difficult for him to explain to you what that passion was; for after the encounter of that fatal Pourtraicture, for which he fought in your presence, against that Cavalier who owned it, there was wrought a strange change in his Soul, by which it was become wholly different from what it was before. Not that the image of Athenais was banish'd from his memory, for it had been difficult for the sight of a Picture to expel so strong an impression; but he remain'd firm in his belief, that if he found a living Beauty equal to what had appeared to him in the Pourtraicture, he could forget Athenais; and as he sought no other thing, or to speak more properly, all his thoughts being fixed to this sole design, he resolv'd not to be sparing in any diligence, or labour, of body, or mind, to find that admirable Beauty, imagining, that if she were such as the painting had represented her, she could not but have made that noise in the world which would give him an easie opportunity to know her. Moreover, he remembered the Prediction of Leontin, which had promised him, that it should be on the Banks of the Rhine he should forget Athenais; and seeing this beginning of an alteration, he hoped hoped it entirely in that Country, and when he departed from hence, it was only with design to follow the Banks of the River to its mouth, without absenting himself from you, save only in such manner, as might give him liberty to return in few days, either having found what he sought, or having lost his hopes.

It was with this intention, my Lord, that he departed from you, and it was out of the hopes of a quick return, that he left Mitrane with you, whose absence, if of any long durance, he could difficultly have supported. He suffered unwillingly that the Convoy which the King had given him, should accompany him, not finding any greater pleasure than in solitude, and in the entertainment of divers thoughts with which his Spirit was at present possess'd; but so soon as we were pass'd that Camp, he would not suffer it to go farther, but prayed him who commanded it to return, with so much resolution, that he was constrain'd to obey him. He had fallen off to the right hand, to shun the Camp of the Cimbrians, in which he would not intangle himself, with design however to regain the Bank of the River, and to seek what Leontin had promised him, and which for few days past he had greater hopes to find than ever before. The words of that Knight, with whom he had encountred, augmented his hopes, and though by the proof he had made of his valour, he could not easily hope the victory, yet he had no other desire than to encounter him, and to fight him once more, if he would not be obliged to shew him that miraculous Beauty which he had seen in painting.

Resolved on this design, he inform'd himself every where of him by his Arms, which he had observed, not being able to give other ensigns, and it was out of the hopes he had to understand news of him in this Camp, that a little time before we encountred the Prince Marcomire, he had sent my Companion, who rejoyned us, at a place appointed, some time after the Convoy had left us. He diligently observed if he saw him not in that fair Troop which followed the King of the Franks, and having with infinite displeasure seen he was not there, he despaired not but he might find him in the Enemies Army; this thought made him consider what course he should take, and if on the one side, he was unwilling to engage himself in a Camp where he might find some retardment to his design, on the other, he was troubled to absent himself from a place, where, as well as in any other in the world, he might find the Knight he sought, without using other endeavours to hear news of him.

Whilst in this incertainty he coasted the Camp of the Cimbrians, passing by the side of a great Wood, which, by what I have understood, is that beyond the Valley, in which Prince Sannon yesterday found the Queen of the Turingiens, he stopp'd, either to determine his irresolution before he went farther, or to rest himself after that great travel he had that day endured; and having observed a fair green plat, under some spreading Trees, which made a very pleasing shade, near the utmost part of the Wood, and very near the Road, he alighted, took off his Helmet (for he never rode without his Arms in an armed Country) and having left his Horse with us, with liberty to go and repose thereby as well as he, he laid himself down upon the Grass, and resting his head at the foot of a Chestnut Tree, covered with Moss, he gave himself up entirely to those different thoughts with which he was turmoyl'd.

We wondred not at all to see him seek in that manner either repose or solitude, having often seen him do the same thing in our Journey, and remembering, that it was in the same manner that he had found the Pourtraicture. He dedicated some time to the entertainment of some wandring thoughts, which made his spirit float in the incertitude of his condition, and he found perhaps some delight in a free entertainment of them, when he found by and by that he was not alone in that retirement, for he heard the voice of some persons who discoursed, very near him. Not loving to find any obstruction to his designs, he was presently incens'd at the boldness of those persons that durst trouble his repose; but in the end, making reason gain the dominion over his first motions, and have nothing more present in his memory, than the design to inform himself of what he sought, he made curiosity succeed to his choler, and lent his ear with great attention to the discourse of those persons.

At first he could difficultly understand their discourse, but they being two men which walked (as he discerned a little after, by casting his sight between the Trees) and who in walking approached the place where he was, with design in all likelihood to regain the great Road, which lay on the side of the Wood, by little and little he began to understand them, and in the end, heard very distinctly all they said, not only because they were near him, but because they raised their voices, as they were heated in their discourse, by that passion that made them speak. They were, for we saw them from the place where we stood, as well as our Prince, two Knights of a very fair Stature, (for we could not well discern their faces, though they had lifted up the Visers of their Helmets) one of the two very magnificently armed the other very plain, with black and white Plumes on his Helmet. Four Esquires who came some paces after them, led their Horses and carried their Launces and Shields. We had but now begun distinctly to understand their discourse, when they stop'd very near us, and he who carried the Plain Arms breaking silence with a tone which had something in it very pleasing. I confess next to what I have seen, said he to his companion, that if it be not fading, this beauty is rather celestial than mortal, and that it is difficult for imagination it self to reach to her perfection; but you must likewise believe, both you and all those who take Arms for her quarrel, that it is not a light enterprise in which she engages you, and that there is possibly nothing more great nor more dangerous than that of assaulting the life of Pharamond like valiant men, as I believe is your intention. It is not against the life of Pharamond that I have taken Arms, replied his Companion, I have neither imitated nor approved the proceedings of those who have rashly promised his head to the King of the Cimbrians, but in those occasions which war may give me to assault his life, as I doubt not but I expose mine to a greater danger, so must I believe that his will not be wholly exempt, and the peril which may threaten us is not greater than the glory may be acquir'd against a man of the valour and repute of Pharamond. I am not of your opinion, said the first, but as I doubt not but there is glory to be acquir'd in fighting against a valiant man in a just quarrel, it seems to me that we sully what we have already done by taking an unjust party, and declaring our selves enemies to virtue as you do in this undertaking. There is possibly less reason in your opinion than in mine, replied the other Knight, and though I confess that there is nothing but virtue and innocency it self in all the proceedings of Pharamond, I cannot agree that the resentment of the Queen of the Cimbrians is unjust; and though the love wherewith I am devoted to her, were not capable to excuse whatever I might enterprise for her service, not being engaged to her Enemy by any alliance or the least obligation, I know no reason which may hinder me from serving her against him in all those ways which virtue and honour can permit. You will difficultly persuade me to what you say, replied he who had spoke first, for I am so much prepossessed by the virtue of Pharamond, and the justice of his cause, that my inclinations will not be easily changed from his party. You may embrace his, said he that carried the fair Arms, and though for many advantageous appearances I could have wished rather you had been of ours, yet it will not be justice to violate your inclinations. I would do what ye counsel me to without delay, said the first, if it were so well permitted me as you believe, but expecting till I have the liberty to fight the enemies of Pharamond, with those Forces I may oppose to them, if my fortune permit me I will most willingly expose my person to all the danger may threaten it, by combating the most valiant of all his Rivals. It is not possibly so light a thing as you believe, replied the Cavalier with a sigh, for amongst the Rivals of Pharamond, there are perhaps some may make you repent this enterprise. If I could fear any one, replied the first, it should be without doubt you: for by the knowledge I have of your great name, I doubt not but in valour and all sort of virtues, all the other Rivals of Pharamond are much your inferiours; but that which may cause fear in others, works in me a contrary effect, and by your example I would seek glory in a great enterprise. I see well, (said the Cavalier with a severe look) that you desire to signalize your self by combating against a man of some reputation in the World, and I have possibly acquir'd sufficient, to dispense if I please with a Combat so little necessary against a man I know not. If you knew me (replied the first with a countenance as fierce as his) you would possibly believe that I have no need of this Combat to signalize my self: but since I cannot discover my self I will tell you that I am neither in birth nor the degree I hold in the world at all your inferiour: And for my reputation, though it possibly may not equal yours, it is not so little that you ought to fear to dishonour your Arms by turning them against me. "All that I see in your person," replied the Rival of Pharamond, perswades me easily to what you say, and all that I have observed hath given me more desire to be your friend than enemy. "I could with truth tell you the same thing," replied the first, but whatever esteem your virtue may give me for you, I cannot but be your enemy if you cease not to be the enemy of Pharamond. "When I shall cease to be so" (replied the other with a tone of voice yet somewhat louder) it shall neither be for his consideration nor yours; but in the mean time I will give you the pleasure you demand, and permit you to have what opinion you please of a man hath suffer'd himself to be so much pressed to fight against you.

Concluding these words he called his Esquires, and demanded of them his Horse, Launce, and Shield, whilst the other did the like, and equally prepared himself to that Combat he testified so much to desire. The Prince of Persia had hearken'd to a discourse so little common, and of two men so extraordinary with a great attention, but he enclined himself more strongly to it, when both by his Stature, Arms, the sound of his voice, and many other marks;

marks, he began to believe one of these two Cavaliers to be him he fought, and against whom he had combated for the fair Pourtraicture. For this belief which from moment to moment induced it self almost to a certainty in his Spirit, made him hearken to what he said, and observe what he did with more interest than he had done before, and when he saw them depart to mount on horseback, and prepare for the Combat to which they had desired each other, he left the place where he had thitherto remain'd, with intention not to forsake the Knight he fought and whom he believed to have found, without drawing from him that satisfaction he desired; he therefore intended to divert the Combat, which might by some accident deprive him of the means to do it, though by the proof he had made of the strength of him he fought (which had made him esteem him the most valiant person in the world) he believ'd that all the danger of that Combat would fall upon his Enemy. He however ponder'd a little upon these thoughts, and casting himself on foot out of the wood he call'd us and demanded of us his Horse, with an impatience little different from what the two Knights had testified. But at the same time he saw both the one and the other fally forth of the wood with countenances equally terrible, their left hands charged with their Shields, and their Launces ready prepared in their Rests; and before we could bring him his Horse he saw them distance one from the other to take their Carriere, turn head at the same time, and part with a parallel fury, so that his attentiveness to their course, not permitting him to mount on horseback, he regarded it on foot, and would behold the event in the place he stood.

It was truly worthy the knowledge he believed he had of the valour of the one, and the good opinion he had of that of the other. For the two Knights encountred like two Towers, their Launces which they equally received on their Shields, broke into a thousand pieces, without moving them from the Saddle; but their Horses, weaker than they, and not able to support so furious a shock, set their Croupers to the earth, and tumbled backward with their Masters to the ground: both the one and the other nimbly dis-engaged themselves from their Saddles, and being in an instant on their feet, and having drawn their Swords, they covered themselves with their Shields, and in that posture assaulted each other with countenances altogether martial. Thou mayest vaunt thy self (said he, who by his discourse had made himself known for the Rival of the King of the Franks) to have made me this day prove what never before besel me. Thou wilt prove yet more, replied his enemy, when thou shalt Combat Pharamond. And finishing these words they charged each other with two blows so weighty, that their Shields which were opposed to them scarce hindred the cruel effect, but the Arms which sustained them, yielding to the tempest, let them fall on their heads with so much force that the two Warriours were astonished, and stagger'd for some paces in no small disorder: however, they in few moments recovered themselves, and returned towards each other with a fury which created in us that fear which they disdain'd: when the Prince of Persia ran towards them with a fury that permitted not a second assault, and through the greatness of his courage, not fearing to cast himself between the Arms of two such terrible Champions, opposing his Sword to him he found on his right hand, and his Shield to him on his left, kept both the one and the other in that distant posture. "Stop, valiant men, said he, and give not each other a death without being Enemies.

At the sight of such a man as Varanez, whose noble aspect, confident behaviour, and richness of his Arms denoted in part what he was, though incensed as they were by the first blows they had changed, they were touched with some consideration for him, and not willing to hazard the wounding of a man of so fair appearance, who opposed himself officiously for their safety, or else being both wise and generous, and not Combating for any of those two passions that make us lose our reason and knowledge, they stopp'd and beheld each other in a posture which made show of no endeavours to a fresh assault. I know not what might in the end have fallen out, but at this time he of the two Cavaliers who fought for the quarrel of the King of the Franks, casting his eyes ore the Plain towards the Cimbrian Camp, beheld those little hills which were somewhat rais'd, covered with Squadrons which marched towards the place where we were, and being in all likelihood unwilling to be found in their way: "Though this Obstacle, said he to his Enemy, were not sufficient to hinder the continuance of our Combat, I see others which permit us not to continue it, we shall finish it when fortune will permit: in the mean time I retire sufficiently satisfied with the glory I have had to prove the valour of the great Balamir. Finishing these words he ran to his Horse which he saw near him, and having mounted him with infinite agility, he parted on a gallop a way quite different from that on which he saw those Troops come, by whom he had testified his unwillingness to be seen.

You have not at all surpris'd me, (said the King of the Franks, interrupting the Esquire of Varanez) by telling me that that Knight my Rival was Balamir, I should have discern'd him from all others by his discourse and proceeding, but I cannot imagine who should be that generous Friend, which would for my interests Combat the most formidable of my Enemies, yet by that commencement of the Combat he maintain'd against Balamir with so much equality, I must needs judge him one of the valiantest men in the whole world. I can inform you no farther my Lord, said the Esquire to King Pharamond, and I know well that my Master hath not had any other knowledge.

So soon as he was departed, the Prince of Persia addressing himself to Balamir, whom he had attentively regarded, and whom by the Escutcheon on his Shield he fully knew for the Knight that lost the Pourtraiture. I know not, said he, whether you remember to have other where seen me, but I see well that you are he whom I seek, and I understand with no small joy that it is with the famous Balamir fortune hath given me some cause of difference. "I believe, replied Balamir, that you are the same Knight against whom I fought for my Picture, and if you have any difference with me it is only because you will have it so, and not for any reason can oblige you to it. The reasons of common persons, replied Varanez, are not like those of men like you and my self, and I tell you and my self without offending you, because that neither in birth or dignity am I inferiour, either to you or any man of the world, the reason I have to search you is not so light as you believe, since it touches my heart and concerns all the repose of my Soul: and in fine you are engag'd either to make me see that admirable beauty whose Picture I have seen, or finish the Combat which we have begun. "It would not be difficult for me (replied the Prince of the Huns very fiercely) to acquit my self either of the one or the other; and I say of both though you seem to content your self either with the one or other, I know not in which of the two your condition will be the better; but however it be, since the fight which you desire will rather animate you to than divert you from the Combat, I doubt not but I may procure it you without making you think I would dispense with the Combat. We may likewise since you seek the occasion, have the consolation to be miserable together, and as I shall not be the most formidable of your Rivals, I believe you will not be the only person among the rest whom I shall have the most reason to fear.

These words displeas'd the haughty Prince, and he was about to return a fierce reply, when Balamir having turned his head towards that side from whence we saw the Cavalry coming from the Camp of the Cimbrians, and having observed some Chariots at the head of the Squadrons, "I think, added he, that I can soon acquit my self of a part of what you demand, for having left the Queen with a design to come this way, I doubt not but she is in those Chariots you see approach us. These words rais'd in the Spirit of my Prince an alteration which he had never felt before, and beholding Balamir with a countenance that might give him some knowledge of it: "By what you tell me, said he, and by what I judge of your conversation with that valiant man who but now parted from us, I judge that the Queen of whom you speak is the famous Queen of the Cimbrians, whose beauty had spread such a renown ore the world. "You may judge, replied Balamir, by a picture which hath touch'd you as I see, that a beauty so prodigious could not be other than that of Rosamond. And you may believe (added he with a sigh yet full of fierceness) that you engage your self in those affairs may give you employment: And that when Gondioch, Ardaric, Godegefile, and Balamir should prove Rivals but little terrible to you, you will have one in Pharamond against whom you will have need of all your merit and all your valour. "I have this day seen Pharamond, replied my Prince, and besides that all his person hath begot in me an admiration, I confess that the nobleness of his demeanour permits me not without grief to become his Rival. but though with his merit, yours, that of Gondioch and all others whom you have named, that of all the men in the World oppos'd my design, the fear of that Obstacle would not deprive me neither of courage nor hope, nor is there any man in the world to whom the concurrence of a Rival like my self would not disturb. I assure you, said the Prince of the Huns, that you have to do with a person, who of the whole world can best discern merit, and though your fortune should be rais'd above ours, as you seem to testify by your discourse, it will not with her produce that alteration you expect, if it be not accompanied with those qualities may merit her esteem.

Varanez had without doubt replied to this discourse, but that he had for some time ceas'd to give attention to it: for the Chariots, with the Cavalry which accompanied them, were already so near us, that he began to discern the objects, which being more discernable as they approach'd, he observed in the end very distinctly, that in the first of the Chariots, which was open before, there were seated only two Ladies, whose habits were black, without any garnish, and those of the Slaves which followed a foot, the Chariot, riot, and all the Equipage, were of the same colour. Many other Ladies came in other Chariots which followed it, and about this first, might be seen many Knights, well mounted, and clad in magnificent Arms, who advanced about an hundred paces before those Squadrons which accompanied the Train, we observed these things much better than our Prince, for he having well judged, that all he fought was in the first Chariot, 'twas on that alone he fix'd his sight, without so much as casting his eyes on the rest; and I must needs confess, that he there encountered sufficient matter to employ both his eyes, and all his observation, and that the Chariot of Aurora, or that of the Sun it self, could not lance forth fires equal to those, which were darted from the Chariot of Rosamond, to dazzle his eyes, and inflame his very soul. The King of the Franks, and possibly the greater part of those persons who hearken to me, have seen the Queen of the Cimbrians, and the Princess of Suevia, who was now with her, and therefore I see my self freed from a discourse, in which I should without doubt but ill acquit my self, should I undertake a description of this miraculous beauty: for she appeared to us so much above all that imagination it self could fancy, that we remain'd at the sight of her, like persons in whom astonishment and admiration had suspended all the other faculties of our souls. Varanez soon knew that fair Image, which the sole sight of a Pourtraiture had engraved in his breast, but he saw it now shining with those fires, which painting could not give: and if hitherto he had not any disposition to love, or a disposition which might yet hinder Athenais from finding some place in his remembrance, at this sight he was enamoured, he was passionate, he was lost in an instant, and now the most smallest lines of the image of Athenais were quite blotted out of his memory; he had had less leisure to contemplate this prodigious beauty, nor had the wound possibly pierced, as it did, the middle of his heart, if the Queen had not stopp'd at the place where we were; nor had she perhaps stopp'd, had not the known Prince Balamir, for whom she had an infinite esteem, who advanced towards the Chariot so soon as he saw it approach.

The charming Queen, in whom we beheld with extasie and admiration, the most accomplish'd miracle of Nature, opening her fair lips before Balamir who drew near the Chariot, demanded of him with infinite sweetness, what he did in that place, and why he had that day preferred retirement before company. The grace and majesty with which she spoke, though she spoke very few words, joyned to the natural charm of her voice, added yet something to the passion of Varanez, and Balamir breaking silence, having saluted the Queen, and the Princess of the Sueves with a profound submission, Madam, said he, it is not only to day that I have begun to seek retirement, I have too often had sufficient reasons to prefer it before company, but at present your arrival interrupts it happily, since it spares me a Combat, of which this Knight, (said he, shewing Varanez to her) would not have pardon'd me, if I presented him not to you, and if I made him not see in his destiny, an effect of your divine beauty. These words obliged the Queen to cast her eyes on my Prince, who wholly transported and lost, beheld her with a stedfastness which scarce left him any knowledge of what had passed; and because that as well as Balamir, he had his face uncovered, the Queen possibly found in his noble air, whereon to fix her eyes with a particular consideration, when he in the end overpowering that power which seemed to have tied all the faculties of his soul, and forcing the charm which held him unmoveable, he approached the Chariot, and saluted the Queen with a submission, to which hitherto his spirit had not possibly bowed; but because in the disorder of his soul, he could scarce find words to explain himself as he desired, Balamir, to whom the cause of his silence was not unknown, taking occasion to speak whilst he prepared himself, You may judge by his countenance, said he to the Queen, if his condition be much different from ours, and though I cannot hope to receive any great friendship from him, I will not omit telling you, that by what I have known of his valour, he is not possibly unworthy to enter into the number of those who carry your fair chains. "I judge by your discourse, (said the Queen to Balamir sighing) that this is that valiant man who had some difference with you for my Picture, but we must not attribute it to any other cause, than what proceeds from sole curiosities, nor make of a person, whom you know so little, a discourse will not be justified. I know not now (said my Prince very fiercely) whether I ought not to confess but a part of the truth whereof I can only understand; but however it be, I am obliged to Balamir, who renders me the first day an office, which possibly I should not in many years have received from my courage.

He pronounc'd these words with an aspect, which obliged the Queen to view him with more consideration than she had done before, and it was observable in all her actions that she had no mean desire to know a person, who by all appearances was of no common Rank, when one of those Knights who were about the Chariot, having known our Prince to, soon as he began to speak, alighted, accosted him, and saluting him with a reverent submission, Ab my Lord, said he, is it possible that I see you in Germany? The Prince cast his eyes on him who had saluted him, and having called to mind the Idea with great readiness, he knew him for Marcian, whom he had seen and often conversed with at Constantinople, near the Emperour Theodosius, where, either by his virtue, or those fair employments to which he was advanc'd by his valour, he held a considerable degree. Varanez returned his salute with all civility, as to a man whom for his virtue he infinitely esteemed, and he had done more if the presence of the Queen had permitted him, and if she had not called Marcian to demand of him the name of my Prince.

Marcian, who as we understood afterwards had oftentimes spoke to her since he had been near her, and had entertain'd her with what had had pass'd between the Emperour and him at Constantinople, obeyed her without difficulty, and the Queen had no sooner understood from his mouth, that he was the Prince of Persia, but believing that she had committed a great fault, in receiving a Prince of so high a degree like a common person, she would have descended from her Chariot to have saluted him, with that respect to which she believed her self obliged, if the Prince had not so firmly oppos'd it, that it was impossible for the Queen to do as she intended; but the Queen seeing that she could not overcome his opposition, bowing down towards him, with a respect which she had possibly never before us'd to other Princes, Why my Lord, said she, after those faults which ignorance hath made me commit, will you let me commit others which cannot be excused, now I know you for the greatest Prince of the world? She added to these many other words, but by all, could not persuade the Prince to consent to that civility she would render, and she was constrained to remain in her Chariot with the Princess of Suevia, whom he likewise saluted with infinite respect. But all the Princes who were about the Chariot immediately alighted, and though the greatest part beheld him as their enemy, and murmured against Fortune, for having raised them up so great a Rival, they accosted him with a becoming respect, so that in a short time he saw himself saluted by the King of the Sueves, the King of the Burgundians, and Prince Gondemar his Brother, the King of the Hernles, the King of the Alains, him of the Bajernes, and many other Princes who were present and whom Marcian named to him, as they saluted him. Balamir himself returned to him with the rest, and with a behaviour full of civility and severeness together, demanded pardon of him, if he had not before rendred him what was due to his dignity.

Varanez beheld with all that attention his love could permit him, so many brave men, whose names were known to him, and saw likewise with some astonishment, and possibly with some envy, that in all their persons, and particularly in those of Gondioch and his Brother, all appearances answerable to their fair reputation: but though he saw many among them who might make themselves to be feared as Rivals, the greatest object of his jealousy was fixed on the person of Balamir, in whom, for all things, he observed great advantages over all the other Competitors, and whom, by many marks, he judged the most advanced in the esteem of Rosamond. He beheld him with an eye which gave a suspicion of what he thought, and he found in his thoughts something little different, and something that inclin'd him to a more particular unkindness for him, than for all his other Rivals. The presence of the Queen, and the Princess Albisinda fixing the thoughts of these great men on them alone, hindred them from entering into any conversation, and incontinently after, Varanez being mounted on Horseback with all the rest, approached the Queen to what place she had a design to go.

We understood afterwards, that she was departed from the Camp to go meet the Queen of the Turingiens, who was to have arriv'd that day, but who, as you know, came not till yesterday; and the Queen of the Cimbrians was going to receive her, with the Princess Albisinda, and all the Kings and Princes of her party; but a little after we were remounted on Horseback, there came a Messenger on her behalf, to inform the Queen, that by reason of some accident which had stopp'd her on the way, her arrival would be for some days retarded, and the Queen having receiv'd this news, stopp'd her Chariot, and return'd back towards the Camp with all that fair company, about the time that the Sun made his approaches to take leave of the Western Shore.

All along upon the way, the Prince of Persia marched by the side of the Chariot, with Gondioch, Balamir, Ardaric, and Godegesile, who yielding to him the honour of his Dignity, left him the nearest place to the Chariot, and most commodious to entertain the Queen, whilst the King of the Bajernes, Prince Gondemar, and some others marched by the side on which the Princess of Suevia sat, with whom they were in conversation, and the King of the Sueves, who was less in love than any of the rest, came some paces behind, hind, entertaining himself with Marcian, who is a person of a noble spirit and excellent virtue. In the entertainment of the Queen, Prince Varanez found those charms which chained him more firmly in his letters, and drawing in at his eyes all that love his soul was capable to contain, he not only banished all that might yet remain there of the remembrance of Athenais, but saw himself in few moments subdued as much, as if for many years he had been enslav'd to Rosamond. We arriv'd at the Camp sooner than he desired, though the day was then shut up, and having almost quite cross'd it to go to the Quarter of the Queen, which is an old Castle seated near a great Village on the Banks of the Rhine; at our arrival my Master gave his hand to the Queen descending from her Chariot, to lead her to her Apartment, doing the duty at that time of some other, who beheld him not without envy in this employment.

We understood since, that so soon as they arriv'd, the King of Suevia entertained the Queen for some time in particular, and as in this War, by what hath been said, he had an end quite different from that of all other Princes, whom love makes act rather than any other consideration, and that he beheld not Varanez with the eyes of a Rival, as all the others might do; he represented to the Queen, that in their design of common revenge, she could do nothing more advantageous, than to engage the Prince of Persia on their party, which according to his judgment she might do without any great difficulty; that with the defence and assistance which she might hope from a King of Persia, whose power would be much greater than that of all the Princes of Germany together, she might easily overthrow her enemy, and if her inclinations agreed with her advantages, she might not only find in the person of Varanez a Husband much different from the King of the Herules, the Burgundians, and Gepides, but a Husband not inferiour in power to the Oriental or Occidental Emperours, and who would place her upon as renowned and as powerful a Throne, as any in the world.

I know not whether this counsel of the King of the Sueves (which my Prince on the morrow understood from the mouth of Marcian) wrought the same effect on the Queen, that it wrought on him, or whether she rendred of her own motion, what she believed was due to a Prince, than whom she saw nothing greater in the world, and whose merit accompanied his Dignity; but most certain it is, that she rendred him those honours which confused him (though he naturally hated not to be honoured) caused him to be lodged the most commodiously possible, and knowing that he wanted Officers, had sent him her own, if the King of Suevia had not prevented her, by settling his Household the next morning. I will not tell you in what manner he passed this night, though I can tell you, that at his lying down he seem'd to us as a man enchanted, and that on the morrow, we knew by his visage he had not dedicated much time to sleep. You know my Lord, that in love the commencements are almost always agreeable, and as our Prince was delivered from a torment which had cruelly afflicted him, to enter into another, which at present seem'd full of charms, or to speak better, had thrown off his old Fetters, to load himself with new ones, which yet made him no less feel their weight, so he beheld himself as another man, and with pleasure admir'd the change of his condition. By the knowledge he had of his degree and fortune, certainly much different from that of all those Princes engag'd in the service of Rosamond, and by the opinion he with reason had of his courage, and the qualities of his person, he conceived those hopes which apparently no reason could forbid him from conceiving: Nor could he flatter himself with the least hope of being loved by Rosamond, whom he beheld as a Divinity, and no mortal person, without abandoning himself to those pleasures which transported and enchanted him.

He open'd his heart entirely to the generous Marcian, and having understood from him the reasons which had drawn him from the Court of Theodosius, and which had conducted him into Germany, he in requital, recounted to him what had happen'd to him since his departure from Constantinople, what he had suffered for the remembrance of the Empress, and the change that had happen'd in his soul by the sight of Rosamond; and Marcian not being retain'd near my Prince by that passion which had chained others, he promis'd willingly to my Prince, all the service he could desire of him in this occasion, and flattered his passion with all those hopes he could with reason give him. It was now that he let him understand what the King of the Sueves had the day before done for him, and counselled him to do all he could to get him to his side, both as a man to whom Rosamond paid a high respect, and as him alone of all the Princes not interest'd by a passion like to his. Varanez hearkned willingly to Marcian's counsel, to whose merit he yielded much, and so soon as the Queen might be visited, he went to wait on her, and by this second sight enflam'd himself more strongly than before.

He saw her that day with all his Rivals, who absented themselves from her the least that possibly they could, and were it either for their continual presence, or the respect which her Majesty imprinted in him, he could not, or durst not speak to her of what he thought, though he had naturally a boldness which passed over all other things which might cause fear in less resolved persons. But on the morrow he found the Queen in a very fair Garden, which from the foot of the Castle, advances it self like a Terrace to the Banks of the Rhine, and he found her walking in an Alley with the King of the Sueves, who in all likelihood entertained himself with her about affairs of War, whilst the other Princes, to give him that liberty, walked in other Alleys. My Prince not stopping at that consideration which with-held the others, went presently to the Queen, and the King of the Sueves no sooner saw him, but were it that he had no more to say to the Queen, or that he would do him a kindness, as Marcian had testified to my Prince he had a design to do, he presented him the hand of the Queen, which he held, and praying him to take his place, whilst he went whither he was called by other occasions.

Varanez, not willing to abuse his civility, made some difficulty to do it, when the King beholding him with a sigh, Take this place, said he, which I offer you, if you will not hazard the displeasure of seeing it soon possessed by some others, who will not perhaps yield it you so easily as I do. The Prince let himself no longer be urg'd after these words, but taking the hand of the Queen, he began to walk with her, whilst the King of the Sueves retired. The Ladies of the Queen, and the Officers, who, by their charge, were obliged to remain near her person, kept themselves at a distance out of respect, and he had the fairest occasion to entertain her he could possibly have desired; he knew not however, as I understood by what he that evening recounted to Marcian before me, in what manner he should make use of it; for besides the fear which ordinarily accompanies love, the whole person of Rosamond is so proper to imprint that fear which proceeds from respect, that in all his courage he could not find sufficient assurance to explain what he had in his heart. Balamir had spoke enough for him at the first sight, he had sufficiently confirmed the discourse of Balamir by his first words to the Queen, and by his looks, and all his actions, he had enough discovered the love he had for her; but notwithstanding all this, the Majesty of Rosamond made him faint-hearted, and he thought he observed in her so little disposition to hearken favourably to what he would, if he durst have spoken, that he knew not in what manner he ought to undertake it, though he saw himself in a condition, wherein all the Princes of a degree worthy to serve her, were received, to give her proofs of their love, and from her to receive a sentence in favour of him, who serv'd her with most success against the King of the Franks.

The Queen having begun a discourse concerning his Travels, had obliged him to recount some particulars, and they insensibly fell upon the discourse of our arrival in that Country, of our coming to the French Camp, and of his meeting with the King of the Franks, and my Prince having a Soul truly great and noble, and in which no complacence or interest could oblige a disguise of the truth, could not speak to the Queen of Pharamond, not only not without praising him for the good usage he had receiv'd, but not without testifying the esteem and admiration he had for all his person, and he had possibly said more, if he had not perceiv'd that the Queen stopp'd and chang'd colour. This knowledge he received made him stop, and beholding the Queen with eyes altogether passionate, I beg your pardon, Madam, said he, if I have spoken too much of your enemy, for I observe some marks on your Visage, make me fear I have displeas'd you. The Queen yet sigh'd at these words, and hiding her face with her hand to conceal her blushes, Those who know well, said she to my Prince, what are the injuries I have received from that Prince of whom you speak, would not wonder to see some signs of trouble on my countenance when I am to speak of him, and it is a hard thing for me to bear any mention made of him, without finding my self in a great disorder, but the pain I suffer is very ordinary, for in our present occasions, there is scarce a day passes in which I hear not a hundred times the name of my Enemy. But, (added she a little after, with a sigh, by which she seem'd to open a way to my lost Prince) if it be permitted me to make you remember what you love, as you have made me remember what I ought to hate, will you not be displeas'd, if I demand of you what you now feel in your heart for the Empress of the East, to whom you devoted so much love, and who hath made you undergo so tedious Travels?

“I believe, (replied the Prince very coldly) that I shall answer to your discourse, without shewing any signs thereof in my face, by which you may judge how I am touched: and though certainly I have had as much love for the Empress Eudoxia or Athenais, as any heart is capable to receive, and that this love hath humbled me to all those sufferings which “may

“may torment a passionate Soul, it is certain however, that of that passion there is not the “least sign that remains in my Soul, and that I preserve in my memory scarce any remem“brance of the name of Athenais. What you say can hardly be possible, replied the Queen.
 “It is yet less than you believe, (replied the Prince, without permitting her to speak fur- “ther) but that which would have proved impossible to all other force, hath proved easie
 “to yours; and that image of Athenais, which no endeavour of my courage, no absence, “nor no diversity of Objects, nor no sort of remedy, could for one moment drive from “my memory, has been banish’d for ever at the first sight of your Celestial Beauty. You “have known it, Madam, from the very mouth of my Rival, and though my own had “not confirm’d it, if you had cast your eyes upon me, you had known it by too many “marks, to have been ignorant of it.

Varanex spoke in this manner, casting his eyes on the Visage of the Queen, to read his destiny, but with a fear not ordinary to him, he found nothing in this beginning which might give him any great good opinion of his fortune. For the haughty Queen beholding him very severely: “In another condition, and at another time, said she, I had punished “this presumption in the person of a Prince of Persia, as well as in that of any other per“son, but you know what is my fortune, and the field is open to you as well as to others, “since so it hath pleas’d my destiny. If the Field be open to me, replied the Prince, I shall enter it without doubt, were I sure to leave there a thousand lives, had Heaven given me so many; and if it be by the service we ought to render you I may hope to be happy, I will not re-nonounce those hopes which I may conceive on appearances more favourable than all those with which my Rivals can flatter themselves. I will arm possibly for your service a power much different from what they all can offer, and I will arm it with no less joy, if you will permit me to hope that your inclinations are not more contrary to me, than to my Rivals, in a design to seek death, or Supreme felicity, upon all opportunities to serve you. It is my fortune which makes the Law, replied the Queen, and not my inclinations, and you may understand if you please, that in a design equal to yours, those whom you call your Rivals, consult my Fortune, and not my inclinations.

She concluded these words with a sigh, which the Prince observ’d, and turn’d towards the other side, possibly to call some of her Ladies, when King Ardaric, and King Godegesele, who had seen the King of the Sueves retire, appeared in that Alley, and came to accost her. My Prince could not so well dissemble the displeasure they did him, but that they might observe some signs of it in his face, and he beheld in theirs little disposition to remain long time his friends. He saw it no less in the eyes of Gondioch, who came immediately after them; and of all the Lovers of Rosamond, there was none, to whom the greatness of his Dignity, and merit of his person, gave not some suspicion, and made them not look upon him in few days with the same ill will which they all had the one for the other, and which is ordinary amongst Rivals, and which seem’d greater for him than for others, by reason of the great advantages he had over them. Balamir was he who testified the least, and to speak truth, the person who indeed fear’d the least, but it was he whom my Prince most feared, both for a thousand fair qualities, wherein he excell’d all the rest, and for those many appearances, that of all the Lovers of Rosamond, he shared the greatest part in her esteem, and possibly in her affections.

My Master hath lived in this manner, my Lord, since his departure from you; and in fine, having absolutely determined, and resolv’d to run his fortune with the rest, and to seek the possession of Rosamond by those ways which that might afford, call’d me yesterday, and having taken me aside from other persons who might hear his discourse, Since I am bound here, said he, by those chains which permit me not to depart, go into the Camp of the King of the Franks, and on my part salute the great Constance, and bring hither Mitrances, whom I left with him. You may tell Constance what hath befallen me since our separation, and by the knowledge you give him of the engagement of my Soul, you will oblige him to pardon the fault I may commit in leaving him, and engaging my self on a side contrary to that of a Prince with whom I have left him, and who, by his merit, and the good usage he hath given him, hath without doubt gain’d his friendship. You may assure him, that what I have promised him, shall endure as long as my life; and you may tel the King of the Franks, that no passion, but that which engages me in the interest of the Queen of the Cimbrians, should mak’ me take Arms against his, that I know nothing greater among men, and that if I must be his Enemy, I shall make War upon him like a man whom no passion can hinder from esteeming his virtue. This is the Commission which my Prince gave me, and I have acquitted my self of it, (continued the Esquire, turning himself towards the King of the Franks) as he hath order’d me. I was upon the point to depart from the Camp, when Valerius arriv’d, and know- ing him, I accosted him, let him see my Master, and took my time to come hither with him to obey the orders of my Prince.

THE Esquire of the Prince of Persia finished thus his discourse, which put the whole Company into admiration, and when he had done speaking, Pharamond and Constance for a long time beheld each other, leaving mutually liberty to the other to answer, but in the end it being to Constance to whom he was sent, and the King remaining firm in his design, not to speak till after him, the illustrious Roman broke silence. In truth (said he to the Esquire of Varanez) you could not well tell me news that could trouble me more than that you now recount: for esteeming the King of the Franks as I do, I could have wished him any other Enemy, rather than him. He might possibly have considered with himself better than he hath done, and better he had opposed a passion, which according to my opinion will not give him more satisfaction than the first; and by engaging himself to make War against King Pharamond, he does not possibly well know to what he hath engaged himself: but I shall better in person tell him my thoughts, since I hope to see him to morrow. You may tell him if you please (added Pharamond, addressing himself to the Esquire, so soon as Constance had done speaking) that I cannot understand without infinite trouble, that a Prince for whom I have a great esteem, though he returned but rough answers to my civility, and a Prince who is a friend to the great Constance (which renders him possibly more considerable to me than any thing else) should become my Enemy in a War only made against my life. That however I approve his fair design, and that I am too well acquainted with love not to excuse what he may undertake, but that his happiness is not possibly so near as he believes if he expects it only by the ruine of Pharamond, and that I will defend my life with so much courage, as may perhaps make him more than once repent the design to assault it.

This was the answer he returned to the Esquire of Varanez, and when he was retired with Mitranes, turning towards Constance in whom this news had begot some melancholly, *You see my Lord, said he, what are the effects of the beauty of Rosamond, and that there is nothing in the world so powerful as she, either to recover men from great evils or make them unfaithful. Of three illustrious unfortunate persons, and unfortunate by the same kind of misery, you see two recovered by the sight of Rosamond, and I doubt not but she may work the same effect for the third. I understand you, replied Constance, nor can I believe but that it is of Varanez, Balamir, and my self you speak; but though there hath been in effect a great conformity in our adventures, I promise you there shall be none in the remedy, and that Death alone shall do for me, what the sight of Rosamond hath done for the other two. Varanez and Balamir had without doubt done the same thing, replied Pharamond sighing, and an hour before they had seen the Queen of the Cimbrians, had possibly sworn that they would not forget Hunnimonda and Athenais but in the Tomb, yet however my Lord you see what is fallen out. There hath been in our adventures, replied the illustrious Roman, Circumstances so different as to make a difference in our Obligations, and Balamir ought not to do for a person who lived not, nor Varanez for one who would willingly lose him to give her self to another, what I ought to do for Placidia. Moreover, I carry the name of a virtue which is proof against all the beauties and all the powers of the Earth, and to all this I will add, that when I should have no other reasons to defend my self against what is befallen the other two, but the consideration I have for you, I promise you my Lord that I will never be your Rival: Or at least, concluded he with a sigh, that if this misfortune should fall out against my intention, neither you nor Rosamond, nor any person in the world shall ever have knowledge of it. I have a confidence in your virtue, replied the King of the Franks, which reassures me against all that fear which your merit may give me, and I am strongly persuaded that no passion can ever remain firmer in your heart than your virtue. I will likewise tell you, that if my ill fortune give me the great Constance for Rival, I shall not comfort my self for such a misfortune, as I may possibly comfort my self for all that I can fear from the Competition of Varanez and Balamir. Though I should be your Rival, replied Constance, you would not be unhappy: for your merit puts you in sufficient security against Rivals more formidable than me: however, I seek not my cure as Varanez sought it, nor would I receive it as Balamir received it though it were offered to me; nor do I know if we ought to call this change of their condition a recovery, for I doubt much whether in this second love their fortune will be more happy than it was in the first. I know not what it may be, replied the King of the Franks, for in the estate to which my ill fortune hath reduced me, there is no Rival I ought not to fear, since of all the Lovers of Rosamond hope is denied to me alone: But if the friendship you preserve for the Prince of Persia leaves me a liberty to testify to you my thoughts, I will tell you that though he may be great King of Persia, and great as he is for the qualities of his person, he causes in me less trouble than Balamir, and that nothing at this time so much displeases me, as that I must wage War against one who is a friend to Constance.”

 “I may be a friend to Varanez in other matters, replied the Roman: for besides what I owe to the assurances he hath given me of his friendship, he has really such qualities in his person as have attracted my esteem, though I have perhaps found some things have not so well pleased me, and you may possibly have observed that he hath little conformity to our humours: but the opinion I have of him cannot alter that I have of you; and as I was not so prepossessed but that I could put a due difference between you, you shall see my Lord, that if this war continue he and I shall not be of the same party. “Ah this is too much, cried the King of the Franks, nor can I ever merit what you offer me; both against the Prince of Persia and against the Allies of the Romans: But if in those misfortunes to which I am reduced, there rests to me any means to make you see my resentment, and what consolation I in my ill fortune receive from those marks you give me of your friendship, you shall certainly see——“I shall see nothing (said Constance opposing himself to the continuance of his discourse) but I may hope more from your virtue; nor can I by any proof be persuaded more than I am of the beauty and Grandeur of your soul. In the mean time, (continued he rising from his seat) ’tis time to bid you good night, and retire to leave you to your repose, and on the morrow before I depart to go to the Camp of the Cimbrians, I will see you again, if you have any particular Commission to give me.

After these words, to which the King answered with all those which a true acknowledgment could put in his mouth, Constance and Artabure retired: And a little after, Prince Marcomire who had accompanied them being returned, all the Company departed the Chamber save only Marcomire whom the King made stay, and with him Cleomer and the two Cimbrians Cloderic and Albimer, who remained constant to his service, induc’d both by those benefits which had establish’d them a fortune much different from what they had had in their own Country, and by the charms of his person which had bound them too strongly to have any power to forsake him.

When the King saw himself alone with them, and some Officers in charge who out of respect kept distant from the bed, causing Cleomer, Cloderic, and Albimer to approach, and turning himself towards Marcomire who was seated near him; “And well brother, said he, is it without reason that I have always feared the merit of Balamir? Or were not you deceived, when you believed that the Queen bore only towards him a simple civility or at most good will? “I still believe the same thing, replied the Prince, and in all the discourse this day made, you find nothing that can make me change opinion. “How Brother, replied Pharamond, have not you observed all that the Esquire of Varanez told us, of the difference she made between him and the other Princes of her party? And do you esteem as nothing that Pourtraiture which began to make Varanez lose his liberty, and which she hath given him without doubt that he should keep it by her consent, and which faithfully tell him her miracles, since it can make Slaves? Can a favour of such price seem to you little considerable from a Princess of the humour and courage of Rosamond? Or can you attribute it to simple good will? Ah Balamir without doubt is happy; and though his fortune should remain in these terms, it is great enough to make me dye with grief and jealousy. That which possibly he had difficultly carried from me, if we had entr’d into the service of Rosamond with equal advantage, the misfortunes of my life hath given him, and there was some appearance that with a merit like that of Balamir, services and diligence should prevail against absence and cruel injuries. It is then in Balamir that I ought to seek the Object of all my resentment, and it is against his life alone much rather than against that of all others that I ought to turn my Sword, which I carry in vain by this side, if it knows not how to deliver me from such a Rival.

Pharamond spoke these words with so much violence, by the effect of a passion which at present over-ruled the natural sweetness of his Soul, so that neither Marcomire nor the others could stop the course of it nor durst oppose it: but when he had done speaking hindered by some sighs which permitted him not to continue his discourse, Cloderic breaking silence; “I know not my Lord, said he to the King, if you have other reasons than those are known to you to judge of the fortune of Balamir, but if it be the Pourtraiture of the Queen which gives you such trouble, it is not difficult to compose your spirit, by telling you, not only that it was not from her he received it, but that there are few of her Lovers who have not the like: That the deceased King of the Cimbrians caused many to be drawn by the hand of an excellent Linnen then at Marobuda, to send to those Princes whom he would engage in his party by the sight of that admirable beauty; and that it was from his own hand that Balamir received it the same day that he returned to Marobuda, having driven the Burgundians out of the Country of the Bohemians. “And I can assure your Majesty, added Cleomer,

“that Cloderic told me the same thing at our return from Bobemia, and that you ought not to suspect this discourse made to flatter your displeasure. “I indeed heard before my departure from Lisurgis, said Prince Marcomire, that the King of the Cimbrians had caused many pictures to be made of the Princess his Daughter out of that design Cloderic hath related to you. “And so many persons have known it, continued Albimer, that I know not how the King could be ignorant of it. “That which you assure me, said Pharamond to them, gives me some comfort though it hinder me not from believing that in Balamir I have a Rival I ought not to neglect, and from whom I may justly fear all things by reason of the advantages his presence and services give him over me. “But my Brother (continued he, addressing himself to the Prince) it is not to make any complaint to you that I have retained you, but to communicate to you a design in which I doubt not but you will take a part if you remember Albisinda as much as I do Rosamond. And after these words, without giving time to Marcomire to answer him, turning himself towards Cloderic, I desire, said he, that you would to-morrow accompany Constance to the Camp of our Enemies, where you may be very useful to him by reason of the knowledge you have of their customs. And I desire very earnestly, added he with a sigh, that you would find the means to tell the Queen of the miserable estate of my life, and give her a Letter which I will write if you can hope to make her peruse it. I shall receive infinite content from this good office if you will perform it for me, though I expect no change in my condition; but since the hope of so great good is denied me, I shall receive in this a satisfaction which cannot but be very acceptable in a fortune like mine. For you my Brother (continued he addressing himself again to Marcomire) you cannot doubt but the Princess of the Sueves will receive favourably your Letters, and if you give any commission to Cloderic he may discharge it more easily than that he takes from me. “It is most certain my Lord, said Cloderic, that I will do all that you command me, nor do I despair to accomplish a part of your desires. “I shall be much obliged to you (said Prince Marcomire) if you will give my Letters to Imbergida who will herself take charge of the rest, and though I have her Son with me I will not expose him to the anger of the King of the Sueves, with whom he may not be in the same security that you will be with the Queen of the Cimbrians. “I will render you my Lord that service you desire of me, answered Cloderic, with all fidelity, and I can do it so much the easier because few persons in our Court have greater access than my self to Imbergida. “Ah Cloderic, said the King with a sigh, that you were so happy in going to see the Queen, or rather that Pharamond were so happy if this felicity were permitted. After these words and some others, by which the passion of his Soul was naturally expressed, he called for Pen Ink and Paper whilst the Prince his Brother went to do the same, and all the company being retired, he writ, sealed his Letter, and gave himself to sleep, which he could hardly find by reason of the little familiarity they had together.

On the morrow so soon as he was awaken'd, having caused Cloderic to be called he gave him his Letter, and having accompanied it with all those words which a passion like his could speak in such an occasion, he would have risen to have gone into the Chamber of Constance, if Marcomire Genebaud and Charamont who entred at that time into his, had not opposed it by entreating him yet to keep his bed, since by the truce he had an entire liberty and nothing which might hinder him from sparing yet that day for his cure. However they had with difficulty obtained it, when Constance for whom only he would rise entred the Chamber; he no sooner saw him but raising his head out of the Bed; “Ah my Lord (said he) you make me ashamed, and I am vexed to see my self without necessity a bed whilst you are risen to labour for my repose. “I never rose upon a better occasion (replied Constance) and if I be but so happy as to give you that repose; I shall no longer account my self the most unfortunate person of the world. “If I may receive it from men (replied Pharamond) I shall hope it from you sooner than from all others, but instead of expecting it from men. “I cannot yet apprehend by what ways Heaven can give it me.

He had spoken more, if Constance had not given him notice that he was ready to depart, by demanding of him if he had any particular Commission to give him. The King kept not as a secret what he had given to Cloderic, and prayed him, that he might accompany him to the Camp of the Cimbrians, where he would not be useless to him, by reason of his knowledge of their customs and manners. A little while after, Constance, and Artabure who would not leave him, mounted on Horseback, followed by some Knights, whom the King of the Franks caused to accompany them, contrary to the intention of Constance, who had designed to go without any other train than his Esquires; but with him, the Princes Marcomire and Sannon, Genebaud and Meroveous, Rithimer, Antenor, Dagobert, Clodegesile, Cleomer, and many other illustrious persons mounted on Horseback, to conduct him forth of the Camp, and accompany him a part of the way he had to pass to that that of the Cimbrians, not believing it convenient to go farther, though some of them very much desired it. He denied as much as he could this civility, but in the end he was forced to accept it, by reason of the constancy of the Princes, whose resolution he could not divert, and he marched towards the Camp between the two Brothers of Pharamond, at the head of the fair Troop which followed them; passing by the Quarters which were in their way, the two Princes discours'd him of the manners and strength of the Nations that compos'd them, but when they had reached the utmost bounds of the Camp, Constance addressing himself to Marcomire, demanded of him, if he would not give him some commands to the Princess Albisinda, assuring him that he would acquit himself with all possible affection; and the Prince, having thanked him for his civility, with great marks of resentment, prayed him not to speak of him to the Princess, for fear lest his discourse might put her to the blush, or lest she should be offended to find that he knew a thing which ought to be kept secret, by reason of the knowledge he had of the severe humour of her Father. Constance promised him he would act as he desired, and the Prince again breaking silence, If you will do any one of us a good office, you cannot better employ your civility than by doing it for my Brother, (said he, shewing him Prince Sunnon) and I am much deceived if at present he hath not as much need of it as any of us. "Can it be possible, (said Constance, seeing that Sunnon sigh'd at this discourse) that a sight of so few minutes should work so great an alteration in the soul of Prince Sunnon? or can a passion be established with such entire power in the space of two days? Since you know the affairs of all our House, replied Sunnon with an excellencing grace, *I shall, my Lord, make no difficulty to discover to you mine, and to confess to you, that I believe neither Pharamond nor Marcomire more enamoured than my self. I believe likewise, that I have in two days felt all that love can make me feel while I live, nor can mine be of any longer durance, if this passion moderate not its violence. That which is befallen you is very extraordinary, said Constance, but not without examples, you have them fresh and familiar in the fortune of the King your Brother, and that of the Prince of Persia. There wanted but little, added the Prince Marcomire, but you might have put me in the number, for though at the first sight of Albisinda I was not so enamoured as I was some days after, yet it is certain, that weak and feeble as I was, I receiv'd her image into my heart with delight, and that I loved her sufficiently the first moment, to believe it impossible to forget her, though I had never in my life again seen her. That which I felt, said the young Sunnon, was with another force than what you speak of: for the Image of Amalazontha is so fix'd to my remembrance, and as it seems to me, to my very eyes in such manner, that it is impossible for my thoughts to be absent one moment from it. I saw her all the night, and I think yet I see her in that resplendent beauty, whose brightness dazzled me, and in that charming languor, which made me receive death with sweetness, whilst she carryed it into my bosom. All objects, instead of diverting that Idea in my spirit, seem'd to despoil themselves of their form to imprint hers; and in fine, she possess'd it so entirely, that it was no longer capable to act for her alone. I know well by a language so passionate, said Constance, that you are truly in love, nor can I sufficiently admire the destiny of your House, which would not create love in the three Brothers, but for the Sisters of three Princes, who lost their lives by the Lance of Pharamond. But Brother, added Prince Marcomire, you have not yet told us in what manner the Queen of the Turingiens carryed her self towards you while you accompanied her, but if you can tell it us, we may possibly draw thence consequences which may give you hope and consolation.*

"She treated me without rudeness, and without incivility, answered Sunnon, and I observed in her all the proceeding of a Princess well and nobly educated; but with a tender grief, in which I saw her languish, I observ'd by her eyes, and by her words, much distraction in her spirit, and it seem'd to me, that by reason of the profound sadness, in which she seem'd to be overwhelmed, she minded me but little, and gave me less attention. I was not astonished after what I had heard speak of the death of her Brother, that at the sight of some objects which might renew the remembrance of it, she had her eyes moistened, or permitted some sighs to issue from her fair mouth, but it seem'd in my judgment, that to her grief there was joynd some trouble in her spirit, which deprived her of the liberty of her functions, and which made it self observable by the incertitude of her regards, and the several changes appeared in her visage. I had no difficulty to accommodate my action, and countenance to hers, and seeing her from time to time lift up her eyes towards Heaven, with an action which seem'd to accuse it of some cruelty; that which I gained from her regards in passing, stopp'd mine on her countenance, with a force which permitted me not to draw them thence, and they spoke I assure my self, if the fair Queen would have understood their discourse, what “respect, and fear to displeasè her, permitted not my mouth to declare. I would willingly have accompanied her into the middle of the Enemies Camp, though her presence had not secured me; but she commanded me to return much sooner than I desired, and when I took leave of her, aided by the power of all my courage, I besought her to remember a Prince she had that day seen, not as an enemy who waged war against her, but as a man who would be too happy to sacrifice his life for her service. Yes, (said she with a sigh she could not retain) I will remember what I have this day seen, and I believe I shall never forget it while I live. “I lost her after these words, and by her departure I remain’d in an obscurity not yet dissipatèd, though the Sun hath twice since appeared in our Hemisphere.

At this passionate discourse of young Sunnon, Constance and Marcomire who hearkened to it with all attention, easily knowing that it was love put these words in his mouth, were about to tell him what they thought, or at least what they would persuade him they thought, concerning those things he had told them, when Artabure, Genebaud, and many others, before whom they would not explain themselves, approached them, and obliged them to change the subject of their discourse. That which they had afterwards together was not long, for Constance seeing that they were nearer the Camp of the Cimbrians than their own, would not permit them to go farther, but obliging them to return, he continued his way with Artabure, Cloderic, and those other Knights which Pharamond had given him to accompany him.

[I believe it may be permitted us to follow him, for the two Camps stood at so little distance, that we may pass from the one to the other without wounding that regularity of the Scene to which we are confinèd.]

They in the Camp of the Cimbrians being advertisèd of the coming of Constance, by the Cimbrians, who the day before came to the Camp of the Franks, and was returned that morning very early, they resolvèd to receive him with the honour due to his Birth, the degree he held in the world, and the glory of his fair Actions; and the King of the Sueves being an Ally of the Romans, and willing to honour the Empire in the person of Constance, and possibly oblige him to prefer his interests before those of Pharamond, he mounted on Horseback to meet him, and the King of the Alains and Gepides, though he had been overcome in Spain by Constance, not preserving any remembrance of the misfortune he had in the war, which had only creatèd in him an esteem and respect for his Conquerour, would needs accompany the King of the Sueves, and by his example the King of the Basternes, and Prince Gondemar were mounted on Horseback, to receive among them, a man, whose fame was so gloriously spread through the world. Gondioch, who was an enemy to the Roman name, and who had no kindness for the design that led Constance into their Camp, was dispens’d with, Godegesile, who was Successour, and of the blood of Ragadaise, whom Constance had slain with his own hand in the first onsets of his Arms, believèd not that honour would permit him to meet him, though his resentment had not forbid it; and Balamir, who without doubt; out of the love he had for virtue, had run the first, was hindred by a wound he received from Pharamond, which made him for some days keep his Bed. But the Prince of Persia, impatient to see a man whom he infinitely esteemèd; outwent all others in this design, and without attending the King of the Sueves, was gone to meet his friend.

Constance discern’d him coming at a great distance, and he no sooner discoverèd the Attendants of Constance, but he spurred on his Horse directly towards him, testifying by his speed the great desire he had first to embrace him. So soon as Constance knew him, he rode in the same manner towards him, and they having contractèd a friendship which banishèd all formalities in their complements, embraced without alighting, and notwithstanding the resentment of Constance against Varsnez, they receiv’d each other after a manner that well denotèd their friendship. When they could speak, Varsnez beholding Constance with shame, And well, said he, what judgment do you at present make of me? or rather, to what do you condemn me? “I condemn you to suffer, answerèd Constance, at least, as much for Rosamond, as you have done for Athenais, and if I deceive not my self, to suffer it with the same success, and for my judgment, you shall pardon me if I cannot give it for your advantage. You speak, replyèd the Prince of Persia, like a man that knew not love, and when you shall have seen the Queen of the Cimbrians, instead of condemning me, I fear you will be my Rival. “Fear it not, (replyèd, though very coldly, the illustrious Roman) and believe; that though this misery should befall me, as it hath done you, the respect I have to the merit of Pharamond, would make me struggle with this passion, instead of abandoning my self to it. I respect the merit of Pharamond, replyèd the Prince of Persia, both for what I have known in his person, and what I have heard from Renown, but I am not engaged to him either by friendship, or any other obligation, nor by any reason which ought to hinder me from seeking my happiness by his prejudice. "I believe, replied Constance, that with a merit like yours you may hope all things, but for my self, who have but a mean one, I confess that I should hope little from my fortune, against a Rival such as Pharamond. I understand you well, said Varanez, and by your modest discourse you make me apprehend enough; but besides that I am not like you persuaded, that nothing can dispute against the merit of Pharamond, it seems to me that there is nothing to be disputed with him, and that in the estate wherein his affairs are with the Queen of the Cimbrians, though he had no Rival he could pretend nothing. I see well, replied Constance, that in many things you and I are not of the same opinion, but if you be in any condition to receive counsel, and I am any to give it, I will divert you as much as is possible for me, from a design to make war against a Prince who hath not offended you, and who can without doubt make his enemies bear a share of his peril. For the peril, replied Varanez very fiercely, you may well believe that it is not that which shall divert me from the War, and that fame of his valour which may cause fear in other persons, cannot work the same effect over a courage like mine. But I cannot love Rosamond without espousing her interests, though I have received no offence from her enemy, and I hate him much more, when I consider him as her lover, than as her enemy. Both in the one and the other quality, said Constance, it would be difficult for you to hate him, if you knew him well. I am therefore content, replied Varanez very briskly, not to know him farther: for I already feel, that if he should be loved by the Queen of the Cimbrians, I shall hate him more than any man in the world; but it seems to me, added he with a sigh, that Pharamond hath gained your heart in a very short time. I find yours no less engaged to love, replied the famous Roman, and I cannot believe there should be need of longer time to become the friend of Pharamond, than the lover of Rosamond.

They discoursed in this manner, marching towards the Camp, and they had said more, if they had not seen the King of the Sueves, with the other Princes so near them, that they had not the liberty to continue their converse. So soon as they were about an hundred paces one from the other, they all alighted, and Constance and the King of the Sueves to whom the others gave place, being advanced one towards the other, saluted with infinite civility. Ardaric came forward next the King of the Sueves, and next to him the King of the Balthernes, and Prince Gondemar, all whom Varanez named to Constance as they approached to salute him. All these Kings, and the other illustrious persons which had accompanied them, were no less touch'd with the noble composure of Constance his person, than they had been charmed with his fair reputation, and as there was no man in the world whose renown was spread like his, they beheld him with all the esteem due to so illustrious a name, and the King of the Sueves with breaking silence, I receive with infinite joy, said he, the favour which Heaven this day doth me, and though I were not Ally to the Empire, nor concern'd in the interest of the Romans as I am, I cannot see the great Constance, of whom all the world speaks with veneration, without being so sensible as I ought of a happiness so little expected. I merit not, replied Constance very modestly, what your affection to the Roman name makes you speak to the most unfortunate of all the Romans; and I receive from a great Prince, like your self, those marks you give me of your affection, with all due acknowledgment and respect.

And for me, (said King Ardaric with a very good grace) will you not that I render that Homage I owe to my Vanquisher? and that I rejoyce to see in Germany that great Captain, that drove me out of Spain. If the Romans vanquished the Alains and Gepides in Spain, replied Constance, it was not through the fault of King Ardaric, nor is it always by the valour of the Commanders, that victory taketh sides; and I can tell you with truth, that I have always esteem'd you as a very great Prince, and that I have much desired, that the interest of Nations might not leave you any cause of offence against me. My resentment, said Prince Gondemar very pleasingly, could not hinder me from flying to the name of Constance, for I am too much in love with his noble fame and reputation to stop at any considerations that might divert me. For my part, added the young Humbert King of the Balthernes, I this day with no small joy behold the effect of a desire I have for many years wished, and I would have gone to the end of the world to have seen that man who hath every where filled it with his fame. You see to my shame (said Constance to the King of the Balthernes though he had spoke last) that Renown hath too much flatter'd me if it be true that it hath persuaded you so well to my advantage. And for you (added he speaking to Gondemar) you are not so little known as you believe, and I am not ignorant that by the glory of your youngest years, you are already arrived at such a pitch of glory as need not envy that of more aged men.

After these words, and others little different practis'd upon this interview, Constance presented

Presented Artabure to all the Princes, and as his name was famous in the world, by means of the great actions he had done, so he was received with all the honour due to him, and a little after they all took Horse again to proceed to the Camp, from whence they were but little distant, and the King of the Sueves riding by the side of Constance, after some moments breaking silence; Will not you, said he, after having testified the astonishment, and joy we have to see living, and with us, the same Constance, of whom we have received no news since the last War of the Gauls, and whose loss all the world hath deplored, we should make some complaint, the Queen of the Cimbrians, and my self, of the injury and injustice you have done us, in preferring the Enemies of the Romans before their ancient Allies, and choosing rather to sojourn with the Enemies of your Country, than with those whom the interest of the Romans hath made theirs? Have we not reason to believe, that it should be with the Sueves, and Cimbrians, rather than with the Franks, you should make some abode? Or are we not very unhappy, to have merited this forgetfulness, or disdain from the Romans, whilst we take Arms for the interests of their Empire?

Constance hearkened peaceably to the discourse of the King of the Sueves, and beginning so soon as he had done speaking; "There might be some reason in the complaint you make, said he, if it were by my choice, that I had sought a retreat in the Camp of the Franks, rather than in yours (though I can tell you, that when that should have been in the unhappy estate of my fortune, I preserv'd no remembrance of the interest of Nations, whether Enemies, or Allies of the Empire) but you may have understood from the Prince of Persia, that it was by an accident, and not out of design, I stay'd with King Pharamond; and you shall understand from me, that in the stay which that accident hath made me make with him, I have found in him qualities so great, or rather so admirable, that I could not refuse what he will easily obtain from all persons to whom he is well known: And moreover, I have found so much innocence in his Arms, and quarrel, and if you will permit me to say so, so much cruelty, and so little justice in yours, that I could not suffer, that our Allies should dishonour their Arms in an unjust cause, make an inundation of humane blood throughout all Germany, and commit all their glory to the event of a War which Heaven ought not to favour, and of which the beginnings have been unsuccessful to their party. "How my Lord, (said the King of the Sueves, interrupting him, and beholding him with an eye that render'd observable the discontent he received by his discourse) do ye judge our quarrel to be unjust? Or can you believe, that Rosamond wageth war without reason against the Murtherer of her Brother, and him who hath caused the death of her Father, and the ruine of her Estates? Or that I am unjust, in pursuing the vengeance of the deplorable Vindimir, of an unfortunate Son, more dear to me than my life, who lost his by the cruel hand of Pharamond? I have been sensible, as an Ally ought to be, of Prince Vindimir's loss, replied Constance, nor have I condemn'd what the first motions of your grief made you act to revenge it, but you ought to give bounds to it, and content your self to have sacrificed more than two hundred thousand lives to that of a Prince who lost his with his Arms in his hand, and of which Pharamond depriv'd him only defending his own Subjects, against whom he had brought the War, as you well know. And you may add, replied the King of the Sueves, that we made war against him, without having received any offence from him, but for the sole interest of the Romans. What you say, said Constance, obligeth the Romans to remain your Friends and Allies, but justifies not the War you make against Pharamond, nor can make you condemn what he did for his defence. Yes, my Lord, I know that you are any Ally to the Romans, and that it was for their interest you lost the Prince your Son, and it is this reason makes me come to you, as to our Ally and Friend, to endeavour to give you a repose, you voluntarily deprive your self of, and spare the blood of your people, which you sacrifice without pity to your immoderate revenge. It is because you are our Ally, that I am engag'd to this enterprize, in a time, wherein I have abandoned my fortune, and my life it self; for against others than our Allies, I had without delay taken the Arms of Pharamond, whose virtue is no less dear to me than all the interest of Nations.

The King of the Sueves was about to reply, and possibly in a manner which had depriv'd him of a part of the hope he had conceiv'd to prosper in his design, but by this time they saw themselves in the Camp, and saw themselves on all sides accosted by persons who gave them not leisure to continue their converse. They followed on their way to the Quarter of the Queen, by long Streets of Tents ranged in a very fair order; and all this appearance of War, in a Camp compos'd of so many Nations, and the powers of so many Kings, recalling into the Spirit of Constance, the remembrance of what was pass'd, made him oftentimes sigh for that change of his condition, which had cruelly interrupted the course of those those fair actions by which he had acquir'd so much glory. They came in the end to a great Village, seated on the Banks of the Rhine, at which the Princes had taken their Quarters, because there were many fair Palaces, much more commodious than the Tents, and a Castle, which, out of respect, they had left to the Queen of the Cimbrians, the Queen of the Turingiens, and the Princess of Suevia.

It was here that they alighted, and Constance, conducted by the King of the Sueves, and the others, found the two Queens, and the Princess, at the gate of the Hall, whither they were come to meet them, with King Gondioch, and King Godegsile, who would not refuse to see Constance, though they were Enemies to his Nation, and more to the design which conducted him to their Camp. All that Constance could imagine of the beauty of Rosamond, by the recitals of Clemmer, Pharamond, and all other persons who had spoken to him of that subject, he now found infinitely below what now appeared to his eyes, and he confessed, that no imagination could persuade him to what he in truth beheld. He remain'd so surpris'd at such a far excellling Object, that for a long time he was not able to acquit himself of the Formalities usual in such Encounters; and though his Soul was wholly fill'd with the Idea of Placidia, his love for some moments suspended all its motion, and his Spirit seem'd to forget all things, to dedicate it self entirely to that sight which charm'd the remembrance of his evil, and spread something through his senses, which rendred him quite different from himself. The habit of the Queen, though suitable to an austere sadness, lessened not her beauty, for the black colour did more set forth the resplendent whiteness of a complexion which out-vied the very Snow, and did but form an obscurity from which her eyes seem'd to glance a fire more bright than ordinary. The admirable proportions of her whole person, and the beauties of her port and gate, seem'd rather like to those of Homer's Divinities, than those of mortal persons. In fine, all her person entirely attracted both the eyes and spirit of Constance to its sight and admiration; and though he yielded not to such a power as Varanez and Balamir had done, at least, he excus'd, and ceas'd to condemn them.

The wonders which he saw in Rosamond, hindred him not from observing those which all the world acknowledges in the Beauties of Anaxantha and Albisinda, he beheld them as two fair Stars near a brighter Luminary, and he judg'd well, that if he had seen them o-ther where than with Rosamond, he could have believ'd there was nothing fairer in the world. He saluted them with that respect due to their Dignities, and with that which Beauties so admirable could imprint in Souls, and they received him like that person of the world whom renown had most made them know, and who, by his great Actions, ought to be judg'd worthy their esteem. He was likewise civilly saluted by Gondioch and Godegsile, though their intentions were ill, and he rendred them all that was due to their Dignity, and to their Merit, so much the rather, by their noble air, and graceful comportment, he was perswaded it.

After the first words, usual at such meetings (in which, if his modesty suffered something by those praises which he saw given him by the fairest lips, it was as well impossible for him to conceal a part of those things with which a sight so extraordinary had replete his mind) being come into the Hall, with the Queen of the Cimbrians, whose hand he had taken, and from thence having conducted her into her Chamber, whilst the King of the Sueves, and Artabure, whom he had presented to the Queens, rendred the same office to the fair Queen of the Turingiens, and the Princess Albisinda, having taken his place near the Queen of the Cimbrians, like a person to whom all courtly customs were well known (whilst the rest of the company did the like) beholding her with a respect which was possibly above what is due to mortal persons, and which deprived him of a part of the liberty he had easily to explain himself; I know not, Madam, said he, if you will pardon a person whose misfortunes have depriv'd him of his courage and boldness, those endeavours, which in a better fortune, he might have attempted with more appearance; or if you will grant, that it is yet permitted to a person, who, by the goodness of his Emperour, was at other times in some esteem with the Allies of the Empire, to hope, that he may still find so much among them, as to make his Mediation acceptable, and the Propositions he is to make of a peace, much more advantageous and glorious for them, than all the events of war can be pleasing, I know well, Madam, that your Father was an Ally of the Romans, and I believe you have not renounced their Alliance, and therefore a Roman cannot be suspected by you, especially a Roman, who dares promise himself, to be own'd by his Emperour, in whatever he shall do for your interests. It is out of this consideration that I would join my mediation to the desire of the King of the Franks, to demand peace of you, I say at the desire of King Pharamond, but I do not possibly say enough, since it is King Pharamond himself demands peace of you, and who would receive it from you on any conditions you please to impose. I have found his desire real, and if you will permit me to speak it, I have found his defence so just, that I could not refuse my intercession with you and my mediation with the Princes interested in your party. I will add both to the one and other that of the Emperour, if it be necessary, and I assure my self he will approve all that I shall agree for the Allies of the Empire, so much the more willingly because in the peace I propose their advantage may no less be encountred than that of their enemies: and that by the beginning of the War Pharamond hath no more reason to fear the event than the Princes of your party, they are present Madam at the supplication I make you, to grant that I seek your satisfaction by other ways than those which have already cost so much blood. The fair Queen of the Turingiens, the King of the Sueves, and the King of the Balternes, are by the losses they have suffer'd interess'd in the revenge you seek; and the other Princes are so by reasons or pretensions which perswade them to the justice of their quarrel: I doubt not but they will all follow those motions with which you shall inspire them, and if you will permit me I will intreat them all before you, not to oppose the desire I have to give them repose, and hinder the ruine of Germany. They know too well how many thousand lives this War hath already cost, both in the Lands of the Franks, those of the Cimbrians and Burgundians, and though they might hope (as this hope is not denied them) that the events of the War may be favourable to them, I cannot believe they can hope the ruine of Pharamond at less price than that of three hundred thousand men. In the mean time your people and theirs groan under the yoke of a most cruel War, you know already all their miseries and hard calamities, and you know moreover Madam that it is not for defence of liberty they suffer, nor for the interest of Nations, but for a particular quarrel. There is enough Madam, there is enough blood sacrificed to revenge, there is nothing so just but ought to have its limits, and that which might have been just in a time when the injuries were fresh, and when nothing had been done to repair them, ceases to be so in a long and cruel obstinacy. And further Madam (continued he, turning himself wholly towards her) you know what enemy you pursue, you are not ignorant whether he hath offended you by his intention or misfortune, and you cannot doubt but by reason of that which he hath to be hated by you, that life against which you arm so many thousands of men, is more odious to him than the worst of his Enemies. I will not say more, it belongs to another tongue than that of a Mediator (as I am) to perswade you in this matter, and if that I should proceed in it, there are many persons in this Company by whom I should not be favourably heard to: but I ought in my judgment to be so by the most interested whilst I demand only peace, and offer them all satisfaction, from a Prince (who submits out of all other motives rather than fear) at present in a condition able to sustain the War against all the powers they can Arm.

Constance spoke in this manner, and being naturally sweet and patient he would continue the discourse to the end, though at the beginning he soon knew by the countenances of many of the Company that it was not agreeable to them. There was a little murmuring among them so soon as he had done speaking, which made him well judge he should find some difficulty in his design. And the fair Queen of the Cimbrians, who had quietly listned to him having cast her eyes upon Amalazontha and on the King of the Sueves as most interested: And in fine, upon all the other Princes as it were to gather a part of their thoughts before she declared hers, turning her self towards Constance, and breaking silence with such a grace and Majesty as astonish'd the illustrious Roman; You ought not to doubt my Lord, said she, but your mediation is held in great esteem among persons who respect the Roman alliance and your particular merit, and you would do us injustice if you should believe, that what might be yielded to the Oriental or Occidental Emperours can be refused to the great Constance: but there are sometimes engagements which leave us not the liberty to follow our inclinations, and though we may overcome thoughts we must not violate solemn Oaths, nor break those unions in which our honour is engaged as well as our word. I tell you this particularly for my interest, and without making you the sad discourse of those cruel injuries I have received from the King of the Franks, by the ruine of our Realms, the loss of my liberty, the Death of my Brother slain by his own hand before my eyes, that of a Father who lost it by his Arms, and so many other evils which for the greatness of them are known to the whole Universe, I will tell you that though I could pardon such bloody injuries I cannot dispense with sacred Oaths, and Oaths which I have made before all the Gods both to my Brother dying in my Arms, and to my Father expring before my eyes, to pursue the revenge of their death to the last moment of my life: Nor can I violate a sacred union made with the King of the Sueves by the command of the King my Father, in a quarrel common to us and in which our interests cannot be separated. Ah for Heaven Madam (said Constance to the fair Queen) you ought not to doubt, but it will dispense with the performance of your oaths, and since they are contrary to its will, instead of being incens'd it will favour your good intentions: And for that union you have made with the King of the Sueves, as we desire to appease and satisfy him as well as you, it will not be necessary to disunite you in a treaty you shall not make but with him, and to which I hope he will for our sakes consent. You hope it in vain (said now the King of the Sueves very briskly) and though I consider as I ought, both the alliance of the Romans and the mediation of such a man as Constance, you must not wonder if I declare that no reason nor no consideration shall make me abandon the design I have to pursue the revenge of my Son till death. "I believed, said Constance very faintly, that time and the blood you have devoted to that desire of revenge might have sweetned a part of your resentment, and I despair not but we may in the end obtain what you refuse at our first demand. And for you Madam (continued he addressing himself to the Queen of the Turingiens) since it is difficult to imagine, but Heaven hath given to your soul Beauties agreeable to those we admire in your person, I hope that the sorrow you may have for the death of a Brother who lost his life in battel, and assaulting that of a Prince who had never offended him will not be more powerful in your spirit than pity, than the calamity of your people, and the effusion of so much blood as you must spill in the prosecution. I say the same thing to the King of the Basternes (added he addressing himself towards him) and I doubt not but that by whatever honour he may be engaged to revenge the King his Brother, yet that he will consider his death as an effect of his courage and misfortune rather than the intention of King Pharamond, and that he will comply with all things, reason and the intercession of his friends can exact from him.

"I confess (said the charming Amalazontha) that blood, cruelty and employs of War, are not conformable to to my inclinations, but there is nothing to which I would not form my inclinations to revenge my Brother whom I loved more than my self. "I owe the same revenge to mine (added the King of the Basternes Lover of the amiable Albifinda) but since I know the King of the Franks killed him like a valiant man, it is less resentment that arms me against him than the concern I have in the interests of the King of the Sueves, from which no consideration can withdraw me. "Besides those that seek revenge for their Sons and Brothers (said now King Gondioch who had not before spoke) there are some amongst us whom other reasons arm against Pharamond, and though all others should consent to a peace with him I would continue the War till death. "For you (said Constance whom this discourse displeas'd, and in whom all the proceeding of Gondioch had begot in him an aversion for him) as I never heard you had any reason to be an Enemy to King Pharamond, I confess that I intended not to address my self to you as I have address'd my self to those, to whom by his misfortune he hath given some cause of offence, and though that of others may be overcome yours will be permitted to act with liberty. "Being neither Ally nor Friend to the Romans (replied very fiercely the Burgundian King) I will not inform my self whether among them an infidelity like that of Pharamond may be approved. "If I were not here Mediator, replied Constance very prudently, I would answer both like a Roman and like a man in whom the virtue of Pharamond had wrought that effect it ought, to the discourse of a man from whom the Romans desire neither alliance nor friendship: but in the quality I at present am, I will only tell you, that I have understood that you are bound to King Pharamond for your Crown and Liberty, and are the sole cause of his misfortunes, but I have never heard it spoken that you could accuse of infidelity, a Prince to whom you owe all things and who is not obliged to you but for all the misfortunes of his life. The Queen knows well nor will she disown it (just and equitable as she is) that of all the actions of Pharamond which have attract'd her anger, there are only those done in your favour whereof she can with reason accuse him, and that all the others are fallen out by his misfortune and against his intention. And all the world have admir'd that instead of arming your self against him, you have not expos'd yours to defend his as the person of the World the most oblig'd to him.

Gondioch was about to reply to Constance in those terms had possibly transport'd him to extremities, if the Queen of the Cimbrians and the King of the Sueves had not oppos'd it, by remonstrating to him the injury he did them in the person of Constance; or if the Queen had not pray'd him or rather command'd him by all her Authority not to speak a word more. After this command Gondioch left the Chamber with Prince Condemar his Brother, who by his countenance made it sufficiently be judg'd he approv'd not his procedure. And King Godegesile who was neither a Friend to the Romans nor to Constance particularly, departed with him, saying that his design was conformable to that of Gondioch, and that he would never consent to a peace that would deprive him of the means to merit Rosamond. "For my part, said Ardaric, I am no enemy to Pharamond, nor know I any thing in him which is not rather worthy my esteem than aversion, but I will wage War against him and against all the world for the service of the Queen, nor can I desire that peace should rob me of “occasional to serve her. “And for me (said Prince Varancz who had not yet spoke) I not only confess that I am not an enemy to King Pharamond, but I confess that all his person hath charmed me and that never any thing appeared to me so great as he: but if I must wage war to gain Rosamond, I would renew the ancient fury of the Gyants and make war against Heaven it self for such a Conquest.

Constance smiled at this discourse of Varancz though he was but little satisfied with the beginning of his negotiataion, and the Princess Albifinda reaching her lips to the ear of Rosamond, who notwithstanding her Royal dignity still called her Sister, “Alas my Sister (said she very low that she might not be understood by any other) what a great misfortune is it that I alone am not asked my advice, for I can well assure you that my opinion should not be for war. The Queen sigh’d at this discourse of Albifinda, and a little after Constance rising from his place to follow the King of the Sueves with whom he was to dine, and whom he yet followed with reluctancy by reason of the little disposition he saw in him to peace, addressing himself to the Queen of the Cimbrians, “I did indeed believe Madam, said he, that at my first proposition I should not obtain what I demanded, but I hope the reflection whch you will make will be more favourable, and since I have eight days of cessation of Arms, I will endeavour to employ them all in such manner that I may not be blamed though the success may not conform to my intentions. After these words he told her that he would revisit her to take leave of her before he returned to Pharamond, and he added with a low voice, seeing that there were some persons nigh who might understand his discourse, that he entreated her to consider the cruelty she exercised towards a Prince who dy’d for her, and who instead of meriting her hatred was possibly the only man of the world worthy her affection. The Queen changed colour at this discourse of Constance, and seemed pleased that Constance by departing dispensed with her returning an answer.

Going forth of the Chamber, Constance who understood how the valiant Balamir kept his bed by reason of his wound, and who by what he had understood of the virtue and great Actions of that Prince had conceiv’d for him an esteem proportionate to his merit, demanded of the Prince of Persia and the King of the Sueves, in what place he was that he might give him a visit, when Telanor who was come to the Camp of the Cimbrians with him, and who the day before had recounted to him the History of his Masters fair life, came to him on his behalf, and told him that Prince Balamir had sent him to beg pardon for the obstruction his wound had caused to the desire he had to come and render him all that was due to the great Constance from persons who knew how to respect virtue, that without the violence of his friends who hindred him from rising, his wound had not been able to divert him. Constance having hearken’d to this discourse of Telanor, “I should be ashamed at the civility of your Prince, said he, if these Princes could not justifie me to you by testifying that I was on the point to visit him: and I should have a just complaint against him if he could believe that I had any design to depart hence, without seeing a Prince whose fair reputation would make me compass the world to wait on him.

Concluding these words he would have gone to have seen him without further delay, but because it was very late the King of the Sueves prayed him first to go dine, offering himself to accompany him in this visit immediately after the repast. The Prince of Persia, the King of the Alaines, the King of the Basternes, and many other Princes and illustrious personages dined with Constance at the King of the Sueves quarters: the Dinner was plentiful and magnificent, but Constance took small delight by reason of the little disposition he found in the Spirit of the Suevissh King to consent to peace: for that King naturally severe and obstinate in his designs, though he acted civilly with him and testified to him an infinite consideration both for his person and mediation, made him easily judge he would difficultly abandon that desire of revenge which above all things did predominate in his soul.

Incontinently after Dinner Constance went to see Balamir, and though the Prince of Persia had no inclination for him, or rather because he was the man of all his Rivals whom he beheld with most envy and jealousy, yet he would not leave Constance but with the King of the Sueves, the King of the Gepides and the King of the Basternes accompanied him to the Chamber of Balamir. This Prince received Constance with all those marks of acknowledgment and respect could be given to the chiefest person in the universe, and Constance found in his countenance and in all his person wherewith to confirm himself advantagiously in the opinion he had of him: These two great men both the one and the other made truly great, by all that could raise men above any thing common, beheld each other reciprocally with a serious consideration, and if Balamir found in the person of Constance all that he expected to make it agree with his fair reputation, Constance judged that he had seen nothing equal to Balamir, before he had seen the King of the Franks: Not but that they had before seen each other, when Constance hindred the continuance of the Combat between Varanez and Balamir, but that was for so little time, and with so much disorder, that they could not make those judgments of each other, which they might do after some moments consideration.

Balamir began it by those thanks he return'd to Constance with the best grace in the world, for the honour he did him in this visit: but Constance stopping very readily the course of it, You ought not to thank me, said he, for a duty I pay to my self rather than to you: for Fortune offering me occasion to see the great Balamir, I could not neglect it without doing my self an injury I should never have pardon'd. You may believe, replied the Prince of the Huns, that his Renown hath begot a sufficient desire to know the great Constance, in all those whom his virtue and great merits could touch, and that I am not little engaged to my fortune in giving me so easily, what I should have sought with all possible labour, had she given me the means. Though I have always passed my life among great men, replied Constance, yet I have never known such as I some days past have seen; but the satisfaction I have had to see them, hath been counterbalanced by a great displeasure, and as I have testified to the Prince of Persia, the grief I had to see him engaged against a person whose admirable virtue hath gain'd my heart, I cannot hinder my self from telling you, notwithstanding the presence of the King of the Sueves, whose pardon I beg, that I find nothing more cruel and unjust, than to see you take Arms against a Prince, whom you have no reason to hate, and whom you would without doubt love if you knew him. I already know him so well, replied Balamir, as to tell you, that I prefer him in my esteem before all that the universe hath of most great, and instead of counseling the war against him, you shall see me presently give my opinion for peace, if it be demanded of me; but as I am engaged in the service of Queen Rosamond, and by a passion stronger than reason, I believe you will not condemn the design I have, to serve her like a valiant man, and like a man, whom no passion can make forget the respect owing to virtue. This is to speak like a man truly valiant, replied the famous Roman, for true valour is an enemy to brutish fury; but I can assure you, that if you have an esteem for the King of the Franks, he renders you reciprocally justice, and that when you shall understand those things which is not permitted me to relate to you, I shall be much deceived if you cease not to be his enemy. I am his Rival, replied Balamir, and not his enemy, but though I am his Rival, and though I would seek the possession of Rosamond at the price of my life, if he should command me truly to declare my thoughts, no interest should hinder me from telling her, that among all men, Pharamond alone can be worthy of her affection. This is a discourse, said Constance, truly worthy of Balamir—— And it is, added Varanez, the discourse of a Philosopher, and not of a Lover, and a man like Balamir; for my part, I am not of this opinion: and though I am no less perswaded of his virtue than Balamir, I believe, neither Pharamond, nor any person in the world, to be worthier than my self of the affections of Rosamond; and that though Fortune had not given me advantages over all her Lovers, there is none, who for courage, or qualities of person, could better merit her than my self. Those are most happy, said Balamir sighing, who are so well perswaded of their own merit, I know that you are so with infinite reason, but you shall pardon me, if I fear that of Pharamond; and that though great as you are, by Birth, Degree, and Valour, I look not upon you as my most formidable Rival. I believe, said King Ardaric, that no Lover thinks himself inferior to his Rival, and that the good opinion we may have of our selves, is more pardonable in this, than in any other occasion. I agree with you, said Constance, but however it be, I desire with all my heart, that Balamir were not Rival to the King of the Franks, and that Heaven would again raise up Hunnimonda. All the passion which Balamir at present had for the Queen of the Cimbrians, could not hinder him from sighing, and changing colour at these words of Constance; and in a moment after, by the excellency of his nature, which no passion could corrupt, his eyes were seen moistened with some tears, he carryed his hand to them, either to conceal, or dry them, and letting yet a sigh break forth, Oh Hunnimonda, said he, if you had lived, though lost to me, I had never been amorous of Rosamond; but dead as you are, I can with difficulty comprehend the miracle her beauties hath wrought over my Spirit.

Whilst these illustrious personages were in this converse, Cloderic with the Queen of the Cimbrians, endeavoured to discharge his Commission; and so soon as Constance was departed the Chamber, had presented himself, and saluted the Queen. She entertained him most favourably, and told him many the most obliging things in the world, before all that were present. After Dinner she retired to a window with him, and beholding him with those eyes which had inflamed all the Earth, and whose dazzling splendour no humane force was able to support; And well, Cloderic, said she, you have then forsaken us. "I am still, replied Cloderic, the most faithful of your Subjects, but I am fixed to the service of that Master your Majesty hath given me, that I believe I shall never leave him. "I suffered you to retire with him, said the Queen, in a time, when, by the service you rendered him, you might fear all things from the anger of the King my Father, but at present, that you have liberty to return into your Country, among your Friends and Kindred, methinks there is some cruelty in leaving them to sojourn with our Enemies. "Ah Madam, (said Cloderic, in the sadest manner in the world) and what Enemy have you in King Pharamond?

He spoke but these words, and the Queen having hearkened to them, with a look sufficiently pensive, fixed her eyes on the ground, without replying. Cloderic regarded her for some time in that estate, and after breaking silence very low, that he might not be heard by any other person; "If it may be permitted your faithful Subject to beg a favour, said he, I would beg your Majesty to grant me one minutes audience. The Queen answered nothing to these words, but a little after, departed from the place where she stood, and entered into a Closet, which was very nigh. Cloderic judging by her behaviour, that she would not be offended if he followed her; and being more hardy for the service of a Prince whom he passionately loved, than he would have been for his own interest, followed her in effect, and entered alone into the Closet after her. So soon as she was entered, she seated her self in a Chair, and seeing Cloderic alone in the Closet, "Are you there Cloderic? (said she.) "I thought Madam, answered Cloderic, that your Majesty had commanded me to follow you. "I commanded you not, (said the Queen) but since you are here, I am content you stay, and if you have any thing to speak to me, either for your self, or yours, I will willingly hearken to you. "It is neither for me, nor mine, that I ought to abuse your patience, (replied Cloderic:) "and when you permitted me to follow the King of the Franks, you might well judge, that I fixed my self so strongly to a Master so amiable, as to forget both my self, and mine, to devote my self wholly to him. It is most certain, that I have found in him those charms which have enchanted me, and that to fetter hearts, he hath those chains, which no accident, nor length of time can break. I should certainly be too happy, and that much more for the love which hath tied me to his person, than for those benefits I have received from him (though they are above all I could hope from the most magnificent Prince in the world) if I were not exposed, much more than other persons who are near him, to the knowledge of his misfortunes, and the cruel sufferings, which render him the most unfortunate of all men. By reason of the honour I have to be your Subject, and that I have had to be employed in your service, 'tis to me he addresses himself more than all others, to make me know what he suffers, and what he will suffer for you till death. I should touch you without doubt with pity, should I make the recital, but no expression can approach the truth, but by the communication which great Souls have together, a Soul like yours may comprehend what passes in a Soul like Pharamond's, much better by imagination, than by my discourse. He was pleased that I should this day accompany Constance, to confirm what he commanded me to tell you, after the death of the deceased King. And he hath charged me with some words, which he believed I might persuade you to hear; And which I conjure you, Madam, continued he, bending his knee before her, and presenting her the Letter of Pharamond, to peruse with some motions of pity, if his merit and fidelity cannot excite any thing more favourable in your heart. Concluding these words, he opened himself the Letter of Pharamond, and in that open posture presented it to the eyes of Rosmond; she appeared much troubled at the carriage, and discourse of Cloderic, and had hearkened to it without lifting up her eyes from the ground, where she had fixed them, she remained yet in the same countenance, when he had done speaking, and turning in the end her eyes upon the Letter he presented her, and not able to resist a power which possibly obliged her to see it no less than the persuasions of Cloderic, she read these words.

King Pharamond to the Queen of the Cimbrians.

Either as a Lover, or as an Enemy, I desire a death from your hatred, or your pity; the Enemy may expect it as a punishment, if the Lover cannot receive it as a favour. Few persons have so often demanded it without obtaining it; and I perhaps find my self the only person among men who desires death, and to whom it is not permitted to die. Is this pity, is it cruelty, or is it both together? Ah for pity I ought not hope it, and there is little appearance death should be refused me out of pity, while the whole Earth is armed to give it me; and if it be cruelty, it is a strange cruelty, which denies me death, yet permits me not to live. Is it not that you hope a revenge much more entire from those long deaths which I suffer adoring you without hope, than from a death that would deliver me from all that which my love, and all which your hatred makes me suffer? Or is it yet more true, that you would owe to some other than Pharamond, the price proposed for his life? Or that you fear not to be longer in a condition to give it to a Rival, if you receive that from me they ought to offer to merit it? Ah, if it be for this end that you forbid me from dying, it is too cruel to let me live; and you will possibly be ill serv'd by those Arms who will in the Combat respect that fair Image I carry in the middle of my heart. Or if you yet seek glory in my ruine, consider that you seek it in vain, and that you will gain nothing more, when you shall deprive me by a hundred thousand swords, of a life I yielded into your power at the first instant I saw you, than if you should permit me to give up before your eyes my last sigh, and abandon by my death to my Rivals what Fortune permits me not to hope.

Whilst Rosamond read these words, Cloderic, who held his eyes fixed on her countenance, observed those changes which made him well know the agitation of her Spirit, and judge by very great appearances, that it was not hatred which produced them. She let the Letter fall on a Table near her, keeping a long silence, in the same posture as before, reading the Letter, violently retaining some sighs, which notwithstanding her endeavours broke from her breast. In the end lifting up her eyes to fix them on the countenance of Cloderic, and breaking silence with a blush that added a new lustre to her beauty; "Cloderic, said she, You may tell the King of the Frank, that I have but too much explained my self to him; That neither as a Lover, nor as an Enemy can he obtain what he demands of me; And that if he loved me so much as he would persuade me, he would choose rather to dispute me with his Rivals to the end, than by his death abandon to them the possession of Rosamond. That he would let Heaven act what it hath resolved for his fortune and mine; and that he would employ all his Valour to defend me against others, if he cannot employ it to conquer me; that it is not impossible but his Valour may give him Victory against all his Enemies; and that if this misfortune befall us, he shall see me suffer it with more constancy than I should possibly comport our Victory. Concluding these words, she bushed more than he had done at the beginning of her discourse: And a little after, turning again towards Cloderic; You make me speak more than I ought, said she, but I pray let this befall us no more. Go Cloderic, and leave me a little alone.

Cloderic having made a profound reverence, departed the Closet, and retired with satisfaction, to have observed, as he thought, that the King, whom his present inclinations made him serve, was not so unhappy as he believed himself. Before he spoke to the Queen, and while Constance, and the other Princes were with her, he had seen Imbergeda, who was his Friend, and given her Prince Marcomire's Packet. Imbergida having opened it, found a Letter for the Princess Albisinda, and one for her self, in her own she had read these words.

Prince Marcomire to Imbergida.

I Know not if you remember the promise you made me, to love me always as your Son; but if you have forgot it, I will put you in remembrance, by demanding the effect. Gerontes would visit you, if he had as free an access into your Camp as Cloderic: If you love me as well as he, I shall not be unhappy, and you know that my felicity in part depends on you, since, near my Princess, you are the only person in the world can act most for my repose and fortune.

Having read this Letter, Imbergida gave hers to the Princess Albisinda, so soon as she left Rosamond, to return to her Chamber. And that fair Princess truly loving Marcomire, could not see his Letter without being touched with infinite joy, and no less tenderness. She opened it with great impatience, and found these words.

Prince Marcomire to the Princess Albisinda.

Your faithful Eriplea salutes you, she advertises you that it is impossible for her to live without seeing her Princess, yet she would support her absence more patiently, if it were likewise common to Theodora, but Theodora dayly sees you, and Eriplea sees you no more; yet she fears this not to be the greatest of her misfortunes, but lest Presence should banish Absence from your memory; if this misery must happen, give her rather a death, and if you please, believe, that she would die much more cruelly by your forgetting her, than by the Arms of our Enemies.

The fair Princess of the Sueves, whose heart was tenderly touched for the Brother of Pharamond, read many times this Letter with all those motions her affections could create. But Imbergida having advertised her, that if she would answer it, she must do it presently, Constance, whom Cloderic could not leave, being upon the point to return, she writ these words.

The Princess Albisinda to Prince Marcomire.

Though Eriplea be a Deceiver, yet I vow I cannot hate her, and would willingly see her, if I could do it without exposing her to some danger; but since it is difficult, she must attend with me the opportunities of Heaven and Fortune, and in the mean time, she may be assured, the presence of Theodora shall not prejudice her, so that she be still faithful.

Imbergida

Imbergida carried this Letter to Cloderic, with that which she had writ to Mércomire, just at the time that Constance having quitted Balamir, was returned to the Queen of the Cimbrians, with whom he found the Queen of the Turingiens, and the Princes of the Sueves. Constance testified to the Queens his sorrow to have so ill prospered in the beginning of his Negotiation, and intreated them to think good, that during the days of truce granted him, he should yet do what was possible to incline their Spirits, and that of the King of the Sueves to peace. The fair Queens, without explaining themselves farther, assured him of the consideration they had for his person, and intercession. And a little after, Constance having taken leave of them, retired with the Princes that accompanied him, and notwithstanding the endeavours they used to keep him that day in their Camp, he took Horse to return to Pharamond.

PHARAMOND.

The Fifth Part.

BOOK I.

When Constance had taken his leave, and was upon his return to the French Camp, the fair Queen of the Cimbrians retired to her Closet, to give some few minutes of repose to the hard constraint, she was obliged (by the severe rules of a cruel Duty) to impose upon her self; and to gain a small liberty to entertain that diversity of thoughts her Soul then laboured with.

It was not perhaps through her own inclination, that she waged a war so cruel against the King of the Franks; and it was a very hard case, that considering so great, and so extraordinary a merit, a love like Pharamond's should only give birth to hatred, and desires of revenge, in a Soul which was not insensible of Gratitude. She had been without doubt exasperated by former injuries she had received at what time the interest of King Gondioch had armed his hand against the King her Father; she remembered also with no small grief, the deplorable death of her unfortunate Brother; and in the King her Father's, although Pharamond could not with any justice be accused, she nevertheless had found sufficient matter of new resentment against him, and had hearkened as much unto them, as either the Laws of Nature, or those of Duty could possibly oblige her, and had paid them all the Rights' as could be due from a person, whose inclinations were most suitable to the desires of Revenge.

Through the rage which his first offences had excited in her Soul, a first sight she had exclaimed against Pharamond, as against a person meriting all the thunder of her anger: at the death of Theobald she had darted such flashes of Lightning against him, as had been more fatal and tormenting unto him, than those which he had to fear from the incensed Heavens: and upon the death of the King of the Cimbrians, she had willingly followed those cruel Endowments which he would have given her, and had wholly abandon'd her self to all that which the King of the Sueves and he had desired of her, for the execution of their revenge. But amidst so many Injuries, so many Misfortunes, and so many fatal Resolutions, she had reserved a just sense of the outrages she had received, either by the misfortune, or by the intention of her Enemy; she had had a clear sight, and a just knowledge both of the person, and admirable qualities of Pharamond, and she had possibly been Mistress of a heart, which being neither of Steel, nor Adamant, could not preserve that obstinate firmness against so many fair proofs of so fair a passion. It was almost impossible, but that the first sight of Pharamond should have wrought upon her Soul part of that effect, which hers had produc'd upon the heart of the French Prince; and as Pharamond was not a person to be less admired in his Sex, than Kosamond in hers, it might happen that by this first Apparition (if we may so call it) she was surpris'd to his advantage, or at least, that it had bred in her mind some disposition to hearken more favourably to all that he could speak in his justification.

Through this advantageous impression, and through the intercession of Truth and Reason, she might believe, that those former injuries she had received from Pharamond, had been sufficiently repaired by what he had done in her service against King Gondioch; and that the death of Theobald had been an effect of his own misfortune, and of the intention he had to serve her, and not to offend him; and that to the King of the Cimbrians, he had only contributed, through the malignity and cruelty of those Stars, which design'd all things to his misfortune. However it were, either through this knowledge which she had of Pharamond's innocence, or through the effect of her love, and of his admirable qualities, all the thoughts she had of him were not of an Enemy, seeing that her Soul laboured with many other Passions than those of hatred, or desire of revenge. She suffered much more than could be judged by appearances; but yet by these appearances you might easily judge, that her Soul did not enjoy a perfect repose, there was no person that thereby could divine all the cause of her disquiet; for that which she endured without daring to make known, was for the most part covered with what she was permitted to declare. Thus while she shed tears upon the Herse of the King her Father, and to the memory of Theobald, she might mingle some sighs which sprung from another cause, and with the memory of these losses, she might feel the misfortune which constrained her to revenge them upon a person, who was not so odious unto her as he ought to be, to make her prosecute his ruine without repugnancy. Neither did she love those of her party with that fervency which they had reason to expect, considering her engagements to their assistance; and if when they went to fight, she accompanied them with some wishes; or if the found of the Trumpet, and noise of War made the Vermilion to forsake her Cheeks, neither were these fears for her own, nor her wishes altogether for the victory of her party. They who appeared most zealous, and ardent in seconding her anger, were those that in her heart found least of recompence, so that that eagerness by which they thought to merit most, was a fatal means to render them less esteem'd by her. How often (viewing them clad in their sumptuous Arms, casting looks of terrour through their glittering Steel, when they mounted their fiery Couriers in her presence, and threaten'd with an arrogant temerity the life of Pharamond) hath she breathed forth some sighs of which they knew not the true meaning, in lieu of a kind look which they silently entreated, casting her eyes upon them, animated with another passion than they dream'd of; Go cruel ones, (said she to her self) go find my hatred where you believe to meet my love, nor expect that I will accompany your designs with any favourable wish; may the Gods rather divert the effect of your cruel threats, and direct the sharp points of your Swords to any other mark, rather than against the life of Pharamond: that life is too dear unto the Gods, to be so odious unto me as you believe it, and perhaps it may be defended at the price of yours.

As they who appeared most furious, and eager after Pharamond's ruine, and that most outrageously threatened him, and who either through his absence, or the general hatred the Camp bore him, were approved and applauded for so doing, were the greatest strangers to her affection; so they who proceeded with more moderation against him, and spake more sparingly of him, she most favourably regarded; so that if Prince Balamir had had no other advantage over his Rivals, the modesty he always observed in speaking of the French King, with the high value he always professed both to his person and virtues, were not the least motives to prefer him in her heart before many of her other Lovers; which was the reason that the animosity, which (above others) Gondioch manifested always against him, did render him the most contemptible of all her Admirers, though in truth he was not so, and obscured all those great qualities he was endued with.

In the mean time she endured a torment so much the greater, because accompanied by an eternal constraint; and for that there were few persons in the world, to whom she durst unbofom her grief: Albifinda might solely boast to have learn'd from her self, part of this great secret of her heart, yet neither to her had she fully declared it; for although she had in her an entire confidence, she could not force the reluctancy she had to confess at large a secret, which might tend any way to shame her; so that in discovering unto her a part of what she felt, she left her to divine the rest, not submitting her self to the judgment she might make thereof: she nevertheless had not confessed so little, but that Albifinda had drawn from her confession an assurance to inform her of all that which had happen'd unto her, in relation to Marcomire. And although Rosamond found somewhat of surprizing in this Adventure, and even of eminent danger to her friend, through the severity of the King of the Sueves, and that she had represented unto her the difficulties which might cross her affection, she did it nevertheless in such a manner, as might easily make her judge, that the friendship she had for her, and not any hatred either to the person, or House of Pharamond had obliged her to it.

Amongst

Amongst her Women, Perfunda and Luciana were they who had the greatest knowledge, or rather, the greatest jealousy of the truth, by reason of her great indulgence, in giving them free liberty to judge their pleasure. But Cloderic, next to Albisinda, was the person to whom she had declared her self.

As her releasing Pharamond out of the Prison, wherein he had voluntarily cast himself, might have been well imputed to her sole generosity, (and doubtless, by her sole generosity she might have performed it, without being excited and push'd forward by other motions) so made she no scruple (after her Father's death) to aver it, being more willing the world should learn it from her free confession, than from the uncertain mouth of fame; so that she only conceal'd the interview between Pharamond and her self, a thing only known to Cloderic, Perfunda and Luciana.

She had often found great consolation in the gentle disposition, and sweet converse of Albisinda; for this fair Princess who loved Marcomire, and hated not Pharamond, instead of opposing those favourable motions she had conceived in her heart, for the amorous King of the Franks, did both approve, and encourage them, by all she could possibly invent to his advantage: but as she was not ignorant of those cruel obstacles which oppos'd King Pharamond's Fortunes, and perhaps the fair Rosamond's inclination, who had neither reasons strong enough to vanquish them, nor to put another face upon things (by the whole world) so well known; she thought rather to sweeten and mitigate those evils, than to take them quite away, or to give a relief considerable enough to settle the mind of Rosamond in a state of more repose and tranquillity. She had remained till now in that condition, but then she found new cause, by Cloderic's discourse, and Pharamond's Letter, to precipitate her self into a Sea of sadness and afflicting thoughts.

As soon as she was alone, and private in her Closet, and that by absence of those persons who might have given her some diversion, the remembrance of what she had heard, and seen some minutes before in the same place, return'd entirely into her fancy; she found her self expos'd to the severe war which her thoughts were about to wage against her, and abandoned her self to all those torments which her reflections made her suffer; she threw her self with a sad negligence upon that Couch, upon which an hour before she had received Cloderic's message; and with an afflicting sadness recalling to her memory all that she had heard, or seen in that place; Was it not here (said she) that I have heard so much talk of Pharamond? And was it not here I explain'd my self more than my Duty did permit? How! (said she, chiding her self for this remembrance, or rather seeming to chide) Pharamond who is only known to thee by so many bloody injuries, he who hath laid thy Country waste, who slew thy Brother, who destroyed a Prince designed thee for a Husband, and who caused thy Father's ruine; that very person whom thou pursuest with so many thousand men, is come to find thee in the middle of thy Camp, and will bring the war to thy heart, yet hath he the confidence to write to thee? yet, it is thy heart he assaults, he has the boldness to write to thee, but thou hast not the courage to refuse his Epistle, nor the power to binder thy self from perusing it, nay, not perhaps from being therewith touch'd: Ah Rosamond, how great a weakness is thine, and to what shame dost thou expose thy self, in so ill maintaining a design wherein thou hast engaged so many Princes, and for which thou hast arm'd so many thousand men? Comest thou into thy Enemy's Territories with a power able to make all Europe tremble, only to expose thy weakness to the view of the whole world? And didst thou arm so many Provinces for thy quarrel, against this Enemy whom thou canst not hate, only to render thy overthrow more shameful, and his Victory more honourable? Is it thus, thou dost preserve the memory of those sacred promises, and of those solemn Oaths, by which (to the whole worlds knowledge) thou art engaged to the revenge of a Brother, and a Father, whom thou hast seen die, either by the hand, or by the Arms of this same Enemy; or if thou keepest them in thy memory, is this the way to observe them? She stopp'd at these words, through the grief that this remembrance caus'd; and she found somewhat therein of so much cruelty, that she could not dissipate for a long time the trouble that had overspread her Soul. But dispelling those misty clouds which were rais'd in her fancy; No, no, my Vows, said she, I have not forgot you, I am ready to offer you a Sacrifice which will make known at large the respect I have for you: yet all the rigor to which you can engage me, cannot hinder me from seeing that I have done it with integrity, that you have arm'd my self against an unfortunate Lover, but not against one that is criminal; and that this unfortunate Prince is of all men the most great, and most amiable, and that this so amiable person loves me a thousand times beyond his own life: Ye cruel ones, you that incessantly incense me to his ruine, most merciless King, of the Sueves, base and ungrateful King of the Burgundians, is it possible that your implacable hatred, and unjust resentments can close your eyes against a merit that shines so gloriously through the world? or if, your fury be so blind as to obscure this knowledge, can you believe that Rosamond hath a heart of Brass, or a Soul capable of those barbarous resentments you would infuse into her? And can you judge that she can arm her self with a rage parallel to yours, against a life which every day is offered at her feet with so much love and resignation? And that she can without grief and unkindness, turn the points of your cruel Swords against a heart which is only fill'd with her image, and only breaths to serve her? No, no, most inhumane Souls, do not nourish this opinion; and if you constrain me to the cruel necessity of observing my promises, and to acquit my self of those unjust Oaths, which were with so much cruelty extorted from my weakness, at a time when grief and misery had perplex'd my reason. Let none of you unworthy Rivals of a too illustrious Rival, hope a happiness from his misfortune, or to possess Rosamond by the ruine of Pharamond: Rosamond hath not propos'd her self the reward of so cruel an enterprise, and though she finds her self constrain'd to execute the will of a Father, for whom she is to act (through a tyrannical respect) what her Duty obliges, she will find a relief in her own courage which will disengage her of all, and will defend her from all the outrages which she hath cause to fear from her sinister fortune. And should you cruel Antagonists, give Pharamond his death, you give him his desire; for you may take away his life with much more ease than I can oblige him to preserve it. Here are (said she, taking up his Letter from the place where she had left it) Here are the too apparent and real testimonies of that so great affection he hath for me, and his little love he hath for his own life; he perfectly hateth it, because he believes it odious unto us; and therefore as a special favour, this unfortunate Hero desires nothing but his death. Here she opened the Letter, and reviewed it, stopping through a secret agitation of her thoughts, at those places which had most of passion; but in reading it, she could not abstain from giving such evident signs both of tenderness and grief, as might have been easily perceiv'd, had any person been present. She seem'd exasperated and disturbed, when she felt her eyes as willing to discharge some tears, and to swell with an accent betokening anger and vexation, repeating these words; Oh eyes of mine! (said she) do you bestow your tears upon Pharamond's Letter, and have denyed them to the death of so many thousands we have lost in Battel? Is this pity? Is this grief? Or is it somewhat more offensive? Oh my eyes! It is not on Pharamond's misfortune that you bestow those tears, but on mine; without doubt you deplore the miserable condition of a Soul reduced to such severe necessities, that death is not half so cruel: you bewail this fatal violence which most barbarous Maxims constrain me to put upon my inclinations, and your tears are no less just, than if you payd them to my ashes: Ah Pharamond! (after some few moments of silence, she added) wherefore should our most mercileß fortune so cruelly oppose our happiness, and since by our own inclinations, and the mutual judgments of our Souls, we might be worthy of each other, wherefore should she oppose an eternal obstacle to those hopes, which had not otherwise been prohibited. Ah Pharamond! (concluding with a sigh) Wherefore, having so many causes of hatred, is it impossible for me to enjoy thee? or wherefore having so many causes of love, am I not permitted to love thee?

She accompanied these last words with a River of tears which her constancy could not retain, and plung'd her self insensibly into an abyfs of grief from which all her courage was now incapable to preserve her, at what time she saw the door of her closet open. And as she had made known her pleasure to be alone, she began to grow angry because her orders were so ill observed, but much more she feared to be surpris'd in a condition little suitable to that firm stability which in appearance to the utmost of her power she ever preserv'd. But when she saw her dear Albifinda, and knew she was only disturbed by her in this sad entertainment of her thoughts her displeasure was soon appeas'd. The fair Suevian Princess by the confidence which her friendship gave her, drew nearer without fear of offending, and finding her eyes moist and some tears that yet like pearls hung on her cheeks, "How my dear Sister, said she to her, do you retire to afflict your self without me, as if you could have any mistortune or affliction in which Albifinda did not share? I wish it were possible for me so to do, replied the beauteous Queen, for it is no finall vexation to me to see you pass your most fair and youthful days with so unfortunate a woman, that must render you miserable by a participation of her misfortunes. If friendship and Amity did not allow me that share which I ought to have, replied Albifinda, I believe you have few misfortunes which are not common to us both: And it seems to me that we are tyed as it were by the same quarrel to the same fortune, and by an interest very little different. "Ah my dear Sister (said the Queen fetching a deep sigh) what a difference is there between your fortune and mine, and between those difficulties which Marcomire and Pharamond suffer for us. There may perhaps be less between your condition and mine, replied Albifinda, for those obstacles which you find in the rules of duty, to which possibly you bind your self with too much rigour, are not by much so so great as those which I have cause to fear from the King my Father's severe humour. It is true^d replied the Queen, I foresee many difficulties in your affection, but they are not invincible, and there may arrive some changes which may open a way to hope, but on me no change or revolution can bestow that happiness. I can think nothing, nothing ask of the Gods for my consolation. The Gods, replied the Princess, can redress and give both consolation and relief even to those ills, which are most desperate in our opinions: And they have work'd miracles for things which questionless were of less importance to them than your repose and fortune. But my fair Queen, (continuing her discourse and embracing her as she sat close by her) will you not, said she, inform me what greater subject of grief you have to day than at other ordinary times? or at least will you not permit me to judge of your grief by those exterior marks you give thereof? My dear Sister (replied the Queen repaying her those Caresses she receiv'd) do you not find in me to day sufficient subject for my afflictions, by seeing me rather constrain'd by the inclination of the King your father than my own, to refuse peace to a man whom were it permitted I could love extremely, and cannot now hate though I am prohibited from loving him? It seem'd to me that Constance was sent from heaven for our relief, and that all the Princes of our party had a fair occasion to withdraw themselves with honour from an enterprise whose fatal beginning might give just cause to fear the success. But as you know dear Sister I was not ignorant of their intentions before the arrival of Constance, for they had sufficiently explained themselves to leave no place for any other answer than that which I was constrain'd to make him. I should not have had that complaisance for any of those whom love or other pretensions have cemented by interest to our party, as to have followed their inclinations to the prejudice of my own; nor because they were covetous of War should I have refused a peace so much more dear and acceptable unto me, but for the violence which the King your father imposes upon me; it is he that tyrannically makes use of those rights and cruelties which my oaths and the last will of my dead father seem to enslave me to. I verily believe dear Sister (said she, kissing her fair cheeks) that I should hate him in fine, if you could pardon it, more than the person towards whom he strives to work such an aversion in me. I would not have you if you could help it, replied the Princess, hate him, but I find that I can be wittily forgive you though you loved him less than Pharamond: and it may so happen that without hating him you may both enfranchise your self from his Tyranny and from the persecution of others: Although I am not very bold and hardy by nature, yet if I were the Cimbrian Queen I would happily rather follow my own inclinations than the dictates of those persons which had no authority over me. I believe (replied the Queen with a forced smile) that you would do much less than I, and by the judgment I can make since the time we have lived together, I believe my self Mistress of as great a courage as you; but were you a Commandress of that bold courage would you make known to the whole world the favourable resentments and private affections which you bore your Brother's Murderer, the Author of so many bloody injuries as I have received from Pharamond? I know not, replied the Princess, what I should do, but I believe I could not be condemn'd for informing the King of the Sueves, and all the other Princes that I pity'd the loss of so many thousand lives; and that I held my self no longer oblig'd to wage war against a Person who had only injured us through our own misfortunes, and that I might well rest satisfied in having sacrificed to my displeasure, which was not perhaps ever just, the lives of an hundred thousand men. I should have anticipated, dear Sister, not followed your counsel, replied the beauteous Queen, and I believe I should not have done it with a more hardy confidence than you, if the King of the Sueves and the other Princes had not greater advantages upon me than those which the weakness and timorousness of our sex afford them. But they alledge a duty against me or real or pretended, much more formidable than the authority of the King of the Sueves, so that being engag'd to war with those solemnities and Ceremonies as you know were observed, and having only received the Crown of the Cimbrians after the death of the King my Father, by renewing those oaths which dying he made me make to continue the war until the total destruction of Pharamond or our party, I cannot evidence my desire of peace against the intentions and inclinations of all those we have interest'd in the war without making them judge and giving all the world cause to believe I love our common enemy, and without exposing my self by this opinion to a misfortune to me much more cruel than all those which the uncertain event of war can threaten: And besides (dear Sister added she with attempt of sighs) if you only desire a peace for Pharamond you wish him not the thing which he desires, for nothing will satisfy him but death or the possession of Rosamond, and if Rosamond's heart cannot surrender to him by this peace, we cannot otherwise content him. He may have understood and know perhaps too well that he is not hateful unto me, he is not ignorant of the necessity which constrains me to war upon him, and if I should withdraw my forces from his territories to retire to my own, with the firm resolution which I ought to make never to see him more, he would be never the more happy if he loves me as much as he endeavours to persuade me; and I verily believe he had much rather be expos'd to the events of War in waiting like you dear Sister some miracle which I ap-prebend not, than to lose by ordinary ways this unknown hope with which passion, not reason seems to flatter an enamour'd soul. And I know not Sister since I must confess it, whether I should be my self much happier in this peace and this retreat which must deprive me of the hope ever to see him, than in a condition which verily keeps my soul in eternal Alarms by divers events which must necessarily tend to the destruction of that party whom fortune declares against: But in this although I cannot conceive a hope yet methinks I am not nevertheless entirely forsaken. In fine dear Sister, my misfortunes are so much the greater by reason their weight cannot be apprehended, and Pharamond's are without doubt inferiour to mine since he is permitted to wish and follow without constraint the dictates of his inclinations, whereas I cannot vent one wish which is not either criminal or cruel to my self: for my inclinations are those which above all other things I must eternally combat. Behold dear Sister (after some few moments of silence, presenting her Pharamond's letter, said she continuing her discourse) see here if peace be the only thing which Pharamond demands, read this Letter which he assumed the boldness to write me, this letter which I had not power to refuse, and judge if he writes like a man to whom the events of war were more considerable than the loss of his hopes.

Albisinda taking the letter read it over very distinctly, and as she was no way concerned her self, she did not omit to stop particularly at those places which might nearest touch the Queen, being willing to render the King of the Franks this kind office, both for the esteem she always bore him and for the love she bore to Marcomire whose fortunes she saw link'd in the Chain of his Brothers. When she had read the letter, the Queen looking upon her with a languishing countenance: "Well now dear Sister, said she, whose misfortune have you most reason to condole, or Pharamond's who has liberty to speak and write all those pretty passions he feels for me? or mine who am constrained to declare all contrary to the real thoughts of my heart? "I know not whose fortune I should most complain of, replied the Princess, but I know that Pharamond is him I pity most, for if your felicity were at his disposal as his in yours, you would be quickly happy. "Whatever kind of love Pharamond had for me, answered the Queen, I am well assured he would do nothing for me either contrary to his honour or against his duty, and I believe he would never desire that thing of me that might eclipse a glory more dear to me than my repose. But in fine dear Sister, said Albisinda, may not I assume the boldness to enquire what your intentions are? To perform my duty even to death, replied the beautiful Rosamond, and to dye without regret when I have convinced the world my duty was dearer to me than my life. "But Sister, said the Princess, may you not be deceived in the judgment you make of this duty, could you believe your self very criminal if you prescribed it rules a little less severe? "There may be as you say much of error, replied the Queen, but those errors are in the general opinion and not in my particular judgment, and as it is this general opinion which creates a good or a scandalous reputation, or that gives or takes away our good name in this world; It is to that we very often ought to sacrifice both our repose and fortune. "But if, said the Princess, fortune should be more favourable to your publick designs than to your particular desires, and that by the hands of so many valiant men, as you have armed against the life of Pharamond, this illustrious Hero should most unfortunately fall, what course would you then take? "I should resolve then, replied the Queen a great deal better and with more ease than now I can, and having acquitted my self from what was due to my vows, to my father's ashes, to my brother's death and the ashes of Vindimir, I would openly pay to those of Pharamond what I am not permitted to give him during life, and I should not fear the whole worlds knowing my resentments after I had made known to the same world the glorious victory I had obtained over my self.

The sad Rosamond in this manner explained her self to her dear Albisinda, and the fair Suevian Princess for a divertisement to her pensive thoughts, shewed her a letter which she had lately received from Marcomire, when suddenly they were advertised that King Gondioch with Prince Gondemar his brother were at the closet dore. Gondioch's high quality did not permit the Queen to dismiss him, as if she could have fram'd any excuse she would have done with all her heart, yet she received him after such a manner as did clearly at first denote the small satisfaction he was like to receive by this visit, and the Princess Albisinda, though she could neither sleight nor contemn Gondemar, in whom she saw all those rich qualities which might purchase esteem, having her Soul at that time filled with the perfect Idea of Marcomire, whom she loved much more than him, gave him but a cold welcome. The two Brothers were no ways satisfied with this reception; but as they were naturally Matters of much confidence, they would not take a repulse, but while the Brother accosted the Princess, the King of the Burgundians approach'd the Queen; "I know not, Madam, said she, if I have been so unfortunate to displease you to day, by some words which a “ just repentment made me speak to Constance before you; but besides, that I am not (as “ I told him) the Romans, the design that brought him hither was to little grateful, that “ it was not in my power to explain my self with so much mildness and civility as I could “ have desired, and should have done upon any other occasion. “ Had you given me there“ by any distaste, (replied the Queen with a great deal of coldness) you would not have “ thought your self the more unfortunate for that; for you know full well, this is not the “ first time that you have done it, without esteeming your self a jot the more miserable; “ yet if you had proceeded in another manner with a personage of the Rank and Merit of “ Constance, you had not merited blame; and if any man had done as you did, over whom “ I might have pretended any authority, I should quickly have made him know, how lit“ tle such proceedings were grateful to me. “ For your power, (replied the King of the “ Burgundians) you do me a cruel piece of injustice, if you can believe there is any person “ in the world, over whom you have more. “ I well remember, when I was under your “ power (replied the Queen) but could never perceive any power I had upon you: if I “ had I should have doubtlessly made use thereof for my deliverance from those misfortunes

 “ which I suffered in a contrary condition to liberty. “ Ah Madam, said Gondioch, do you “ not remember the promise you made the King your father to pardon all past injuries, and “ that you would never more remember those crimes which love forced me to commit. “ I “ have promised him things more difficult, replied the Queen, and you can witness how “ truly I have performed them: and though in obedience to him I have not nourished a re“ sentment for those injuries you did me, you your self too often mind me of them to let “ me ever forget them. “ And what would you do then (answered Gondioch with indif-“ cretion enough) if Gondioch had murder'd the Prince your Brother, and caus'd the King
 “ your father's death: You have been the cause of both, briskly replied the Queen, and since “ you force me to tell you of it so often, it is only you whom I can reasonably accuse for all “ those misfortunes: but I could heartily wish that Theobald had lost his life by the hand of “ Gondioch, for then I should act without contradiction against a man who hath ever wil“ fully perplexed me, what now I act with regret against him who hath offended me through “ the effect of my own misfortunes. “ Pharamond is very happy Madam, replied Gondi- “ och (somewhat moved with her answer) yet I believe that he might expect his justification ra“ ther from the lips of any other person than yours. “ It is not more strange, answer'd the “ fair Queen, to see him justified by those he hath offended, than to see him accused by those “ he hath so friendly and faithfully served; and I have not more reason happily to hate him “ for the injuries he has done me, than you to love him for the good offices he hath rendred “ you. “ This is not the first time Madam, said Gondioch, that you have recalled to my “ memory the obligations I might have to the first actions of Pharamond, but that which “ might be at one time just when we were both criminals to you, possibly ceases to be so now
 “ that I am received of your party, and have taken up Arms to revenge you of your enemy
 “ at the dear price of my life and blood. “ It was neither your blood nor your life that I “ would have employ'd, replied Rosamond, and as I cannot with reason accuse this enemy
 “ but of those harms he did us in combating for your interest, since those are the only crimes
 “ he wilfully committed, I will again inform you of what I have so often told you, I should “ have call'd any other assistance rather than yours, and that certainly I ought not to com“ mit the revenge I desir'd of Pharamond to a man of all the world the most oblig'd unto “ him. “ If I had been oblig'd by his former Actions, replied Gondioch, his last have been “ so vexatious and mischievous as ought to leave no place in my memory for his first, and “ that which he acted for my Liberty or in the defence of my Crown, was little considerable “ if he must deprive me of Rosamond. “ Alas! for Rosamond (said the Queen with an in“ ward smile yet full of fierceness) Pharamond is not he you ought to accuse for depriving you
 “ of her, for if Pharamond had never been, Rosamond had never been the Wife of Gondioch.
 “ You might have happily consider'd (answered the Burgundian King) that you have receiv“ ed others to the honour of serving you as little worthy as my self: and peradventure you “ might have yielded to time and reason these resentments you have now against me, which “ you can only attribute to the excess of an affection I had for you. “ If your love explains it “ self in this manner, said the Queen, you ought not to admire that it is not understood, or “ rather you ought not to find it strange (since it assumes the shape of hatred) that there is “ no better admision given to it than what is usually given to hatred. “ I must confess (an“ swered Gondioch very soverely) that I am of all men the most unfortunate, and I even ac“ knowledge that I may have merited part of my misfortunes: but I hope that my repen“ tance and those opportunities which may offer themselves in your service, may work such

“who were permitted to enter into your quarrel upon those amorous hopes you no ways opposed. Whilst Gondioch entertained her with such like discourtesies, the Queen (who endured this partly with no small trouble) used a kind of violence to her self to hinder a larger discovery of her disaffection to him, and Gondemar who together with Albisinda had lent an ear to part of the discourse, although he endeavoured to have engaged the Princess to a more particular converse with himself, taking the words from her mouth, How happy is Theodora Madam, said he, that Ericlea is not now here, and how much joy would Ericlea have to see the part of Theodora so ill managed? It would not be the first time, replied Albisinda, that she hath had this pleasure: But as Ericlea thinks not at present of us and that Gondemar ought only to nourish a repentance for the deceit he used under the name of Theodora: He doth ill to awaken the memory of an adventure which afforded me only displeasure. “Ah Madam, said Gondemar, how willingly could I accuse you for want of sincerity durst I presume it, and as there is small likelihood that Ericlea thinks no more of you, how much less is there that his love was ever the cause of your grief and displeasure. “What else could it have caused (replied the Princess with a fierceness no ways suitable to her nature) was it joy for those great felicities I might then expect? do you believe the present conjunctures so favourable to make me hope a happiness from the affections of Pharamond's Brother? “If you believe, said Gondemar, that there is little happiness or small advantage for you in Marcomire's affections, Gondemar will never labour to make you forfeit the opinion: but as you have heretofore permitted Theodora to be jealous of Ericlea's happiness, you cannot find it strange that more than ever she should now fear it, and that with grief she remembers those advantages her Rival had once over her. “I confess, replied the Princess, that I did dearly love Ericlea, nor could Theodora complain of my want of affection for her, but they both ceasing to be the persons they appeared, they ought not to be astonish'd at the change of my kindness: And as Marcomire has reason to believe that the cheat he hath put upon me hath exasperated me against him, Gondemar might reasonably expect that the resentment I had for his might have lasted as long as my life, if by some actions which have sensibly obliged me he had not made me lose part of my anger, “Ah Madam (said the Prince with a cheerful aspect) tell me in the name of the Gods what action I have performed in my whole life that could ever possibly please you, and let me learn by this knowledge that I am not so much unfortunate as I always believed my self. “You ought not to doubt, replied the Princess, but that you highly obliged me both by the discovery of Marcomire's deceit and your own, and by withdrawing me from an error which might have engaged me to have committed great crimes, and in fine exposed me to no small grief and vexation: And moreover I willingly acknowledge that I hold my self indebted to you for having as well concealed the secret of Marcomire as your own from all the world, and so spared my modesty that confusion which these adventures would have cast upon it had they been noised. “I well perceive (said Gondemar unto her with a sigh) that you were highly pleased, that I did not expose Marcomire to those perils which menaced him, had he been known so near you: but on that side he had nothing to fear, for I could not without too much baseness revenge my self of him by ways so unworthy of my courage: And for what concerned you Madam, you may well believe that I had rather forfeit a thousand lives than be deficient in the least consideration I ought to have had. “You may judge replied the Princess, that it was not the interest of Marcomire that obliged me to you, since you so well know that he departed from us as soon as you, and that no danger could threaten his life in a place where he made no stay. But however it was your proceedings gave me such an esteem for you; as did mitigate my resentments, and I should testify it as much as was possible for me, if you had no other thoughts for me than what might permit me to do it. The Prince was about making a reply, when the Queen of the Cimbrians (who could not longer in the humour she was in endure a parley with Gondioch) entreated Albisinda not to part the society any longer: And a few minutes after Ardaric and Godegesile being entred the Closet, and after them the fair Queen of the Turingiens followed by the Prince of Persia, by Martian, the King of the Basternes and by the Ladies belonging to the three Princesses the converse became general, and neither Gondioch nor Gondemar had opportunity to prosecute the discourse they had begun. Gondioch was therewith much less displeas'd than his Brother, for he met so much rigour in every word of Rosamond's, that had he not been accustomed to the like, the ill success of this visit might have been able to have made him desist in his suit. He could not nevertheless abstain from making known to the Company some part of his perplexity, and for that he knew the Prince of Persia, the King of the A-lains and the King of the Basternes were newly returned from accompanying Constance through the Camp, he turned towards Godegesile for whom he had less unkindness than for the rest, because there was more conformity in their dispositions, and towards Briomer whom he loved beyond all others because of the hatred he professed to Pharamond: "Do you not think, said he to them, that the Prince of Persa, the King of the Milans and the King of the Easternes have well performed to day their Complement to Constance, and that for Princes who delighted in War they could possibly have done honour to a man that came for peace?" It seems to me (replied Varancz without expecting Godegefile's answer) that the design which brought Constance into the Camp was neither disobliging nor injurious to any of us, and whatever intention he might have, provided it was no way contrary to the service and interest of the Queen, nothing could prohibit me from rendering to his Merit what is due to all persons that are lovers of virtue. This reason may be of weight to you, replied Gondioch, and besides that you may possibly be a friend to Constance, you have no difference with the Romans, but for Aidaric who is no more their friend than I and who hath had some contests with Constance in Spain, I know not what reasons could oblige him to such a Ceremony. Every one acts according to his own inclination, replied Arderic, and though I was vanquish'd by Constance as you were by Pharamond in Germany; I confess I have preferred as much esteem for my Conquerour as you have hatred for yours: and I am scarce satisfied that your proceedings are more brave and generous than mine. If Pharamond were only odious to me for the advantage which fortune gave him over me in the war (answered the King of the Burgundians) I should have no more hatred for him than you for Constance, but 'tis known full well that it was not the event of war which gave birth to our enmity: For my part, replied Arderic, I have neither known in war nor in peace any thing by Constance which hath not obliged me to esteem him, and the interest of nations ought not to hinder our reverence to Virtue. One may respect and esteem virtue, said King Godegefile, without loving the person that is virtuous, and I must confess that be of all my Rivals in whom I perceive most of virtue and merit is the most odious to me. He may be most formidable to you (said the fair Queen of the Turingiens) but it is very rarely that the effect of virtue attracts hatred. I confess (replied the King of the Herules) that fear will be the first effect, and that this passion may in a little time outstrip my hatred in my soul, but hatred must infallibly follow it at the heels, and he of my Rivals whom I have most cause to fear will doubtlessly be the man I shall have most reason to hate. This resentment is very natural, said Prince Gondemar, and if it is not the most praise worthy it is at least the most pardonable. If I could believe, said young Humbert, that my Rival would not precede me in happiness as well as merit, his deserts instead of causing hatred would cause in me more love: but as it is very difficult to acknowledge our selves inferior to any without believing our selves the more unfortunate of the two, it is almost impossible but that which gives us a belief of his happiness beyond us, should not likewise create an aversion rather than an amity for him. It is very true, added the Queen of the Cimbrians, that it is not in these occasions which men practise most modestly, for except in love it self it is in the knowledge of our selves that we are least just and equitable. There are some Persons of such a resplendent merit (said the charming Princess of the Sueves) that it is very difficult to flatter our selves so much as not to know the advantage they have over us. That may happen, said Martian, between a low desert and a very transcending merit, but when the disproportion is not so great, we do not ordinarily do our selves orermuch justice. If the complaisance and partiality we have for our selves, replied the fair Amalazontha, renders us unjust in the judgement we make of our own deserts, I likewise believe that in the judgment of others merits, passion as frequently presides as reason; and that we oft discern more or less merit in persons according to the affection or aversion we have for them. That which you say may be a great truth Madam, said Briomer unto her, for I confess that the hatred I bear to Pharamond doth not only blind my eyes to all those brave qualities which others observe in his person, but also represents them to my apprehension either truly as they are, or else as I look upon them with prejudice as defects and crimes that deserve my hatred, and I never yet knew either by sight or report, any thing by him which did not rather augment my antipathy than diminish it. Rosamond dur'd not reply to this discourse of the fierce Briomer as she could have wished, but she wink'd upon the Princess Albisinda who might much better do it than her self, and who loved not Briomer since the imprisonment of Marcomire, and who taking hold of his words with a pleasing grace, I confess Briomer, said she to him, that this opinion is perfectly your own, and that there is no person here present in whom we can find such as you have furnished us withal as to the point in hand, but though we should be just to our enemies as well as friends at least in our principles, I fear there is no such justice in yours: However will you not acknowledge that this hatred which might blind you, in the judgement you make of the Grandeur, courage, valour and other qualities of Pharamond doth not hinder you from the knowledge of his clemency to the vanquish'd, nor from finding a kind of sweetness in the civil treatment and entertainment he gave you when you were his prisoner, or if you were not thereof sensible, would you not rather have it attributed to some natural cause, than to hatred which came by accident? I have not better interpreted that actions of Pharamond's, than others; nor had I need to make use of my hatred, to know that his civil usage was rather an effect of his love to the Queen, than of his own generosity. In this manner, one may blast all generous actions, (replied the fair Princess, with a scornful smile) but very few persons will be of this opinion, and I could easily convince you, were we permitted to speak to the advantage of our enemies. As I am not very eloquent, (said Briomer to her) and that I had need of a good Second to maintain a bad opinion: I beseech you, Madam, to stay till the King your Father be present, and not to be displeas'd, if I implore his assistance. You have small need of his assistance, (said Queen Rosamond unto him) in a place where your party is sufficiently strong; and you will give me no great satisfaction in finding out such a Second against my Sister. Briomer, to this discourse of the Queen, made no reply, but gave sufficient evidence by his behaviour, and more furious looks to that fair company, that the choleric and implacable hatred which reigned in his heart, would be as durable as his life; and soon after, the meat being brought into the Hall for the Queen and Princesses Supper, who for the most part did eat together, the Princes retired, and left them to their liberty.

After Supper they re-entred the Closet, and spent therein some small time more together, ere they retired; but the presence of Amalazontha did not permit the Queen of the Cimbrians, and the Princess of the Sueves to entertain themselves on that subject which was most pleasing to them. It was not for want of affection for this fair Queen, nor that they would not willingly have given her a place in that Amity, which did so strictly bind them, as well in regard of those many fair and amiable qualities, that rendred her most worthy; as because she had often with much earnestness requested that favour. They likewise lived with her, with marks of affection little different from those they had for each other, and the title of Sister which they had always used to each other, notwithstanding the difference, which by the King of the Cimbrian's death, there was between her and Rosamond, was in common unto her with them, not only because the title of Brother and Sister is sufficiently common amongst Sovereign Princes, but because it seemed more conformable to the union they desired to preserve, during the whole course of their lives. But though Amalazontha was very dear unto them, both for the amiableness of her person, and the marks which she had given them of her friendship, there still remained a thing, concerning which, they reposed little confidence in her; and they had found so much the less appearance of calling her to this counsel with safety, as they perceived in her a greater vehemency in the prosecution of her Brother's revenge, and Pharamond's ruine, she hated the unfortunate man, without remembering that once she loved him equal to her life. The knowledge which she had given thereof, hindred them from explaining unto her the particular, and dear sentiments they had for the King of the Franks, and the Prince his Brother; but in all other affairs they used her with a most sincere and cordial affection, and loved her as a most dear, and amiable Sister. They had likewise with much regret observed, that her mind was assaulted with some sensible grief, or perplex'd with some other passion more violent; and as they well judged by themselves, it was very improbable for the loss of a Brother to cause all those disorders and distractions, which appeared in her Soul, they interest'd themselves with a great deal of tenderness in the unknown misfortune which produced this effect. It was certainly easie enough to read in Amalazontha's eyes, that her Soul was sick, and that her languishments proceeded from a cause more extraordinary than a natural grief, though the cause which made them languish, had not deprived them of their sweetness, but looking somewhat more dull, and wandering, it seemed as if part of their vivacity was covered with some cloud, but such a cloud, which by obscuring some part of their brightness, seemed rather to augment, than take away from those sweet and powerful charms which accompanied their beauty. Her complexion more beautiful than the fair Flowers of the Spring, suffered likewise some decay of its lustre, through the disturbances of her mind; and if at some times, by the effect of certain thoughts, in hostility with her repose, the vermilion of her cheeks was somewhat more than ordinarily heightened, it seemed that at other times they lost a part of those graces; and it was much to be feared, that if her illness continued, her health would be with much difficulty preserved. The language of Amalazontha did not a little contribute with her visage, to discover the state of her mind; and though she was Mistress of a happy wit, and natural readiness eloquently to express her self, and a good grace; there were certain times in which the distraction of her mind, and the slender attention she gave to what was said to her, caus'd her to return answers very different to those which she would have otherwise made, had her mind been less disturb'd, and she accompanied them often with

with sighs that issued from an obstructed breast, ere she could recollect her self to retain them.

Rosamond and Albifinda, though sufficiently employed in their own concerns, had observed nevertheless some part of that distraction, which plainly appeared in the person of their new and amiable friend, and although the memory of their proper misfortunes might with much likelihood have rendered them insensible of others miseries, yet had they with grief considered, that she was much more unhappy than they could have wish'd her. They were often inclined to ask her, what they were ignorant of, the cause of her afflictions: but as they loved her, and that their acquaintance was but of a few days, they thought that they could not with any civility, at that time satisfy their curiosity. But that very night, the Princess Albifinda, whose Soul was replenish'd with bounty, and whose nature easily compassionate the misfortunes of others, observing in her visage more than she had done before, all the signs of a mortal sadness, could not contain her desire, which sprang from a real affection; and clasping one of her fair hands between hers, and pressing it with an affectionate tenderness; Must you Madam, (said she) ——— But must you, (said Amalazontha, interrupting her first words) so soon forget the promise which you made me, to call me always by the name of Sister. "I'll do as you please, replied Albifinda, however it be difficult for me to use that liberty with so great Queens, though in obedience to your commands. "What though you are no Queen (said Rosamond unto her) there's none that doubt but that you ought to be one; and for me, you know full well, were I more your Sister, I could not love you more. "We had hopes, some time since, to be so by a double tie, (replied the Princess) and I do not yet despair, but that the Gods will work some miracle to confirm this alliance between us. "I should be displeas'd, (said the Queen of the Turingiens) not to be the third; and although I have the disadvantage to come last, you cannot believe, without doing me an injustice, that you have more of friendship for each other, than I have love for you both. "The assurance you give us, is too obliging, (said the Cimbrian Queen) embracing her, and I can ascertain you, as well for the Princess Albifinda, as for my self, that there is nothing more pleasing unto us in this world, than your friendship. "But, my dear Sister, (added the Suevian Princess) to prosecute the discourse which I began, and by you interrupted, think you that you do well to converse with persons already sad enough of themselves, and who are so, from grounds of sorrow sufficiently apparent to augment their afflictions by an addition of your own, or that you ought to have any thing in your Soul so cruel and tormenting, which our afflictions will not permit us to be sensible of, or for which we may not be able to afford you some consolation or other?

The fair Amalazontha sigh'd at Albifinda's discourse, and looking upon her with languishing eyes; "You may best, dear Sister, (said she) afford us consolation; for I know nothing so capable to comfort us in our afflictions, as the presence and conversation of those whom we most dearly love, but there is neither ease nor remedy for me; for unless I receive them from Heaven, or from death, I know not whence to expect them. "Oh! my dear Sister, (said Rosamond unto her) how much do you afflict me by this discourse? for though verily my heart be sufficiently oppress'd with the burthen of its own grief, the causes whereof are so many, happily beyond what all other persons have occasion to know, yet I feel them augmented by the knowledge of yours. I could not have believed, dear Sister, (said the Queen of the Turingiens) that these marks of my sadness ought to have surpris'd you; for having sustained a loss of the same nature with yours, and a loss too fresh in memory, for me to forget the Idea of the person for whom I mourn, it was not an easie thing for me to demonstrate more of cheerfulness in my countenance than you have already observed. We no ways doubted, (replied Albifinda) but that the loss of the King your Brother, must of necessity touch a disposition like yours, to the quick; and through that knowledge which experience hath rather given to us than you, of those great effects which such a loss can operate. *We do not in the least admire, to observe so much grief and affliction in you; I have griev'd, and do yet daily grieve for the like misfortune; and yet the Queen of the Cimbrians hath greater cause of affliction, which draws each day a river of tears from her fair eyes.* But you must give me leave to tell you, that it is not grief only we have observed in you, but that amidst your grief we have descried a trouble, and a disorder which is no ways natural to you, and such a disorder which grief alone is not accustomed to produce. The disconsolate Amalazontha blush'd at this discourse of the Princess, and for some few minutes kept silence, covering her face with her hand to obscure her shame; but soon after, taking hold of her last words; I know not, (said she to Albifinda) what this trouble and disorder is, you have so much observed, happily my disposition is naturally given to melancholy. "For your dispo-

"fiction (said the Queen of the Cimbrians) we know full well what it is, when your mind
 "is free, and at liberty; nor do we attribute to nature that which some accident might "have caused: but I fear that the Princess of the Sueves is a little too urgent, nor had she
 "been excusable, had she prest upon any other motive than the dear affection she bears you.
 "Oh fairest Queen, (said Albitinda, embracing her, and as it were excusing her self of the "fault she had committed) I humbly beg your pardon, and protest to you, that friendship
 "was the sole cause of my indiscretion. "You could not injure me, (said Amalazontha,
 "returning her back her kind embraces, and making her feel some tears which stole down her "cheeks when she laid them to hers) and instead of complaining, I must owe you a perpe"tual obligation for your being both so solicitous for my repose and quiet. So may I like"wise most sincerely protest, that if with this grief, the cause whereof you know, there is "any thing mix'd in my mind which I have not discovered, and that I dare not declare
 "to you as yet, it is neither through any diffidence, or ingratitude to your affection, but "through a respect which I have for you, and a fear to appear less worthy of your friend"ship, when my affliction shall be made known. For the rest it is not impossible, but "that which I most resent, and which is doubtlessly the cause of all that disorder you have "observed, may one day cease by a relief from Heaven, or those remedies I have sought
 "for, and if I am not happy enough to see the end, you shall be the sole persons of the "world to whom I will impart it, when through a larger knowledge of you, I may hope "that you will have more indulgency for my misfortune, than possibly you have as yet.
 She pronounced these words with so many signs of distraction, that her two friends were touched with pity; and the fair Queen of the Cimbrians folding her once more in her Arms,
 "Do not believe, my dear Sister, (said she) that a longer acquaintance, is either ne"cessary to imprint upon our Souls, all those tender impressions which may be formed to your "advantage, or to receive the knowledge of your griefs in that manner your heart can "desire; but since you have some reasons to conceal the secret, defer the participation
 "thereof, till such time as you shall judge us most capable to give you consolation, and be "assured (for I am acquainted with Albitinda's thoughts, as well as my own) that we "are as sensibly touched with your afflictions, as with our own misfortune. The Queen of the Turingiens hearkened to this protestation of Rosamond, with all acknowledgment and tenderness; and a while after, perceiving it began to grow late, and finding by the eyes of Rosamond, that she had need of some repose, Amalazontha and Albitinda retired to their Apartments in pursuit of sleep, but it was no ealie matter for them to find it; and if the Princess of the Sueves, whose disquiet was less tormenting than either of the others, had more rest to hope for, she had employments to hinder it, which did not permit her to go to Bed at her accustomed hour.

Being come to her Chamber, where she found Imbergida, and those other women which usually attended her to Bed, was about to undress her self, when Imbergida desired her to discourse a word or two she had to tell her in her Closet, and the Princess was so much the more willingly thereto dispos'd, in that she believed she had somewhat more to impart concerning Marcomire; Imbergida took the candle her self, for to hinder any other person from entering into the Closet with them. In going out of the Chamber, Imbergida shut behind her the door of a little Lobby they were to pass through, and when they were at the Closet door, the Princess saw it was shut, and that Imbergida had taken the key, that great wariness gave some suspicion to the Princess, and constrained her to look upon Imbergida, as if she would have asked her the cause; but Imbergida having opened the door, and entered the Closet without speaking to her; the Princess who followed her, was very much surpris'd by finding a man there, which Imbergida had enclosed. Her astonishment at this sight made her speechless, not knowing on whom to lay the blame of this encounter, retaining nevertheless towards Imbergida for her better security: but it augmented much more her amazement, when this man suddenly ran to her with open Arms, embraced her, and kissed her many times, she not having the power or force to hinder it. Those familiar actions deprived her of the suspicion she had had, that it was Marcomire, knowing well that the passion of the French Prince would not let him forfeit his respect; and whilst she repuls'd this Incognito, and was striving to force her self from his Arms, Imbergida held the candle so near his face, that notwithstanding the many years of his absence, which had caus'd some change in his favour, she gave her the means to know him for the Prince her Brother, the valiant Viridomar. At this sight her fright was dissipated, but her amazement redoubled, and both the one and the other soon after gave place to joy, which succeeded them upon so dear and desired a sight. As Viridomar and Albitin-da had two fair Souls, and all other inclinations good and virtuous, so had they bound themselves

elves from their tenderest years in a stronger chain of affection than that of blood, and there were few, or no examples extant in that time of a fraternal amity that might parallel theirs; so that Albifinda could not have seen an object so dear as this Brother, whom she had not seen for many years, and for whom the high actions he had performed since their separation augmented her esteem, without yielding her Soul a prey to joy, and receiving in this conjuncture, the most sweet and deep impressions that a real amity might make her sensible of; so that instead of rescuing her self from his Arms, as at first she endeavoured to do, she now bound him fast by her embraces, and returned his Careless with all kindness.

They spent much time in these acts of affection, without expressing themselves in any other manner. But in fine, the Prince as the least surpris'd, came the last to himself, and looking more nearly upon the Princess by the clear light of the taper, than before he had done. Oh my dear Sister, (said he) how much do I rejoice to see you in so good a condition, and to behold what an advantageous change in your person those years have wrought, which I have spent without seeing you. "I might say the same of you with more reason," (replied the Princess) and besides what I have observed in your person, I hope you "doubt not but that I have been sensibly touch'd, as I was obliged, with that fair reputation of Viridomar, which fame so loudly trumpets about the world. I have neither flattered you, (replied the Prince) nor have a design to be flattered by you. But howsoever it is, you see a Brother that hath always loved you equal to himself, and you ought to believe, that in him you shall always find all the affection of Viridomar, and all that of Vindimir, whom we have both lost since our separation. It is likewise only you, my dear Sister, that I come to search in this Camp; for in the state I am at present with the King my Father, whose humour you better know than my self, there is little of safety for me. "I verily believe, (said the Princess unto him) your life would be in no danger, although you "were discovered, but I much fear the King might detain you; and my joy to see you "is much mitigated, through the disquiet and fright I have for you. You likewise see, (answered Viridomar) that I give you this visit with a strange wariness, and at a particular hour: and since I entered this Camp, I have observed much more than a timorous person could possibly have done. It is not but that I might hope to make my peace with the King, had I any such desire; but because I cannot hope it, but upon such conditions that I can neither consent, nor submit to, I will expect, if it be possible, till time and reason have appeas'd his anger, and continue this liberty of following my own inclinations, as much as my duty can permit, since I cannot follow them as much as I desire. Oh! my dear Brother, (said the Princess) if at least, after the death of our eldest, you will still permit me to call you by that Title) is it possible, that having been as you were, design'd to the glory of possessing Rosamond, that is to say, to the greatest that ever mortal could aspire to, you could possibly consent to renounce her, or rather renounce her without dying. As I have never seen Rosamond, (replied the Prince) you ought not to admire, that I was smitten with a beauty, not perhaps inferiour to hers; and as I desire to draw you to my party, I hope, you will cease, before we separate, to condemn me, or at least to oppose me, if it be true, that you still really love me. I love you, (said the Princess) much more than I am able to express, and the amazement I discovered, was rather an effect, than a default of my affection, so that you ought not to question my being always of your party; and although I am not ignorant of the King's humour, nor very bold, and valiant by nature, I will assure you, dear Brother, that I shall be much more hardy in promoting your interests, than in the prosecution of my own, and that there can be nothing in the world shall ever make me forsake them. This is all I dare say to you in the ignorance I am, and to say more, you know I ought to be instructed both in your affairs, and intentions. You shall be, (said the Prince) when you please, and I will render you not only a faithful account of my affairs, and present intentions, but likewise of every thing that hath befalln me since our separation, and that will be to inform you almost of every accident of my life. I would begin the relation without longer deferring it, not being well assured to find again the like conveniency, did I not fear to make you thereby lose too many hours of sleep: but we shall endeavour—— No my dear Brother, (said the Princess interrupting him) fear not to make me lose my sleep, for I have often lost it upon occasions of much less concernment; and when people are at war, as we are at present, they should accustom themselves to more labour, and less rest. Besides, I can lie as long to-morrow morning as I please; nor can I spend the night more to my content, than in seeing and hearing you. I consent (said the Prince) to your desire, and so much the more willingly, because I can only have at nights the happiness to see you, and that a days I must either remain at a distance from the Camp, or lie concealed, I have heard by some particular friends to whom I must retire, before the Sun gives eyes to the world, with whom I have left my

Horses and two Esquires, that are at present all my Attendants. Do you also make some excuse or other to your Virgins, that they may not suspect the long stay you are to make in your Closet, where I came without being seen of any but Imbergida, who conducted me up the little Stair-case, which leads up to the Lobby, by which I may in like manner with liberty return, having the Word of this nights Watch, whereby I can pass as before I did, without being stopped by the Sentinels. Upon this, Imbergida went into the Chamber, where she informed the Virgins, that the Princefs would spend that whole night in writing, and that she had commanded them to go to Bed, retaining only two persons near her, in whom she well knew that she might confide.

In the interim, the Prince and Princefs seated themselves very close together, and after they had often repeated those Careffes they had us'd towards each other when first they met, and accompanied them with all those words of endearment, as might witness a real affection: Albisinda seeing the Prince ready to begin the relation she desired of him, stopped him before he opened his mouth; "Dear Brother, (said she) do not believe, that "you shall slightly acquit your self of the relation I expect from you, for I desire you "to impart to me every thing to the very least of your thoughts, and smallest circumstances. I will perform your desire, (replied the Prince) at least in such things that will most concern your curiosity, and that are more suitable than others to your inclinations: as for the unprofitable particulars of my Travels, and the Wars which I have been in, you will not think amiss if I pass them succinctly over, that I may come to those passages more worthy your attention: it is likewise on those I shall be obliged to be the more prolix, to inform you both of the state of my mind, and that of my fortune; and I shall request from you the like favour, when the entire confidence that I shall have reposed in you, has obliged you to make nothing a secret to me. These words caused the Princefs to blush, who gathered from thence, that the Prince had some knowledge of her affairs, but this thought afforded her at the same time some content, in assuring her, that this knowledge (if he had any) had not wrought in his mind any evil effects against her, and that he was not less satisfied in her, than happily he would have been, if he had known nothing of what had befallen her; but the reflection she was about to make upon the whole matter, was interrupted by the Prince his discourse, who began in this manner.

The History of Viridomar.

Although I am to recount to you every important Action of my life, I am nevertheless dispensed with, in much that I should relate to another person, of the nobleness of my Birth, and the beginnings of my life, through the perfect knowledge you have thereof, as well as I. You know in what manner I was educated with Prince Vindimir my elder Brother, and the hopes which were nourished from my tender years, to see those cares which were then taken of my education, prosper with a future success. As for those virtues, to which they endeavoured to form my mind, they were implanted easily enough: and for the noble exercises of the body, I did not only render my self therein sufficiently knowing and active, not to shame my Masters; but I was even very often constrained to conceal before the King, a great part of that which I knew, who with displeasure took notice that I surpassed my elder Brother, towards whom his affections were ever more strongly inclined, than towards us; although we may say amongst our selves, dear Sister, without offence to his memory, that neither in the advantages of body or mind, we were perhaps his inferiours. You likewise know, that to make me serve my Apprentiship in Arms, for which he perceived I had a great inclination, joyned with a body vigorous, and lusty beyond my age; in the seventeenth year thereof he sent me to the Wars, under the command of our Brother, and of some old Captains he had given him to assist his youth, by the grave experience he had of that Art: that in the Land of the Semmons, and Galucons, against whom, at that time we waged war, he fought many Battels, in the which, young as I was, I acquired some reputation; and that before my nineteenth year, I commanded in chief at many Battels, and at the storming of some Towns, where I did exploits proportionable to my age, where by the assistance of my courage and fortune, I had made my self enough remarkable, to acquire some name amongst the men of war, and to have given them an opinion of me much greater perhaps, than they ought to have conceived. Nor can you be ignorant, how at my return to the King, this report spread it self to my advantage, advantage, though whatever I had purchas'd to make my self sufficiently beloved in the Court did not produce all those good effects which I could have desired, out of that particular aversion which the King naturally had against all those actions which might in any way eclipse the glory of Vindimir. This was nevertheless solely ingrafted in the King's mind, for in Vindimir himself I never could perceive any thing unworthy of his courage, for he always witness'd esteem and friendship enough to make me respect his memory all the days of my life. You have not forgot all that which pass'd in our Court, where were to be seen a thousand divertisements and publick spectacles of gallantry, after the King had concluded a peace with his neighbours: and you must needs remember the succeeding passages when the King our father had made an alliance with the King of the Cimbrians, and that upon the promise which had pass'd interchangeably between them to celebrate a double marriage of Vindimir with the Princess Rosamond, and of Prince Theobald with you; the King sent Prince Vindimir to the Court of the Cimbrian King to see there the fair Princess for whom he was design'd, whose beauty though then in the very cradle of her age, was loudly voiced through all Europe. Vindimir hereupon went for Bohemiz with a magnificent equipage, and I had willingly accompanied him if the King my father would have consented, but for that reason I before spoke of he would not suffer me, but made me remain near his person, where I caus'd him contrary to my intention to entertain a greater jealousy of me than he ever cherish'd for the interest of Vindimir, which oblig'd me to absent my self from him a while after, when I undertook those travels from which I did not return to him till he sent for me back after the death of Vindimir, at what time he was marching with his Army against the Franks: You know as much as was publick of the cause of my departure, for at that time I should scarce have trusted those particulars to your tender years as now I dare, since likewise by the change of the condition of some interest'd persons, I am less oblig'd to silence by my discretion, which then prohibited the publication thereof.

You know that we had lost the Queen our mother long before that, and that the King had continued many years a Widower, not only without dreaming of marriage but even without giving any cause to believe he would ever think of it during his life: he was nevertheless of a very amorous complexion although of a nature very severe and furious, and one that often cherish'd inclinations no ways tending to marriage: but whilst that Vindimir was making love to Rosamond, and that by the absence of his Son who was the chiefest object of all his thoughts he permitted them to wander upon others who had power to attract them, he became really and violently amorous of the fair Artemira who then rendred our Court happy by having made it her abode ever since the death of the Prince of the Dardanes her husband, who for our interests had lost his life in those wars we had had against the Scythians. Although a Widow she was not above twenty years indebted to time, she was fair, and had a great deal of wit, and was really very desirable: Love and these perfections so enflamed the King that he buried all things in oblivion only to think of her, and that he might please her he became much more gallant than he had been in all his life. He was not old, for as you know he numbers not yet above fifty years: He had a majestic deportment and his vigour as entire as at the age of twenty five, so that he no ways doubted to make himself be loved by a fair Person, and he was unmindful of nothing that might make him thrive in his design. He had the happiness of seeing Artemira every day, and was thereby in fine so enflamed with her beauty, that knowing she had too much virtue to permit a love that was contrary to it, and finding her birth and quality did permit him to marry her without offence to himself, without doubt he would have espous'd her could he have gain'd her affection. I likewise believe that by the advantage she might receive in becoming Queen of the Sueves after she had been wife to a Prince much inferiour to him, it had not been difficult for him to have dispos'd her to love maugre the disproportions of their ages if fortune had not made use of me (against my intention) to oppose an invincible obstacle to the King's affection. I visit'd Artemira very often, and as she was the fairest Lady of the Court and the person whose conversation was most grateful and all her parts most amiable, I delight-ed much more in hers than in the company of any other, and was always more complementary and courtly to her. I likewise sometimes let fall words and discourses which favour'd of gallantry, and I rendred her services and complacencies that might somewhat exceed the common rate of ordinary civilities, but I perform'd all this without any real ardour or amorous reflection, and I had so much the less design of engaging my fancy as the humour she was of, and the condition of her state convinc'd me she could not have other thoughts than of marriage, from which mine were naturally very distant. I know not whether she perswaded her self the contrary, and whether she really believed I had an affection for her, or whether fortune had in this manner design'd it to cross the King's intention: But however it was at the same time the King began to testify his love for her, she let me know by several signs that I was not indifferent to her fancy, and even after the King had rendered himself very assiduous in her service, and made manifest to all the Court the reality of his affection for her, and made her believe her self that he might have a design to marry her, she made the affection she had for me more and more appear: Although I had not much of affection for her I acknowledge that I perceived hers without any aversion not having my heart otherwise engaged, I should not have acted the part of a cruel person to a Lady so fair and amiable, if she had not endeavoured to have engaged and confined me to a place I naturally hated, and of which in the age I was I could not possibly endure so much as the sole mentioning. On the other side, as all the world condemned the design which the King seemed to have to remarry at that age, having an offspring like his that might well merit his entire affections, which in all likelihood would be then distributed to the children of the second bed, so had we great reason to fear, and you your self my dear Sister though younger by four years than now you are was very much allarm'd thereat, and I was no ways displeas'd that he found in his design some difficulties sufficient to make him lay it aside. It is nevertheless certain that I did not thereto contribute, and that I only gave fortune leave to act what it seem'd she intended to do for us without opposing her, and though in the general judgement of the world the King did us some injustice, through the respect I had for him, I would do nothing to offend him. I could not abstain nevertheless from speaking of his love to Artemira when fit occasions presented themselves, and she always reply'd like a person prepossessed with those more favourable resentments she had for me than for the King. As she was very reserved and had much of modesty, she continued a long time without clearly explaining her self, and as I had no design for her, although I had no aversion perceiving she much favoured me, I did not perform all which I might have done to oblige her: but being one day with her and others in her garden, and walking with her in an Alley where I usher'd her along, she let fall by accident a nosegay she had in her hands I took it up with great diligence and restored it her with a behaviour full of respect, and seeing that she returned me thanks for the pains I had taken in expressions full of civility and humility, which seem'd more than ordinary. You ought not to have said so much, said I unto her, had I render'd you some service of great importance, for this return appears to me as much as you could have done had I ventur'd my life in your service. The service, reply'd Artemira, should be as much considerable from the person that renders it as from it self, and however light in it self, it must be of value when it is received from Prince Viridomar. Oh Madam it is too much, said I unto her, and methinks you should by no means deal in this manner by me: for though you have done it in time past (added I smiling to my self) you ought to change your manner of converse now with a person that is suddenly to look upon you with the respect that he owes to his Queen and mother in Law. Artemira blush'd at these words though I utter'd them with a smile, when closing my hand in hers with a sigh, Assure your self, said she, that Artemira will never be a stepmother to Prince Viridomar, and that though that honour should be offer'd her she hath such inclinations for him as would never permit her to accept it. What you assert (said I somewhat touch'd with her discourse and behaviour) is too generous and too obliging for us, and Vindimir, Albisinda and I should be too ungrateful should we not make an eternal acknowledgment thereof. Neither Prince Vindimir, reply'd Artemira, nor the Princess Albisinda have any part in those thoughts which I have made known to you, and whatever respect I owe them or that really I have for them, I cannot find in my heart so much for them which obliges me to refuse the Crown of Suevia, if it were offer'd me. I must have alone then, said I, an obligation which I would have shared to others, and therefore alone must I have that resentment of your kindness which you prohibit all the rest of our family to acknowledge. I know not what resentment you have (added the fair Artemira with a sigh) but I must really protest to you that if I were oblig'd to love any of your house, it should not be the King your father. You'd love perhaps the Prince my Brother, said I, and I confess he might have much more reason than my father to hope so good a fortune. Oblige me no farther to enlarge my self, said Artemira, for I sensibly perceive that I have express'd my self plainly already. She utter'd these words with a blush that covered all her Cheeks with marks of bashfulness which gave me a secret torment for the present, I continued nevertheless my discourse, and if it were not amorous it was at least very obliging, and such as she had no reason to complain of: but as she would declare her self no farther thinking she had declar'd her self too much already, she turn'd her self towards the persons that followed us without giving me time to reply: and the King a while after arriving, all that day entertain'd her himself with his amours. I began to discern from that day that he had conceived a great jealousy of me, and he gave me a look in approaching her sufficiently crabbed to raise in me a shrewd suspicion of it: and as he had received but little satisfaction from the converse he then had with Artemira, he looked at night upon me with an eye so furious as made me discern in his face a great part of what he had in his heart against me.

The day following his ill humour augmented, not only because I daily visited Artemira, or that his flatterers which were complaisant to his passion, had assured him that I was in no small esteem with her, and made him observe some passages which might convince him of the verity of his suspicion: but because in the discourses he had held with Artemira he could not obtain from telling him a part thereof, who every time the King spoke of me, as he did frequently, and almost every day to discover her affections for me, answered him in words and behaviour sufficiently passionate to confirm his suspicion: and one day both of them growing hot upon this subject, the unawares told him, that if all he believed were a real truth, he could have no reason to be astonished at it, and that it was no miracle for a person of her years to cast her eyes upon so high a merit as that of Viridomar. These words of Artemira, together with those proofs he fancied to have of her inclinations, did most furiously augment his Jealousie; which grew in time so violent that he could not hinder it from breaking forth: And having one night reproach'd me with his eyes sparkling with anger, for the impudence I assumed to cross his inclinations, he commanded me, upon pain of his highest displeasure, never to visit Artemira more. I promised, though not without reluctance, to obey him, having really resentments of esteem, of acknowledgments, nay even of tenderness for Artemira, although they were not grown to the full stature of love; and I obeyed him also by ceasing that day to visit Artemira, or searching occasions to see her: But on the other side it was true I did not much shun her, and as I went every where, and Artemira frequenting often those places where she might meet me, as either in your Lodgings or in the apartments of those Court-Ladies I most visited, so we met very often; and every where Artemira gave me as much proof of her affection as her modesty could permit her: and through acknowledgements which I had of, and a natural disposition not to hate so beautiful a person, I did always without incivility receive them, though not with so much of ardour as Artemira could have desired. The King endured for some days these kind of interviews, during which time he could not accuse me of affectation in searching the occasions to see her: But a circumstance which then fell out, as you Sister may well remember, spoild all, and quite ruin'd me in the Kings apprehension. You have not surely forgot how at the marriage of Almeric, him who of all the Sueves the King most loved, and who after he had in battel lost his life by the hand of Pharamond, the King to honour him, commanded amongst other magnificences certain Jufts and Turnaments, and that each Cavalier of the Court should break a lance in the great Piazza of Stragone where the King then was: and as I prepared my self like others for the Action, giving the day before a visit to Almeric's sister, Artemira arriv'd, who, having been let blood the day precedent, held her Arm in a very fair Scarf, the fancy and beauty whereof all the company praised, and every one delivering their opinions, and I mine amongst the rest. Haldan who was there present and had for Artemira much affection, undertaking to speak; In truth Madam, said he, methinks you have very little need to wear this Scarf, and that the best use you could employ it to, were to favour some person of merit with it on whom you would confer the honour of being your Knight to morrow at the turnaments: Haldan, who by reason of his own merit and the honour which he derived from the blood Royal of the Sueves might take any thing upon him, might the better hold this discourse with Artemira, and with so much the greater confidence, for as much as you well know, Sister, at such times Ladies do not only make little scruple to confer such favours, but also often bestow them and of themselves send them to those persons they chuse for their Knight that day. So Artemira without studying in the least upon his proposal, I should willingly follow your advice (said she with a sad and languishing accent) if I believed the person on whom I should confer it would accept of being my Champion; but as I am not sufficiently happy to hope it, and that I may not for his interest desire it, I believe that I shall both keep my scarf and remain without a Champion. If I had esteemed Artemira much less than I esteemed her, or had not been so sensible as I was of my obligations to her, these words would have in honour constrained me to make her a reply, and let her know, that all which I had to fear from the King's anger could not deter me from rendring what I owed to the great honour she had favoured me with: and thus shutting my eyes to all other respects, that I might the better acquit my self of this duty, "I do not believe Madam, said I unto her, that there is a person in the world, who, in to morrows action and all the actions of his life, would not glory in the honour of being your Champion, and might I know the person you intended to honour with this favour, I dare assure you on his behalf that no consideration whatever could deter him from receiving it with a great deal of respect." "If it be so, replied Artemira, you are in danger your self to be charged with this trouble, for after an offer so generous of Prince Viridomar, I affect glory too much to “cast my eyes upon a meaner person than himself. She said no more, but began to direct her discourse to another subject, that that might be no more spoken of. But the next morning ere I was ready, one of her Pages entred my Chamber, with the Scarf and a Note, the contents whereof ran thus.

Artemira to Prince Viridomar.

IT is too much honour for me to have this day Prince Viridomar for my Champion, to let me omit the renewing to his memory that kind offer he made me; but if there be any danger in this action, I had much rather renounce the glory, which I hope from thence, than expose him to it, and he may keep the Scarf as a testimony of the esteem I have for him, without wearing it to his peril in publick.

These words, by which it appeared, that Artemira would have me recal the offer I had made her, more forcibly confirm'd me in the design I had to acquit my self bravely of it; and though I could not doubt, but this action would expose me to the King's severest anger, I did believe it unworthy of a Knight, if through fear or any other consideration, I had not rendred to a person of that merit, and quality as Artemira, what I owed to this great mark of her esteem, and thence taking a resolution without weighing it, I thus answered her short Letter.

The Prince Viridomar to the Princess Artemira.

Were the occasion more perilous than it is, I would be this day, since she hath honoured me with that favour, the Princess Artemira's Champion, and I should be too happy, if my fortune would permit me to be so all the days of my life.

You may easily, dear Sister, call to mind that I executed accordingly my promise, and that I wore the Scarf at the Tournament, appearing there as her Knight, and that none of my performances did any dishonour to the Scarf of Artemira. The King who had seen her wear it two days together, and presently knew it, was inflamed with so violent a rage against me, that not being able longer to dissemble it, he withdrew himself from the window where he was a Spectator of the Sports, and having evidenced his anger by all the marks of a deep resentment, to all those that were about him; no sooner did he see me at night, but casting a look full of indignation upon me; “I saw your fine Scarf, said he, and you have willfully this day exposed your self to all my hatred, by being Artemira's Champion. “Sir, said I, if you have informed your self of the truth, you will thereby easily perceive, that I did not seek out this occasion to displeasè you; and you know well, that I could not with good manners refuse it. “This good manners, replied the King, ought to be much less considerable, than the respect you owe to my orders; but since you have so ill observed that I gave you, never to see Artemira more, I now prohibit you ever to see me more, without my express command; my will is, that you retire to morrow to Tenese, and not to return hither, till you receive my orders. Sir, said I, I will do much more than you have ordered me, and to estrange my self from all occasions to displeasè you, I will travel to such a distance from Artemira, that those who bring your Orders, may meet perhaps more difficulties in finding me out, than you would have them, when it may be your business to recal me. After these words I went from him, and the next morning departed with such an equipage as pure necessity required, and rode towards the Confines of Tenese; but instead of making my abode there, I went out of those Territories, and engaged my self in a Voyage, from whence he found some trouble to recal me, as I had plainly foretold him. I have very succinctly discoursed to you of this cause of my departure, because you had before an entire knowledge of all, except what I have informed you, of the tokens I received of Artemira's affection. I will pass over with like brevity, what you have heard of my travels, either by report in my absence, or from those which might insuam you after my return to the King, to go into Franconia: but I shall enlarge enlarge my self upon those matters of which I know you altogether ignorant, and which now makes all that is in my life of importance, and considerable unto me. “It is true, (said the fair Albifinda to the Prince her Brother) that I knew the greatest part of what you have recounted to me, or rather, I was only ignorant of those particulars you unfolded of the affection which Artemira had for you, the which by her good fortune, and your discretion, were so well concealed, that they never reach’d (as yet) the knowledge of the Court. You may have likewise understood, how firm she remain’d in the protestation she had made, never to be our Mother-in-law; and how she entertain’d the proofs of the King’s affection with so much rigour, and so little acknowledgment, that in fine, his disgust, and shortly after, the return of Vindimir, whom he solely and particularly loved, and employed all his affections for him, made him forget his design of marrying her, and finally extinguish’d his Amours in such a manner, that he favoured Haldan in the affection he had for her; and you are not ignorant, how after she had lost by your absence all her hopes, and possibly through the few marks she received of your remembrance of her, by the advice of her friends she married Haldan, and hath made ever since her abode in the Court, where, in regard of Haldan’s quality, she retains the next place in dignity to me. “I know it, dear Sister, replied Viridomar, with many more particulars than you have recounted; and Haldan himself, who is the person I most esteem of all the Sueves, in whom only I confide for the stay which I make here, hath informed me of all, even to the slightest circumstance, without giving evidence of the least jealousy of those resentments which Artemira had had for me, of which, dear Sister, I never spoke to any person but your self. I have much rejoiced to find Artemira so well provided for; and I intend one day to let her know, though I have not the love of a Lover for her, I have at least much of esteem, and those good wishes as might satisfy a Sister.

Before I departed the Court, I heard a spreading report of the War, which the King of the Danes, Brother to the Queen our Mother, made upon the Saxons, a people both cruel and furious, who had preyed some small time before upon his Neighbours; and who by their Arms began to render themselves formidable to all Europe, and although through some discontents that were between them, the King our Father did not so much interest himself in these affairs, as he had formerly done; I was often by my own courage solicited to go and offer him the assistance of my Sword, and to seek after glory in a War, which might afford me many opportunities to acquire it, not doubting, but the King of the Danes would receive me as his Nephew, and give me employment answerable to my Birth, and to that fame of my Valour, which the Apprenticeship of my Arms had given me. This design which was strengthened by my disgrace, made me, in departing from our Court, steer my voyage towards Denmark, with a resolution to seek out war in other places, in case that of Denmark should cease, and not to see Suevia in many years again. Departing from Stragone, I took my way through the Country of the Catules, and of the Bards, and following the Elbe, I left the Turingiens on my left hand, although there I might as well have met with war, as amongst the Danes, and against the same enemies, who under the conduct of their Prince Genselaric entred there in Arms a small time after; and, as you might well have heard, never met with any stop to their Conquests, but through the relief which the valiant Ambiomer, that famous Gaul, who hath achieved so great a reputation in the world: thence through the Country of the Angiliens, arriving upon the Bordes of the Suevian Sea, because the Saxons possess’d all the Countries adjoining to the straight passages of the Elbe, I entred into Denmark, and in few days address’d my self to the King. He rather receiv’d me like a Son, than a Nephew; and through the fame which had so much flattered me, considering me more than I deserved, he gave me employment in those wars, which then lay upon his hands, which gave me as happy opportunities of rendering my self remarkable, as I could desire. I shall not discourse it to you, because I am confident you know each particular, and that Countries much more distant than Suevia, and persons that could not pretend an interest like yours, are not ignorant of them; and I shall truly tell you, to keep a method in my discourse, that after I had in the first year, with the Horse which I commanded, beaten the Saxons in every place where we skirmish’d, or joyn’d Battel, the King gave me in the second, the general command of all his Army; of which command, I made so happy use, that without receiving any loss considerable, I routed the Enemy in more than ten Fights, and utterly defeated him in two set Battels, constrain’d him to repass the Elbe, and because in the very same conjuncture of time, they met with the like ill success in their wars against the Turingiens, they submitted to a peace as advantageous as the King of the Danes could desire. After these great Services, the King my Uncle esteeming me as his Son, used his utmost endeavour to retain me near him, but it was impossible, by reason of my great desire to travel, and seek out Wars where-ever I might meet them. I no sooner saw peace well established in his Dominions, but I took my leave, passed the Elbe very near its source, and following the Borders of the German Sea, I passed over the Territories of the Cauches, as well those which are enclosed between the River Elbe and Visurgue, which are termed the greater, as likewise those which are beyond the Visurgue; I saw in order the Frisons, and the Saliens, and having coasted the River Flemon, I entred into the Country of the Batavians, which were in wars at that time against the Menapiens, and the Uspetes their Neighbours; and as I was known by them for that Viridomar, who had acquired some reputation in the Wars of the Danes against the Saxons, and one that testified an inclination to take their party, which I found the most just, they entreated me to take the command of their Army, which I accepted, with so good success for them, that in a short time I chased their Enemies out of all they possess'd in their Country; and having given them battel between the Wahal and the Meuse, I gain'd so full a Victory, that they seeing themselves ruined, were constrain'd to implore a peace of the Batavians, and to receive it upon any conditions they would impose upon them. After I had rendred them this service, I embark'd my self upon the Ocean, visited Great Britain, and Ireland which is near unto it; and for that I found all things there peaceable, and understood that Constantine their Prince, who had assumed to himself the Title of Emperour, was then amongst the Gauls where he made war, and where he fought for the Empire with the famous Constance, Lieutenant to Honorius: Having consumed some time in viewing what was most rare and remarkable in those Islands, the most famous of the Ocean; I put to Sea again, I coasted the Gauls, and having understood those Wars were finished by the valour of Constance, who had vanquish'd, and taken the Renowned Constantine Prisoner, I made no stay there, but keeping on towards the Coasts of Spain: In fine, I arriv'd at Lusitania, where landing my self, I visited the greater part of Spain, apply'd my self with a great deal of curiositiy to see the Cities, and the places famous for those great events which I had read of in History. And in fine, I was preparing my self to enter into Betica, which the Vandals had lately conquered, and where I might meet with war, when I found one of those Messengers which the King our Father had sent into all parts, to let me understand the death of Vindimir, and to recal me home. The Letter which he shew'd to me from the King was to this effect.

The King of the Sueves to Prince Viridomar.

*V*indimir is slain by the King of the Franks's own hand, and you are call'd upon to revenge his death, both by your own good fortune, and by a Father's grief, who can find no consolation but in the destruction of his Enemy: Come Viridomar, possess the Seat of Vindimir, not only in my heart, where blood and nature give it you, but also in Rosamond's, whom your good fortune hath designed you, and whom you ought to possess, if by the revenge of your Brother's death, you render your self worthy.

This Letter was very succinct, but the Messenger that brought it, inform'd me at length of all that which had pass'd, and recounted to me every little circumstance which happened at the time of Vindimir's death, and in the Wars of the Sueves and the Romans against the Franks. You may believe, dear Sister, that the change which I received in my quality by the death of Vindimir, which called me to the Suevian Crown, did not obstruct, nor hinder me from lamenting a Brother I so much loved, who was remarkable for his person, and who never had any hand or part in the evil usage I received from the King, although he had been some time an innocent cause. It is certain, that at the relation of his deplorable death, I was struck with a cruel grief; and that I suffered all those torments, which an affection and good nature might in the like occasion possibly endure. I was likewise sensibly touch'd with the King's affliction, which was represented to me to be very immoderate, which I easily believed, by the knowledge I had of the unlimited affection he always bore him, so that without much perswasion I entred into those resolutions of revenge, they endeavour'd to infuse into me, and I only coveted life for this occasion, to see my self with Arms in my hand, oppos'd against him who had been the death of my Brother. It was not but that I knew (by the discourse they made me) that

Pharamond had slain my Brother like a person of Valour, that there was no Crime in his death worthy of my hatred, and that even in the War it felt, the justice was on Pharamond's side. But I on the one side believed, that to seek an honourable revenge by an open War, and by ways equally honourable, was not prohibited: and on the other side, that glorious fame of Pharamond, which then began with so much noise to spread itself through the world, began to prick me with an emulation, which made me look with joy upon those occasions, to dispute the price of Valour with him. Moreover, as my heart was not then prepossessed by any passion, which might hinder me from being sensible of the offer which was made me, of the possession of Rosamond, I was really therewith touch'd, as much as one could be by the confused hopes of a happiness, which I figur'd to myself by an uncertain Idea, and as the fame of this great Beauty was then spread, as a prodigy, throughout all Europe, I could only look upon that fate which called me to her service, as a fortune which would draw all mens envy upon me. I then received without repugnancy, all those impressions which the King would stamp upon my Soul, and big with a desire to give him the consolation he sought, to fight Pharamond, and merit Rosamond: I turned my Horse's head, without then considering the course I should steer to return into Germany: I would not commit myself to Sea, fearing least the inconstancy of the winds should retard my Voyage; and for fear of finding impediments by land I resolv'd to pass all the way incognito: so that I then travelled over all that was to be seen in Spain, from the Country of the Celtiberians, where I then was, to the Pyrenean Mountains, which were to be pass'd to enter into Gallia, and I view'd the Robertans, the Hedizans, the Illergets, and all other places to the foot of the Mountains, without making the least stay at any place upon the Road. After I had pass'd the Pyrenean Mountains, I enter'd into Gallia, which I was oblig'd almost entirely to cross: I pass'd the Countries of the Tectosages, and the Mountains of Gabenes, I saw the Ambars, the Legusiens, the Lingons, and came in fine to the Territories of the Belges, and by those of the Vagions, aboarded the Rhine, I pass'd over to Mogunee, and arriv'd soon after in Franconia. At the sight of my Enemies Territories, and even of those places where I was to carry the War, my resentment was awakened, and I look'd upon them as the fatal Champagnes, where in a short time I should solemnize the revenge of Vindimir. But it was in this Country, that I us'd most care and caution to pass unknown, and although I had learn'd that King Pharamond, who was then the object of all my thoughts, much less perhaps through my hate, than through an emulation of his Glory, was then in Bobemia, from whence he had chased by many great Victories, the Kings of the Cimbrians, and of the Sueves; I made no question, but if discovered, I might have been stopp'd by those he had left behind; and therefore to pass the less discoverable, I divided my Equipage, and having sent the greatest part by a different rode from that I travelled, I only reserv'd Timanthus, and two other persons for my service near me. Nevertheless, as I knew I should return there with an Army, I observ'd the Country with the natural strength and situation thereof, as much as the short time of my stay did permit, I inform'd myself of the strength of their Cities, of the largeness and depth of their Rivers, and of all other things which might advantage me in the War for which I was call'd: but it was not the will of fortune, that I should depart that Country with the same liberty I enter'd it, for by an adventure very surprizing, she made me suffer a great change in my condition.

I had pass'd that City, which they had newly deprived of the name Hellenopolis, or rather changed it to that of Frankfort, and having after view'd in course some places neighbouring to the Mein, I follow'd one day the Banks of that River through a very pleasant and delightful Mead, which brought me to a Village where I was to have lain that night, when I found myself over against a little Island that was in the River, distant many hours riding from any place inhabited. In an instant, that which did appear to me of its Beauty fix'd my eyes upon it, which I the more easily discovered, by reason the Island was only separated by a little Arm of the River, about twenty paces from the Road I travel'd in, and that the Channel of the River ran on the further side much more deep and large. I perceiv'd the whole Island was cover'd with a small Wood, the most pleasant in the world; for the stature and beauty of the Trees, which do not only shadow the Island, in such a manner as the Beams of the Sun could not pierce into it, but also extended their shade, by reason of the Sun descending towards the West, very far upon the other side of the River, which as I have told you, was the grand Channel. That which I observ'd of the beauty of this Island, took up my eyes in passing with a great deal of pleasure, but would scarce have made me forsake my Horse to have seen more of it, if my ears had not been at the same time surpris'd by womens voices, that I heard on the other side, and a while after by the sound of a charming voice, which was accompanied by the harmony of a sweet instrument, she sung words which the distance of the place did not permit me to hear, though it no ways hindred me from judging that the voice which sung them, was one of the most ravishing in the world. You know, Sister, that I ever delighted in Harmony, and this seem'd to me so sweet, that you need not admire, that I was suddenly touch'd with a desire to hear it at a nearer distance; and as that which I had some few moments before to enjoy the deliciousness of that shade, which presented it self in so hot a season, was joyned more strongly to the former, so I had not strength enough to resist them, nor to deny my self a satisfaction, which the free condition I was in permitted me to enjoy. I cast my eyes upon the small Arm of the River, where the water was then low enough to ride over it, and although Timanthus represented to me, that we had not much day to ride to the place where I had designed to lodge, this consideration was not capable to stop me, nor hinder me from entering into the Island, which I got to with much facility. However, because I feared that the sight of us might somewhat amaze and startle the persons that were singing, and so deprive us of the pleasure I had in chase; I and my two men alighted on the Banks of the Island, which were the two I told you before, I had only reserved of my Attendants, and making them stay in the same place with my Horses, I advanced under the Trees on foot, and made very softly towards the place, towards which I found my self attracted by the voice which continued singing. The Island was so small, that it contained scarce a hundred paces in length, and half so much in breadth, so that I had not far to walk to hear more distinctly, what more confusedly I heard before at some distance, and suffering my self to be guided by the voice, I arrived in fine at a place where I might both hear the words, and see the persons that sung, which were two fair Virgins, who sat upon a green Turf at the root of a great Tree, sufficiently well accoutred, to let me judge by their habit, that they were not of the vulgar sort: but almost at the same time they left of singing, and I could only hear these four Stanzas which were the last.

O H! despise not sacred Love,
 Yet cruel Fair, you feel it not:
 But it may fatal one day prove,
 When it shall fall to be your lot.
 They are much more fair than wise,
 That the power of Love despise.

He that conquered all the Gods,
 And made them feel his cruel Dart:
 Upon a mortal hath great odds,
 Whose strength is in a stubborn heart,
 At which, alas, if he once draw,
 He will impose a cruel Law.

A Law to which you must obey,
 Although your Love be payd with hate:
 A Law which men dare not gainsay,
 Since Gods themselves ne'er alter fate;
 Then cease your enmity to love;
 Repentance may some pity move.

There's none so obstinate in Sin,
 But when they come to punishment,
 Could wish that it had never been,
 And would, when 'tis too late, repent.
 Be you more wise, prevent your Fate,
 Lest when you love, it prove too late.

She that sung had scarce uttered these verses, but she and her companion rose from the place where they sat without turning their eyes towards me, and taking each other under their Arm hastned to the other side of the Isle, where I heard the voices of other women. As the love which I had for singing and the curiosity which this adventure might have given me, had not made me receive the satisfaction which I hoped, so I resolv'd to try my fortune farther, once more to feast my eyes or my ears with that which they might expect from this accident: But I endeavour'd to use therein all possible wariness, and in sliding from the Tree to follow these two Virgins, I arriv'd near the bank of the River, in the place where the Trees were both tallest and thickest, and where they then cast forth a shadow which covered almost the whole stream of the River: from thence I presently espied without being seen divers women upon the bank in a posture little different from those I had seen before and a Barge covered, at the end whereof a Lady of a good grace, although somewhat indebted to time was seated, and seem'd to give orders to the Maidens that were sat upon the banks of the River: I fastned my eyes for a while to these objects, when quickly they were taken off by a little noise I heard in the River from the side which I had not as yet viewed, although it was much more near me and under those very trees with which I obscured my self from being seen. It was by stroke of the same destiny which conducted me to that place, that I cast my eyes there where I not only found wherewith to arrest my sight, but also to bind in eternal chains a soul most generous and most undaunted: and behold dear Sister in what a manner this destiny which governs our days did act against me, since to make me submit to this Amour, which she armed against my liberty, she was not content to present a fair face or rather a celestial visage which might have produced alone a much greater effect, but as if she were distrustful of her own strength she expos'd to my view such a surpassing beautie able to subjugate the whole world instead of a particular person, and displayed by my eyes rarities which only this accident could have expos'd, more indeed than a mortal eye could ever hope to see. Be not dear Sister astonish'd if a man were therewith enchanted, and believe there is no power amongst men able to defend a heart upon such an occasion. I there saw my dear Sister, casting my eyes upon the river, two Ladies that bathed themselves close by the bank, being not bold enough to wade farther into the Stream. The least beautiful of the two was certainly a very fair and handsome personage, and I should not have doubtlesly neglected the consideration which was due to her beauty, if she had produced it elsewhere and not so near another person that obscured her lustre: but she that in an instant interrupted both my eyes and my thoughts, appeared to my dazled sight a thousand times more fair than the Mother of love issuing out of the sea, or whatever the most charming Idea could present to the imagination. Oh my Sister how weak and uncapable do I find my self to describe what I saw, and how difficultly can you apprehend it unless you read in my eyes that which my discourse cannot delineate nor represent unto you. "I fear my Lord (said Albisinda blushing) that you will represent it too lively, and I could wish if you so pleas'd that you would help your self with my imagination to save you the discourse, No my dear Sister replyed the Prince, fear nothing, I have not forgot what is due to your modesty, and on the other side I saw nothing but what I may mention without offending it. This adorable wonder which seem'd to have brought heaven into the waters, was in part covered with a fine Lawn which the water made cleave so close to her body that it seem'd pasted unto it, and expos'd to the eye even the admirable form of those parts which it covered, and left many others free to the sight, as the face the entire neck withall its beauties, the arms almost uncovered and nothing in fine was hid from me which her companion could see: and you well know Sister that there are bounds in the greatest familiarities which are created between two persons of the same sex which Modesty doth not permit persons well born to exceed. The upper part of this miraculous person was only covered with a little Coif of Tiffany that presented the great braids of hair which were nevertheless discern'd through it, nor did it hold them so firmly but that some got loose and dangling upon her shoulders with that shining blackness heightned the dazzling whiteness of her body. The coolness of the water had somewhat abated the vermilion of her cheeks and the colour of her lips, yet did it rather sweeten than take away the tincture, and in causing in her a kind of a charming languishment did seem to work no bad effect on her face in which you might observe much more than when it was sprightly. One might even judge that by this element an enemy to the fire, that which sparkled in her eyes was become more supportable to the weakness of our sight than it was accustomed to be in the ordinary vigour, and one might perceive somewhat of more sweetness than those flashes which accompanied or forerun the lightning which she used to dart forth. Her Neck was admirable both for its form and for its whiteness, laying open to the heavens all its beauties made them ashamed of their own splendour. It seem'd rather a kind of pride than the fanning of the wind which moved the waters, and make them swell by intervals, and their Arms and hands which accompanied it in playing upon the Waves, seemed to make the same war against the God of the Sea which this fair object had already rais'd in my heart. This was all which then appeared to me, the envious waters obscuring the rest, although they could not hinder my thoughts from penetrating therein and supplying the defect of my eyes, and it was only at her coming forth of the River that those parts which the Lawn did not cover, as a leg and a foot much more fair than that which Homer gave Thetis, were presented to my eye with all their advantage. In this contemplation did I remain fix'd, but with such a fixedness as made me forget all things, and yet did not permit me to remember my self. It was not, for all that, the sole fear of being discovered which rendered me immovable, admiration did first produce this effect, and all that which succeeded in my mind scarce left me a freedom either of sight or respiration. I could not nevertheless prevent (a while after) some sighs from disturbing the silence I had imposed upon my self, and my heart, looking with distaste upon the yolk I would impose upon it, endeavoured to rise up against the chains which were presented unto it: At the same time it awaken'd my reason which this charm had stupified; and made it sit in judgment upon all that which she felt, either to make her approve what it began to suffer, or seek out Arms for its defence. In effect, when I could render my self capable of reasoning, which my first astonishment had suspended, I let her work upon this fair object which had engrossed my thoughts; but I found my reason so well agreeing with my eyes and so complaisant to the charm which had reduced me, that I did not receive the relief which I expected. I held my eyes and my mind equally fix'd upon this divine person, and were it that she walked, or turned her eyes, or opened her mouth to speak to her companion, I found her steps, her looks and the sound of her voice composed by love himself, nor did I see any thing therein which did not enchant me: "Oh my eyes! said I to my self at that time, to what a vision have you been guided by my destiny, and what do you seek for an object which already causeth trouble and disorder in my soul? No matter, added I soon after, whatsoever you may find there, if it be possible do not unfix your selves, nothing of more beauty can ever attract you, and what war soever you may wage from this fight against my heart, I implore the Gods that you may remain until my death fix'd to this fair object. I then permitted them to rove with delight upon this fair figure which had charm'd them, and in consequence permitting my discerning faculties to labour in the enquiry of what I saw; "But is it possible, said I, that what I see should be mortal, and yet not Rosamond whose beauty makes her famous throughout the world, and towards whom they made me elevate my hopes? Ah Viridomar, how fortunate shouldst thou be if this were Rosamond. "But senseless as thou art, added I, reposing my self at the same instant, thou too well knowest it is not Rosamond, that the waters of the Mein are not the waters of the Elbe, and that thou mayst rather hope to find her in any part of the world sooner than on her enemies territories: Oh since this which I see is not Rosamond, added I with a sigh, that same which gives her a value beyond all the beauties of the world is a false deceiver: for it is impossible that Rosamond, whom she so loudly flatters, can possibly be fairer than this present object of my eyes. Oh how happy amongst men is he to whom fortune allots this inestimable treasure, and how miserable amongst the unfortunate is he, to whom she grants a sight of this beauty, if she appear so opposite to his desires, as to deprive him of all hope. To these discourses I added many others of the same nature, and I still finish'd them with a prayer to the Gods to prolong the felicity I then enjoyed, and render it durable if it were possible to the utmost period of my life: But I quickly perceived that my prayers were fruitless; for in that moment my mind was most fix'd on this contemplation, a cruel maid came to advertise this admirable creature, that it was time to forsake the water, and that she had stayed there too long. She needed not many solicitations to forsake the River, for seeing many Virgins advance from the boat towards the place where she was with some necessaries to receive her upon the bank, she went towards them, and as the depth of the water lessened by degrees, she discovered more and more what had been hid from me, as much at least as the envious linnen would permit me to see. Coming to the bank, two Virgins received her in a large sheet, and although they shifted her out of the wet linnen, yet they perform'd it with such a cruel dexterity, that it was impossible for me to discover more than what before appeared, although I stood behind the same tree whose shadow covered them, and so near unto her that I durst not remove, nor scarcely breath for fear of making some noise to discover me. But I found it much more difficult to obscure my self when the company increased in that place by the arrival of that Lady of a handsome deportment whom I saw in the boat, who with some other Virgins approached near to those which came out of the River, whilst the Maids dressed them, sitting upon busses which were brought for that purpose. I beheld these passages with infinite trouble, still keeping my eyes upon that beauty which had so nearly toucht my heart: But while she was dressing she turned her face most part of the time towards the side of the River, leaving me in such a darkness as I could hardly endure it any longer, but as soon as she was cloath'd with a habit little differing from those which are given to the Nymphs of Diana, of a stuff seemingly rich though very light, she rose and turning her face to the side of the wood, in the same instant I lifted up my head to view her, she both saw me and observ'd my behaviour; surpris'd with this sight she gave a sudden shriek, and turning towards that Lady which appeared to be her Mother; "Oh the Gods," said she to her, what is that shape I see of a man so near us, and of a man that hath seen us "in the water. These words oblig'd the Lady and all the Maids to cast their eye towards me; and finding my self discovered I did not endeavour to obscure my self, perceiving it then impossible, but I remain'd in as high a confusion as if I had been taken committing some greater crime. I am not naturally very timorous, neither had I been so in this occasion if I had continued in the same state I was in some moments before, but the effect which this admirable beauty had produced upon my heart deprived me of all assurance, and wanting confidence to look on her exasperated visage, I kept my eyes fixed on the ground with the countenance of a person much abash'd. At length I rais'd them towards the object they most covet'd, although it were with such a fear as never daunted me in the most dangerous occasions, and not till then did I discover either by the effects of shame or anger upon that celestial face which I already adored; the vermilion which the coolness of the water had somewhat vanish'd, returned to its full perfection; and those eyes which appeared languishing before, began to sparkle like fire, and their natural flashes were more enflam'd by the additional heat of her rage. This exasperated Beauty had at first design'd to flee from me in that instant, as from a man who had seen more of her than she desired: but she could not obtain so much of her anger, for she believed that my impudence merited a severe reproof, at least that she should give me some marks of her displeasure. She pierc'd me thorow in a moment with her eyes, although she turned her face scarce half way towards me, and casting a look at me which gave me less cause to fear than love; And who art thou inconsiderate fool, said she to me, thou who by thy presence profanest sacred places, and who forcing a respect which no man ever durst violate, dost cast thy audacious eyes upon objects prohibited to all mortal eyes. These words which like a clap of thunder having struck my ears and heart at the same time, had quite chas'd away the boldness of my courage, if I had not strove to retain it in the necessity I had thereof, or if I had not in fine met with a sufficient relief from my courage to render my self in a condition to speak and justify my error. I fixed my dazzled eyes with much difficulty upon a face which anger caus'd to sparkle with an extraordinary fire, and expressing my self in the terms my new passion had inspir'd me; If you are a Goddess, said I unto her, you know that I am innocent, since chance and not my intention was author of this crime, and if you are mortal you may permit me to say the same in my justification, and to add, that you ought not to be exasperated for what I have seen, since all the evil will fall upon me and all the glory be yours: for in fine, what I have seen may justly shame all that the Sun ever saw of beautiful, and by this vision I have lost——I had said more if I had not espied her face to cloth it self in a new scarlet, which made me conceive that my discourse did rather aggravate than in the least appease her. I was studying terms that might have work'd a better effect, when preventing me with a shrill voice; What a rashness is this, said she unto me, and from what part of the world dost thou come hither to offend me both by thy behaviour, and thy discourse: I am a stranger, reply'd I, that a fortune less happy than glorious has lead to this occasion to displease you, or I am rather an Acteon, who for a crime parallel to his, find my self expos'd to a torment much more cruel than he endured. If I had the power to expose thee to it (said the fiercely exasperated beauty) I should have pursued thy crime so close, that thou shouldst not have had time to make a reflexion on what thou hast seen: but if I wanted that power I shall have at least enough to hinder you either from knowing or seeing any more that person whom you have view'd already more than you ought, and more than she would have had you. Finishing these words with an angry voice she departed with her train, and retired into the boat which began at the same instant to make towards the farther bank; where I saw their chariots and men to attend them: I then advanced towards the bank from which I always held my eyes fix'd on the River, and I wish'd very often that the Mein had been as large as the Danube, that I might longer have retained the sight (although indistinct and confused) of that fierce beauty which already reign'd in my heart. But when after the had pass'd the River, I saw her go forth of the Barge to mount the Chariot, and that a moment after I lost her with all her train in a wood on the other side of the bank, I remain'd much more astonish'd and afflicted than I can possibly express. I saw my self at the same time deprived of a vision which was dear enough to me to cause a forgetfulness of all things else, exposed to the rage of a beauty which I already most passionately loved notwithstanding all the endeavours I made to the contrary, and without all means either of seeing her or obtaining a knowledge of her person, the River hindring me to follow and I seeing no person to inform my self of her : and this misfortune which became great by a passion which had already gained a considerable strength, touched me so near that I found much difficulty to comfort my self.

In the mean time, the fair Idea of what I had seen, employed all the faculties of my Soul, and I abandoned my self thereto in such a manner, that I had not of a long time quitted the place where I had so pleasantly lost my self, if Timanthus, to whom my long stay, and the approach of night gave much of disquiet, had not quitted the place where I left him, to come to seek me, and to advertise me, that the Sun was ready to forsake our Hemisphere, and that we had many hours of riding, to reach any handsome place of Retreat: He repeated it twice or thrice before he could extort any answer from me, and turning in sine towards him with a gesture which much surpris'd him : And if we should pass the night here, said I to him, would you think it, Timanthus, any great misfortune? The inconveniences which you might suffer, replied Timanthus, is a sufficient misfortune for persons to whom your safety is so dear; and give me leave to tell you, my Lord, you ought not to pass it here without great necessity. I should spend it with two much of joy, replied I to him, if I could nourish a hope, to see to morrow what I have seen to day, but I know too much ever to hope it: know this in the mean time, Timanthus, that it is not without reason, that I abandon this place with regret, and that I shall never see in another place what here I have seen; and that the small time I have spent in this place, hath wrought a very large change in my condition. I accompanied these words with a sigh, and gestures sufficiently passionate to give some disquiet to Timanthus; but as the confidence I had in him, did not permit me to make a secret of what there happened unto me; I began, whilst we were walking to the place where he left our Horses, and continued when we were mounted and departed that fatal Island, to relate unto him my adventure, with many more particulars than I have observed in the relation I now make to you, and in such passionate terms, that he doubted not, that I had already really entertain'd an affection for her. He kept silence for some short time after I had finish'd my discourse, and then taking hold of my words; I confess, my Lord, (said he) that these adventures you have done me the honour to relate, cause in me no ordinary astonishment, and that a Beauty which could produce on your Soul so great an effect, must necessarily be more than an ordinary beauty: But, my Lord, all the impression she hath left, will be quickly defaced by the sight of Rosamond; and before Rosamond's Beauty all others will vanish, like the little Stars before that Planet which ushers in the day. Do not take, said I, that Beauty which hath wounded my Soul, for one of those little Stars; neither believe that the beauty of Rosamond, can with ease chase it from my heart. I also feel something in my heart, which hinders me from desiring her: and to speak with the confidence I have in you, know Timanthus, that if I were solely called by the thoughts I have for Rosamond, they would not be capable to snatch me hence, nor hinder me from searching out the Beauty which hath wounded me, from using all means to know her, and to make my self beloved by her, and perhaps from chaining my self to her all the remainder of my life; but it is my Duty, and Honour which more loudly call, than any other considerations. I know I am to revenge my Brother, that I am to combat Pharamond, whose glory covers me with confusion; and that no affection can plead my excuse to the world, if I omit the search of this great Enemy, and to answer worthily those hopes the King hath conceived of my Valour. These reasons constrain me to use a greater violence upon my self, than you can possibly fancy; and though I bear an unkind usage in my heart, which perhaps may always continue; I will march with him in Arms, or by his orders in Franconia, or any other place, to find the Murderer of Vindimir; and when I have given my honour all her rights, I will search a solace for my affections in those opportunities which honour shall present me. It was thus I express'd to Timanthus my intentions, and put them afterwards in execution, in the same manner I had explained them unto him, though not without a great violence to my inclinations, which made me feel by this cruel necessity that honour had much more impos'd, than I can possibly make you apprehend; the care I took to inform my self by the way, was very unprofitable, and all which I could learn, was, that on the other side of the Isle which I remarked, Prince Friam, Basogatus, and other personages of the highest Rank in Franconia had their Palaces; but although I was inform'd, these persons had Daughters which fame publish'd for beautiful; they did not character them sufficiently, to let me find out that Beauty which had wounded me; and so without larger information, and remitting my self to be instructed in another manner, at my next return into Franconia in a warlike equipage: I prosecuted my Journey

by those near ways, which brought me quickly to Suevia, near the King who received me with more tenderness than his Soul had ever testified before. I tell you not the particulars of the reception he gave me, although you could not have learn'd it but by the recital of others, for you had been long before with the Princesses of the Cimbrians. You were inform'd no doubt, that the memory of Vindimir made the King shed many tears at my arrival, which gave me some assurance that I should succeed Vindimir in his affections; and that he sollicit'd me in fine to revenge my Brother's death, with all the Rhetorick which might either animate or persuade, and gave me to understand that he could find no consolation in this life except in the ruine of his enemy. I have learnt all this you now tell, said Albisinda, and I believe my self scarcely ignorant of any considerable passage which happened at the time of your arrival, and I know that the King's hopes were much more brightned by the confidence he had in your valour than by the power of all the other forces of his Kingdom: But I never heard of that adventure, you lately recounted, which made you lose your liberty, and I expect with a great impatience to understand what followed so extraordinary a beginning; although by fame hath taught us, I believed my self already enrich'd with the knowledge of that beauty which worked upon your soul such a sudden and wonderful effect, not having so bad an opinion of you to attribute that to many beauties which ought to have been caused by one only. Your desire is to be inform'd of the truth, replied the Prince, so that I shall slightly pass over the things you know to enlarge my discourse upon such as never came to your knowledge or that could not possibly come but confusedly.

The End of the First Book of the Fifth Part.

PHARAMOND.

BOOK II.

SOME days before I arrived at the King my father's Court, the King of the Cimbrians and Prince Theobald his Son who had retired themselves, after they had been chased by Pharamond and Gondioch from their Territories, were departed with a considerable force towards the frontiers of Bohemia, where they held intelligences, with a design to fall upon the two Kings their enemies while they were engaged in a war one against the other, or (if they found not a convenient opportunity) to translate the war into the Territories of Gondioch whilst we invaded Pharamond's. I approved this design much more than the former, and if the King of the Cimbrians had not been link'd by the Chain of interest to the King of the Sueves, and thereby obliged to assist him in the revenge he thirsted after, I should have found much of cruelty and ingratitude in his obstinacie to war upon him who was fighting against Gondioch to make him restore his and his Daughters dominions. I did not likewise much approve that unlimited eagerness which the King manifested in the revenge of a Son, whose life the King of the Franks did only take away in the defence of his own: and perhaps I might have testified it if we had had to do with any other enemy than this person whose renown had already filled the whole world, and whose invincible valour gave all those that had a design to war against him too much cause to fear, for me to manifest impressions any way favouring of cowardise by seeming favourable to the reluctancies or excuses I might have made.

This, and the consideration of what honour I might acquire against so great a person, made me freely consent to whatever the King imposed upon me; and all things being prepared for this Expedition, I accompanied him at the head of a hundred thousand men, to march into Franconia; I endeavoured to my utmost, to dissuade the King from making this War in person; but though he had so good an opinion of me, as to trust me with the conduct of this War, he listened much more to his own resentments, than to the reasons I could alledge, for he could not believe it possible for him to satisfy his revenge, unless he executed it in person. He made the truth too evident, as soon as he entered the Enemies Country, where he immediately began to consume all by Fire and Sword, acting with so much rigour, that neither respect nor complacency could make me approve it, so that I both condemned and hindred it, as much as was possible. You have known, dear Sister, the full progress of our Arms, and you have heard, how having stormed some places of small importance, and vanquish'd our Enemies wheresoever we found them; in the Campaign I forced Basogastus to come to the Battel he hazarded against me, because the King was some where else with one half of the Army, and that he lost twenty thousand of his men which remain'd dead upon the place, and amongst them some Princes, and considerable personages, Allies, or Subjects of Pharamond. You have likewise heard, that after this Battel, we found no more resistance capable to stop us, and that afterwards having reduced to our obedience and power all that might oppose us, we went to besiege Peapolis, the Capital City of Franconia, in which Basogastus, having performed all the duties of a brave Captain, and sustained his misfortune with a great deal of courage and prudence, was immur'd with the remainder of his Army. But dear Sister, although you have had this knowledge of the publick occurrences, you know not the secret war that was kindled in my breast, and with what it was concern'd: For your information therefore, I shall tell you, that neither the preparations for the war, nor the busie employments of the war it self, had power to chase from my Soul the fair image of that fierce and imperious Beauty, which became the sole Commanders of my heart, by that accident I have already related to you. This dear and pleasing resemblance remained in such a manner rooted in my remembrance, that there pass few minutes in the day, in which I had her not present in my thoughts, and that I did not feast them upon those Beauties, which I had seen with so much pleasure, that ravish'd me, and transported me sometimes even to an extasie.

The King was frequently astonish'd, to see me receive with so much flegm and coldness the hopes he gave me of the possession of Rosamond; and I could not have excus'd my self, but by telling him, that it was very difficult for the sole fame of a Beauty, how ravishing soever, to create such violent desires in me; and that to ground a perfect love in a fancy like mine, the sight of her was necessary: he satisfied himself with this reason, which was very plausible; and whereas he did not perceive in me any impatience for the sight of this celebrated Beauty, he attributed that to my warlike inclinations, believing that love would above all things predominate over my thoughts when leisure offer'd, but he fancied withal, that the sight of Rosamond would more fervently engage me to contend for the enjoyment of her, and it was not perhaps impossible, but some part of his thoughts might prove true; and that the time, the difficulties, and the apparition of a Beauty like that of the Princess of the Cimbrians, might have wrought in my heart something contrary to an impression which it had so lightly entertain'd, had it not been otherwise fixed by the will of Heaven, which had not design'd me for Rosamond, and had without doubt reserv'd her for a Lover much more worthy than my self, of having the glory to serve her. If in Suevia the memory of that unknown Beauty made war upon my heart, you may believe, dear Sister, that it continued it with greater force and violence when I was in Franconia, and that I could not approach those places where I believed her to be, without more and more perplexing my self, with the remembrance of what I had there seen, and the desire to renew again that happiness. As Timantibus was the sole person that knew this secret of my heart, so it was only with him that I dayly entertain'd my self with the discourse thereof, and the cruel necessity which chained me to the head of my Army, did not afford me the liberty to perform all those things which I most desired, so that I gave him many Commissions, and oblig'd him to many courses to enquire where that Beauty was retreat'd, and lodg'd, I so vehemently loved: but he could never learn any thing, capable to give me the least satisfaction, and although he reported that Prince Prian, Basogastus, and other persons of illustrious Rank in Franconia, had Palaces in that Province where I met this fatal adventur, and Daughters that fame published for Beauties, methoughts he told me nothing that could perswademe that any of these was the person I sought for: but fortune acted for me beyond all my diligence, although not half so much as I could have desired;

fred; for some days before I gave battel to Basogastus, having disengaged my self from the Body of the Army, I marched with five hundred Horse to make a discovery of the Country, (which was very customary unto me) and observe those stations that might be most advantageous for me, which I might effect with more ease, in regard the enemy had no Forces near enough to deprive us of that liberty: and in consequence, having divided my little party, and retain'd near me only two hundred Horse, after I had view'd a large Plain, situated between the Mein and the City of Artanne, ascending a little Hill which was near the end of the Plain, I heard some noise in the Vallley on the other side, and when I had got the top of the Hill, from whence I might, though not plainly, descry a part of that which was done in the Vallley, I saw confusedly some appearance of a Combat, or rather of a Rout; and not being able to discern it fully from thence, I dispatch'd two Scouts to discover the particular truth thereof, and to make me a speedy report. I expected in the same place their return with an impatience, of which I could not possibly divine the cause, and a small time after, one of them being returned, and pressing towards me in great haite; My Lord, said he, The two hundred Horse which you divided an hour since from the Troop under the command of Cleontius, have in that meadow encountred a hundred Horse, which convey'd certain Chariots, and essaying to stop them, they did not only put themselves in a defensive posture, but also assaulted them with so much vigour, that Cleontius himself with some others, lost their lives at the first onset, which did so exasperate our Troop, that in a little time, they cut in pieces all those which did not save themselves by flight, and the Chariots remaining at the mercy of the Conquerours, they pulled out the Ladies, which seemed to be persons of great quality, and who are now in danger to suffer all those miseries of War, which the fury of a disorder'd Troop without a Leader may inflict upon them, unless they be with diligence relieved. These words pierced my very heart, either through a compassionate resentment, or a natural aversion I bore to disorders of this nature, without consulting my second thoughts, I flew in person to their succour, which any other than my self could not perhaps have easily afforded them: but because I knew the King would not be pleas'd, with what pity made me do in favour of my Enemies, and that he would often in great fury taunt me, with my being merciful, I charged all those which were near me, not to tell my name that day to any person that should ask it, and having afterwards commanded Timanthus to give the same orders to those in the Vallley, I rode with the greatest swiftness that was possible, and I had not long rid, but I saw these miserable remains of the Combat, some men flying before the Conquerours, the Chariots without a Guide, and the Ladies which they had forced from thence (piercing Heaven with their outcries) in the hands of the Sueves, who dragged them along without either pity or respect.

As soon as I could make them hear my voice, I called to them on pain of death to stop; but if my voice to some were known, who at my sight withdrew themselves, there were many others, that the heat of the Skirmish, or the desire of the fair Prey had so inflamed, that they were a long time before they could know me. They were ten or twelve Ladies, every one guarded by eight or ten men, that were disputing amongst themselves whose Prisoners they should be, so that the number of their Enemies was their safety at that time; the first which I accosted, having commanded away all those that were about her, seemed to me a Lady of a very good deportment, and who, by all appearances, was a person of very great quality: and this opinion making me more narrowly observe her, methought it was the same Lady, who had been present in that fatal adventure which made me love; and that she appeared by several marks, to be the same I took for the Mother of my too much beloved, and unknown Mistress: I was designing to speak to her to clear this doubt, when she hastily prevented me: Ab! where you be, (cryed she with a shrill voice) you, whom the Gods and your virtue have conducted hither to our relief, save the honour of those persons, who would willingly give their lives to preserve it; and if this design did guide you, as I believe it did, flye where the evil is greatest, and where youth and beauty attract the greatest dangers. Finishing these words, and seeing her self free, she ran with all her might towards the place, pointing thereto with her hand, where I saw some Ladies dragged by the Sueves, with a most barbarous inhumanity; I called to them to hold, as I came near them, and punish'd some few of those that were slothful in obeying me, either by forcing them to the ground with the shock of my Horse, or cutting them with my drawn Sword, that they might bear the marks of their insulence. I was constrained to punish many in this manner near her, who at all the Ladies had drawn about her the greatest croud; and when I had beat them all off, then when she had no further use of her strength to defend her self, it forsook her in a moment, and either through the night, or weariness, she swooned at the root of a Tree, about four steps distant from the place where I was: she was no sooner fallen, but the Lady whom I had newly set free, that spoke to me, and whom I fancied to know, as before I told you, came to her, and after her all the rest (finding themselves at liberty) ran to the same place.

This Lady having seated her self near the swooning person, laid her head upon her knee, and washing her face with tears which trickled down her own, she endeavoured to recover her to life again : the sight hereof obliged me to alight, being tenderly touch'd with pity, and agitated with much stronger motives, than those of compassion, and to draw near this disconsolate Lady : Comfort your self, Madam, (said I) and fear not any thing of this accident, the mischief whereof is already past. This fear had not perplex'd you, if my good fortune had sooner guided me hither ; but not having the power to defend you from it, I assure you, you shall receive no farther harm. This Lady who already knew me for her deliverer, look'd upon me, and by that means discovering the person that lean'd her head upon her knee, she gave me both an opportunity to observe, and know her, by that resemblance I had already engraven in my memory, for that same person I adored, and whose image I bore in the center of my heart. I cannot tell how, dear Sister, to represent unto you, either the astonishment which then surpris'd me, or the many differing passions my Soul at that instant laboured with. If joy durst present it self to my Soul at the view of the Lady I sought after with so much eagerness, and for the opportunity I had to do her so considerable a piece of service, it was very suddenly repelled by the grief I had conceived, to see the Beauty I adored, in a condition that made me doubt of her life, and to understand that it was by my own men she was so unmannerly handled ; and this last passion growing much stronger in my heart, did not only hinder me from feeling the first, but likewise touch'd me in such manner, that I stood in need of all my courage to preserve any appearance of resolution, or moderation, And in the mean time, by this second sight, a sight which pierc'd the very bottom of my heart, my love augmented more in an instant, than it could possibly have done by ordinary ways in many years.

This fair visage, although despoiled of those lively colours, which in a better condition of health, used to heighten its resplendent whiteness, and deprived of the sparkling lustre of its bright eyes, retained nevertheless such beauties in its languishment, as your imagination may much better make you apprehend, than my discourse. Her natural fairness which seem'd to receive by this accident, a kind of augmentation could not be looked upon without amazement. And whereas by the resistance and struggling she had made, the dressings of her head were somewhat slackened, some part of her hair falling in some disorder upon her cheeks, heighten'd their lustre by their different hue : her head negligently resting upon the Ladies lap that sustained her, insinuated somewhat of such tenderness by its languishing posture, that it was impossible for even the hardest hearts to defend themselves from it ; and a part of her fair neck, which the Maids had laid open (by unloosing her cloths) to give her the liberty of breathing, appearing at a nearer distance to my eyes, than the first time, expos'd but too much of beauty to complete my undoing, if I were not quite lost before. I beheld a while these wonders, with the countenance of a man totally amazed ; but in fine, not being able to master the passion which transported me ; Oh celestial Beauty, (cryed I, and accosting her, and kneeling close by her) have my eyes, and my heart so much search'd and enquired after you, to find you in this condition, and must I purchase a happiness, so vehemently desired, with a grief so cruel. Oh Barbarians, (added I, turning to the Soldiers with a menacing look) you shall pay with the price of your lives, for this diskindness you have done me. These words, and my more passionate gestures, obliged that Lady to whom all the other bore a respect, to look upon me much more heedfully than before, and seeing my face which was then totally uncovered, painted with all those marks or a most violent grief ; It must either be, (said she) that you are very generous, in interesting your self as you do in our misfortunes, or that this personage which causes all our grief is not unknown to you. I once appeared, replied I, as a criminal before her, though very innocent, nor do I know in what condition I appear before her at this time. You ought not to doubt, said she, but that we look upon you as our preserver, and our tutelär Angel, but you must forgive our griefs, if they do not permit us to render you those respects which are due, whilst we remain in this uncertainty of a life, which is of greater value than our own, and of much dearer concern unto us. These words multiplied insensibly my griefs, and she that before spoke to me, seeing that the fair swooning Lady did not return to her self : May it please you to permit me, said she, to let my Daughter be carried in my Chariot to some place where she may receive that relief which we cannot here find, for I have some reason to hope that you have this kindness for those Prisoners which you have so lately rescued from a greater misfortune. I made no answer to these words which cleft my heart with sorrow, but fearing

some other might anticipate me in this office, and deprive me of the most easy labour which I ever undertook in all my life. I took this admirable person in my arms, and raising her gently from the earth, I began to carry her towards the Chariot, with a delight which I could not compare to any other in the world, had I met with it upon a less sad occasion: Oh how sweet this burden seemed, oh how dear and precious those minutes were to me; and with how much sweetness, whilst this fair body was in my Arms, did I feel her head lean upon my shoulder, and her face so near unto mine, that I might easily have stolen kisses, if fear, which is the ordinary companion of Love, had not made the theft appear too criminal. All the Ladies followed me as fast they could, and I had but two or three steps to go, to discharge my self of my dear burthen into the Chariot, whose doors were before broken down: when my fair swooning Lady, either by the motion or other causes recovered her senses, and opened her eyes, raising her head which she had reposed upon my shoulder; she immediately turned her eyes on every side: and as the remembrance of the last accident came first to her memory; she could not see her self within the arms of a man that carried her, without taking him for one of the same persons from whom I had rescued her: and believing what might be most of cruelty in her condition, she struck her hands against my face, and repelling me with all her force, "Let me go Barbarian, said she, and content thy self with my life, without doing me a greater injury. Although I had not deserved this reproach, I suffered it with an immoderate joy, and leaving her (from whom I received it) in the Chariot, which then was at hand, I gave her to understand by that Action, that I was none of those Barbarians she feared. The Lady which I took for her Mother, with all the other maids seated themselves presently near her: and when I perceived by her behaviour, that she began to have more assurance, and to look upon my face with less of horror than she had testified some minutes before, bending my knees upon the Boot, and looking upon her with an aspect as full of respect as passion; "Fear nothing Madam, said I, in a place where all your Enemies are at your mercy, and do not take that person for your Enemy, that would abandon his life with too much of joy, to the least occasion that might either please or serve you: these Barbarians which so ill knew the respects they owed to your divine beauty, shall be punished for their crime: and though I am sufficiently innocent, I find my self exposed to a torment, which will render me no less worthy of your pity than they of your anger. By these discourses that divine person grew more and more assured in her imagination, and that Lady to whom all the others bore a respect, having informed her in few words, of what I had performed for her service and theirs; she fix'd her eyes upon my face, in which perhaps she had soon discerned something that appeared not barbarous; and having a long time considered my Countenance, without speaking; "I see plainly, said she, that I am indebted to you for all things, but I know not to what, nor to whom I owe this relief, yet I am much deceived if this be the first time I have seen you. "You saw me once before, (said I unto her with some signs of confusion) but it was against my design, and because I saw you against your intention, I should not have perhaps remembered you of that accident; which exposed so innocent a person to your anger. "How (said she with a blush that covered her whole face) we have but two times met, and at the first you saw me in a condition, in which no man ought to have seen me, and at the second, I found my self in your arms. "You see, replied I, what fortune hath done for me, and you ought not to envy me her favours, since I purchase them by the loss of a happiness which is very dear unto me. "I should be very sorry, said she, that the service you have rendered us, should cause you any loss or displeasure, and I know that it is great enough, to merit a larger acknowledgment than I can possibly testify: but I should have been very much obliged to you; if you had not confest'd to me the first accident: and although I see you without resentment, it will be very difficult for me ever to see you without being ashamed. "I must then (said I with a sad accent) estrange my self at a great distance from your sight, when my presence will be no farther necessary, and I will do it Madam, as soon as I may, without exposing you to some danger. I uttered these words with such marks of sorrow, that they touched the Lady's heart which I took for the Mother, and who by all her Actions seemed very grateful to the service I had rendered her: So likewise taking upon her to speak with a very obliging countenance; "My Lord, said she, you must somewhat pardon the Modesty of a young person, that was not by her fortune accustomed to find her self in a man's Arms: but I pray think not, that the shame that she mentioned will take away in the least from the acknowledgment she owes you. "No my Lord, (added my most admirable and unknown Mistress) the shame of a misfortune which befall me, will not render me ungrateful for a benefit, and I could wish you were not of our Enemies Party, that I might find occasions to manifest my gratitude.

And

And if it be true (added the other Lady with an inward smile) that you have preserved ever since our first encounter, that affectionate remembrance you would persuade us to believe: I cannot imagine how your heart could yield to the resolution of coming hither to war against us. I came said I, because I was born a subject to the King of Suevia, and that I could not in duty disobey him who commanded me to follow him, giving me a command very considerable in his Army: and I came rather, because I flattered myself with a belief of meeting some happy occasion to see you, and serve you, than to offer you any particular injury; not believing you had any more than a common interest in this war: Nor have we any other (replied my fair Mistress very readily) but as you appear to me an extraordinary personage, and that I have seen few whose deportment speaks more to their advantage, I could perhaps have wished you were not an Enemy to Pharamond; and possibly if you knew him, it would be difficult for you to be so. I shall be, said I, no farther his Enemy than my duty constrains, and to so great a King as he, an Enemy like me will be little considerable. I was unwilling to enlarge myself upon this subject, lest I should enter insensibly into a debate of the several powers of love and duty: and seeing that Timanthus had perform'd the orders I gave him, in recalling the scattered servants of the Lady, and in causing those who guided the Chariots, to return to their several duties; I enquir'd of the Ladies what they had farther to command me, but I asked them so movingly, that they might easily perceive the repugnancy I had, to forsake the person that I loved; and the elder Lady taking hold of the occasion, My Lord, said she, you know that our intentions must be submitted to yours, and as we are your prisoners, we have no intention to make you lose those advantages you may gain by our ransom, we will not so much as obscure from your knowledge the quality and rank we hold in the King of the Franks Court: and through the confidence which I have in your virtue, I will confess that I am called Theodomira, wife to Priam, a Prince of the Royal Family of the Franks, that one of these Ladies is my daughter, and that she whom you carried in your Arms, and who for her beauty has merited from you a more particular esteem than the rest, is my Niece Blefinda, whose nearest consanguinity, and greater merit, renders her as dear to me as if she were my own. Now you have understood thus much, dispose of our liberties as your virtue shall direct you, and believe, that after this obligation we have to you, there are few things which you may not hope for our Ransome. I should set perhaps so high a price, replied I, with a smile, that you'd have much of difficulty to resolve the payment, and for this reason it is necessary that I satisfy myself, and that I pay as the price of your liberty, the loss of my own. In the mean time, you may be pleased to tell me the place where you design to retire your selves, and to permit me to guard you till you are out of danger: Oh! 'tis too generous, replied the divine Blefinda, and I am confident the King of the Sueves will never approve your proceedings. That may be, said I, but I know Prince Viridomar will approve them, and I hope he will make my peace with the King, if this action should come to his knowledge. If you fall into any disgrace for what you have now done, added the Princess Theodomira, you shall find a retreat with us, and I shall persuade Blefinda to see you without being ask'd. You will find therein much difficulty, said Blefinda blushing again, and you might safer promise him, that Prince Priam, and King Pharamond himself would be sensible, as really they ought to be, of his civil usage and deportment towards us. However it succeed Madam, said I to Theodomira, I shall remember the promise you make me, and shall mind you of it whensoever I am reduced to the necessity of accepting it. I shall not forget it, replied the Wife of Priam, and in the mean time, if you have the bounty to cause us to be conducted to the City of Arttaune, which is not far from this place, you will complete the entire glory of your generosity: And I assure my self that Prince Priam my husband will testify to you, those acknowledgements to which he is obliged. After these words which inform'd me of the place where they designed to retire, I mounted on horseback with my men, whom I caused to march at a great distance behind me under the command of Timanthus, having made them observe the like distance all the while we discoursed, and having commanded those who drove the Chariots to keep the road that led to Arttaune; I marched by them, feasting my eyes with the sight of my most dear, and most adored Blefinda: I plainly perceived that it somewhat disturbed her to see me, but methought, (or I was willing for my comfort to believe so) that this repugnancy, rather took its birth from the remembrance of that displeasing accident, than from a natural aversion. I had many things in my mind to have said to her, but beside the presence of Theodomira, and her train which hindred me; I found something so full of awe in her face, and of majesty in her person, that the privilege I had of being in a rank above her, could not make me dispense with as great a respect for her, as if I had known her to be the greatest Princess in the world: and when she turn'd her fair eyes upon me, as sometimes she did, to assure me that she was sensible of my civility; she did so daunt me, that I had not the confidence to disclose my passion, so that I satisfied myself in having given such proofs of my affection as could not permit her to doubt it, it, and in having said enough to make my self be understood by a person of a much meaner capacity : I had marched some time by their Chariots side, notwithstanding their entreaties to ease my self of that trouble, by giving them only a Trumpet or some other person in whom I might trust their safe conduct ; when Theodora looking upon me in a very obliging manner, But must we, said she, part from you, without the least knowledge of our generous defender ? or are the obligations we have received, of so small importance to leave us in ignorance of the person to whom we are indebted ? My name is so little known in the world (replied I to her) that I did not believe it necessary to let you know it, and it will not much improve your knowledge, to tell you I am called Almeric. I have heard much of that name of Almeric (said the charming Niece of Theodomira) and I know he is one of the Grantees both in the Court, and Army of the King of the Sueves. I told you before, (replied I with something of shame which always accompanys a Lye) that I had a very considerable command in the Army, but I did not believe that my name was known unto you, and I much less desire it should be so by exploits of war, than by those opportunities which might less attract your hatred. Our hate, replied Blesinda, can neither enter into comparison with the obligations we owe you, nor with the esteem your generous actions have given us of your person : but a person may make himself be blun'd, without making himself be hated, and the reasons of the one and the other, are not always alike disadvantageous. I did judge by many marks, added Theodomira, that you were no vulgar person, and every thing appears so extraordinary about you, that I can hardly believe your Prince's person, of whom fame publishes so many wonders, is so compleat as yours. And I am confident, replied I suddenly, that the Princess Polixena, whose beauty is so loudly noised, is not half so fair as Blesinda's. “The Princess Polixena (replied Blesinda blushing) hath many more advantages over Blesinda, than Viridomar perhaps over Almeric : or rather, answered I, Viridomar hath more over Almeric, than Polixena over Blesinda. “However, added Theodomira, I could wish Almeric were Prince Viridomar, that we might the better acknowledge our obligation to our generous protector. “You might wish at the same time, said I, that Blesinda were Polixena, and though you should put the wish farther, I am confident that neither Almeric nor Viridomar would disclaim it. “The inclinations of Viridomar are not conformable to yours, said Blesinda, for if they were, Theodomira believes we should not long have war, and perhaps that reason constrained her as much as her obligation to make that wish for you. “The disposal of peace or of war, said I, do not depend upon Viridomar, for you may have heard, that the King of the Sueves doth not square his intentions by those of his Son : But although his Son had his father's anger to fear, if he had seen what I have seen, and that Blesinda were Polixena, I am confident he would hardly wage war against Pharamond. We should have said much more, and I perhaps by the effect of a passion, very opposite to prudence, might have explained my self too far, if in advancing upon the plain, we had not discovered a body of two or three hundred Horse, which marched directly towards us. As soon as they discovered us they made a stand, and the followers of Theodomira presently inform'd her, that it was the Governour of Artanne, who came to meet her, with a Convoy which ought to have received her much farther, however retarded by some sinister accident. “It is because we went too far, said Theodomira, and I should speak it to our misfortune, if our meeting with generous Almeric, had not put it out of my thoughts. She then dispatcht one of her train to the Governour of Artanne, to entreat him to advance no farther, and commanding the Chariots to stop ; she entreated me to return, and thanked me for what I had done for her and her company, with such high marks of acknowledgment, as made me much ashamed of my self, assuring me, that Prince Priam her husband, who was then with his King in Bohemia ; and King Pharamond himself, who in all likelihood would come to the defence of his Country, would not miss of testifying their noble resentments of a generosity so little common : and if that fortune should minister any occasions to demonstrate unto me her particular acknowledgements, she would embrace them with such an excess of joy, as might sufficiently evidence she was not ungrateful. Blesinda her self with less fervency and fewer words, but with the best grace in the world, assured me that she was not insensible of the service I had done her, and when, with a face upon which the grief of this separation might make her discern a good part of what I endured, I took my leave of her, and entreated her with no small disorder, if not a visible extasie to remember her self once in her life, if it were possible, of a person that could never forget her the least minute of his, looking upon me with a smile intermingled with sweetness and rigour ; “Yes Almeric, said she, for more than one reason I shall remember you, and though we should know each other no farther ; I hope that you will not have cause to complain of me. She spoke these words, and gave me leave to depart with an Air so full of grandeur, that if I had not been blinded by my passion, I should have opened my eyes to the knowledge of the truth; and presently after, being unwilling to be seen nearer by the Franks, which came to convoy her, and who by Theodomira's order had still kept their station, I returned with a slow pace towards our Camp, so touch'd and dismay'd with this last adventure, that I was even lost to my self.

My love took such strength and vigour from this second encounter, that all I could do in opposition to it, could not possibly stop its course; and I not only omitted nourishing any kind thoughts for Rosamond, whose Beauty was incessantly sounded in my ear, but that I even forgot to preserve any for my self, giving my self entirely up to my passion. I was in this very condition when I gave Battel to Eufogaius, which, as you know, I won with as great advantage to us, as loss to our Enemies; and a few days after, having rejoyn'd with the King, we march'd according to his will, which I wanted power to oppose, to lay Siege to Peapolis; within a few days we knew that the Princess Polixena, whose Beauty fame had already loudly sounded, was there immured; and I learn'd also, that Princess Theodomira, and by consequence, that Blessinda which I adored, was in the same City which we assaulted, and happily as much expos'd as the rest, to the calamities of a Siege. This thought gave me so much of affliction, that I could not conceal it from the King, though I always disguis'd the cause; and I acted all things in this Siege with such a reluctancy, that the besieged had opportunity enough to make thereby their advantages. I know not what I had in fine resolv'd, but as fortune would have it, that the King received at that instant Letters from Suevia, and from the King of the Cimbrians, which made him judge, that his presence was necessary in Suevia; and as he believed me capable for the conduct of that War, he yielded it entirely to me, and only with part of his Domesticks he took his way towards Suevia, having first with too much heat exhorted me to the revenge of Vindimir, and the destruction of Pharamond. When I found my self at liberty and alone, I made war in another manner than before we had done, or rather, I made none at all, giving the Besieged marks enough to know, that I either spar'd them, or warred against them against my own will. I sent Trumpets almost every day to the Princess Polixena to entreat her to go forth of the besieged City, and to retire her self into any other place of security where she pleas'd, not doubting, but that if she carried Ladies with her, as I gave her free leave, Priam's Lady would be one of the first, and with her my adored Blessinda; but she always answer'd me with a great deal of resolution, that since the King her Brother was absent, she would hold his place even till death, and that she knew how to bury her self in the ruins of her Country, before she'd receive any courtesie from her Enemies. In fine, I was in a strange perplexity, and if on the one side I could not resolve to assault that City, wherein all that I loved was immured; on the other, I answer'd very ill, by the event of a Siege of that importance, the opinion which the world had conceived of me, and that fame, which some actions sufficiently great and happy, had given me.

Besides, I was ashamed to make war in his absence, upon an Enemy whose presence I ought to seek if I desired to raise my self to glory equal to his; and I knew not in fine what resolution to have taken, if I had not learn'd in that very time, when my resolves were most wavering, and most unsettled, that King Pharamond march'd with his Forces to the defence of his Country, that he had pass'd the Mountains which inclose the Countreys of the Boians, and that he came on apace by great marches to fight me. It is certain, dear Sister, and I speak it without design of extolling my valour before you, that this news gave me more joy than I had ever received in my life: and although my affection seem'd to engross and monopolize my heart, I felt that the name of Pharamond had begot such an emulation, that the love of glory awakened with all her Forces in my Soul, had suspended those of my affection, to make me pursue its inspirations. I found there a double opportunity to satisfy my inclinations; and I could not forsake a Siege, towards which I had so much aversion, upon fairer occasion than to fight this great Enemy, whose glory fill'd the whole earth, and upon whom I ought to revenge a Brother's death: I straight departed to meet him with our choicest Troops, and I left the remainder before the City, as well to hinder Eufogaius from following me in the Rear, as he might have done, as not to draw my Father's anger entirely upon me, who had prohibited me, upon pain of his eternal displeasure, the forsaking that Siege. You know, Sister, at full all that pass'd there, I saw Pharamond, I fought him, both in a set Battel, and single hand to hand, and I found him much greater than fame had proclaimed him. In the particular Combat I had no disadvantage, and I may say, I lost not the Battel, though the Franks had something the advantage upon the Sueves; and if I withdrew next day towards the City, where I had left the rest of my Army, it was not in a manner of flight, but like one, that with a part of his Army could could not keep the Field in that Country, against an Enemy that was Master thereof, that strengthened himself every day therein, and to whom every thing was favourable; and like one that had need to rally his scattered Forces, and to joyn with those which he expected within few days from Suevia, not to give too great advantages to an Enemy, against whom there was nothing of diligence to be neglected.

Some few days after he assaulted me in my Camp with a Lion-like force, and the valour of a great Commander, where again we met in the Combat man to man; and the world knows, dear Sister, that I was not vanquished. As for the Battel, I confess, victory at first inclined more to his side than mine; but the recruit which arrived to our Camp near the end of the Combat, rendred me in a condition to dispute it more strongly than ever, if he had not thought fit to retire as well as we. I reaped more satisfaction by these two great proofs of my valour and fortune against Pharamond's, than ever I got in all the actions of my former life; and although I had won many Battels, and obtained complete Victories, I ascribed more of Glory to my self for these two Combats, though I had in neither the advantage, than in all that I had more happily performed against other enemies. I had even the belief to flatter my self, that the Franks were more valiant than the Sueves, especially in the defence of their own Country, which caused them to make many extraordinary endeavours, and that Pharamond was no ways more valiant than I.

To manifest this opinion to the whole world, and to seek with more glory the revenge of Vindimir, I resolv'd a third time to prove the strength of Pharamond, without any obstacle which might hinder (as before) the success of the Battel; and by a challenge which I sent him, I invited him to a personal Combat with me. You know, dear Sister, and the world knows the success thereof, which doubtlesly had not been advantageous to me, if they had not had that good opinion of me, rather to attribute the misfortune to my love, than to any second cause. But to inform you of more than reach'd the publick ear, I shall tell you, that the day which preceded our Combat, whilst a truce for three days gave a free commerce between the City and the Camp of the Franks, I learn'd that the Princess Polixena was come to visit the King her Brother in his Tents, and that she resolv'd to be a Spectatrix of our Combat: I also knew that Theodomira was with her, and by this reason concluded that my sprightly Blessinda was there too. This imagination created in me a kind of joy, besides the hope which I had to see her, which could not but be very desirable, for as it is natural for us to desire to engrave a good opinion of our selves in the hearts of those we love, so I hoped to make her see by this fair opportunity which offer'd it self, that I was not altogether unworthy of her esteem: but informing by self by chance that very day of Polixena's Beauty, by persons that had often seen her, I found it by their description to resemble Blessinda's; and not hearing any mention made of Blessinda, who for her admirable Beauty, and her near alliance with the Princess Theodomira, merited a particular notice, my fancy was immediately touch'd with a suspicion of the truth, and I believed it not impossible, but Blessinda might really be Polixena, and that it was very difficult, there should be a Blessinda so fair as that appeared to me, whose Beauty fame had not proclaimed. All her proceedings so great and majestic, and her words which then return'd to my memory, sufficiently confirm'd me in this opinion; but soon after, other considerations presented themselves to my thoughts, which contradicted it; for besides, the little likelihood which I found, that the Sister of so great a King should be expos'd to such dangers as she had run, methought the sincerity which Theodomira had used in discovering her self to me, was very opposite to this deceit in concealing Polixena; and though I was not ignorant, that there were greater reasons to obscure the Sister of a King, than the Wife of Priam, and that by my proceeding I might judge of hers, yet methoughts there appeared such a reality in the actions and visage of Theodomira, and that she had so little reason to be diffident of me, that I could not entertain a belief that she had deceiv'd me. To Timantibus I communicated my perplexity, who found on every side as many reasons for doubt, as my self. I knew not whether I should desire Blessinda to be Polixena, for if on the one side by this equality of our Birth, I found a much greater facility to my happiness, and a kind of satisfaction in not having debas'd my self in my inclinations, on the other side, I had causes to fear all things, in loving the Sister of Pharamond, Vindimir's Murtherer, with whom the King my Father would neither admit alliance nor society, and a Princess that might her self hate me for the war I made upon her Country, and for the ardent desire I testified to fight her Brother.

Amidst these contrarieties of opinions, and of desires, I knew not what I ought to believe, nor what I ought to desire; for as that person I loved was unknown to me, so was it universally understood, that I loved not that Beauty which was propos'd as a period to my hopes, I resolv'd in the device which I caus'd to be put upon my Shield, to represent the state of my fortune, which was thus, turning my looks from the bright Rays of that Sun which enlightened all the Hemisphere, I abandoned my self to my Destiny, which lead me towards another Sun wrapp'd up in Clouds, with these words,

Where ever my Destiny shall call me.

In this uncertainty of thoughts I pass'd a night full of disquiet, finding much reluctancy in my self to resolve to combat Pharamond, believing that I had fought him too much already, if I were the Lover of Polixena: but as I found no means in that small time which remained to clear this doubt, and that from so formidable an Enemy I could make no retreat which would not be ill interpreted, I resolv'd to tempt my fate, and to surrender my self up to the Gods, to Love and Fortune. With this resolution I appeared in the Field, where I entred in a most remarkable Equipage, and in the course I made against Pharamond I had no disadvantage; but when with Sword in hand we came towards each other, and that in passing under the Scaffold of Polixena, where I cast up my eyes to clear my doubts concerning her person, I found my real, yet false Blessinda; I was struck in such a manner, that all the strength of my courage was unable to defend me: all the thoughts of Combat, or of War against the Brother of Polixena, vanish'd in a moment from my Soul; and when he came fierce as a Lion towards me, to finish the Combat, I rather found my self in a condition to present him my naked Breast, than to lift my Arm for my defence against him. His Generosity, although he was ignorant of the cause, would not make advantage of the disorder he found me in, neither did he refuse to remit till the morrow the sequel of the Combat, when I assured him that I was not then in a condition to continue it.

Some persons might have heard the words, which the knowledge of Polixena caus'd me to utter, all the world saw my behaviour, and every one judg'd thereof according to their different thoughts: it was the more astonishing to all those that view'd it, for that they believed it was in that first instant of Polixena's fight, that my heart had been stricken with love, and that this love had made me forsake the Combat; if the chance had been so, there had been really a great subject of astonishment; not but that the beauty of Polixena was great enough to give a love at first sight, and that even according to my opinion, she who gives it not from the first day, will never give it: but I must have had more time than in that conjuncture I could have, and more liberty to observe her, than so redoubtable an Enemy as I had before me could permit. I retreated out of the Barriers (as it was well known) and retir'd my self into our own Camp, amidst a Sea of thoughts wherein I found my self plung'd.

The principal Officers of the Army, who immediately came about me, and who with much of surpris'e had seen my behaviour, and nevertheless retain'd too good an opinion of me, to attribute the cause of this accident to fear, yet gazing on me without speaking, they seem'd to ask much more by their silence, than they could have done by their discourse; and as I had no design to discover my self to the whole world, I left them in liberty to judge thereof as they pleas'd, and lock'd up within my breast whatever then presented it self, either made for my comfort, or for my torment: but as I distinguish'd Haldan from the vulgar, as much for his Birth, his Rank, and his Merit, as because he was Husband to Artemira, whom I had much esteem'd, and that he really appear'd very affectionate to my interest; I declar'd to him what he was as much a stranger to as the rest, and having made him the recital of all that which had happen'd to me in the love of the Princess Polixena, little different from that I now made you; I not only told him that I had no design to return the morrow to the Combat against Pharamond, but that I would willingly redeem with half my blood what I had already act'd against him, and that instead of having an intention personally to make war in his Country, I could not endure that our Army should make any longer stay, and therefore whatever I might fear from the King's anger, to which I would not expose my self, I desired him as a testimony of his friendship, to break up the Camp the next day, and to march back into Suevia. Haldan with much astonishment list'n'd to the beginning of my discourse, and became in course of my opinion, no ways admiring that so great a Beauty as Polixena, had had the power to beget an affection, nor did he find it strange, that the excess of love I had for the Sister, should make me unwilling to make war against the Brother: but he judg'd like me of the King's severity, and did not doubt but that the height of his displeasure might transport him to great extremities. He even fear'd both for himself, and the other Officers, that in marching back the Army they should find themselves expos'd to a great part of his rage, and he gave me sufficiently to understand that he would not have run this hazard upon any other account, than to do me so considerable a service. But I abated much of this fear, by telling him, that since the King at his departure had both commanded him and the other Officers, to receive upon all occasions my orders, and to obey me as his own person, he could not blame them for retreating back with the Army by my said order, which I would give him in writing, and in what form he desired. He dispos'd himself to obey me, and in order thereunto, by his advice, I discours'd with the other principal Officers concerning the return of the Army, which I left to their conduct, and they, though with a fear equal to his, resolv'd at length to obey me, and prepar'd themselves accordingly. Day being done, I pass'd the night full of uncertainties, upon judgments which I had to make of my condition, and of the trouble about those new affairs to which my passion had expos'd me, and of irresolution upon those ways I was to take, to find some satisfaction in this love, to which I had sacrific'd all things.

But as nothing touch'd my heart so near, as the displeasure I had to see my self in Arms against the Brother of Polixena, I suspend'd the memory of all other things to satisfy that; and no sooner did I perceive the day break, but I labour'd to send away the Army: and when Pharamond was preparing himself to return to the Combat, he received that little Note, of which you have heard so much speech, and I may repeat it to you, because it is very short.

Prince Viridomar to King Pharamond.

P*Pharamond*, thou hast deprived my Brother of his life, and thy Sister hath given me my death; consider in what a manner thy House triumphs over ours, and do not expect to be encountered by a person who prosecutes no longer the revenge of Vindimir, and who disputes no farther with you your interest in Rosamond.

At the same time I sent these few lines to Pharamond, I resign'd the conduct of the Army to Haldan, and I mounted on Horseback with only Timanthus, and two others, appointing the rest of my Equipage to follow Haldan into Suevia, where I told them I would suddenly overtake them. Hitherto, Sister, you have had some knowledge of part of my actions, because they appear'd in publick, and it was that which caus'd the disorder and confusion in my recital: but as you can have learn'd nothing of what remains for me to tell you; I shall discourse it to you in a better method.

If you should ask me, Sister, with what intention I took Horse, and for what place I was design'd, when I departed from Peapolis, I should be somewhat puzzled to answer; and I shall only tell you, that having then no other design in my Soul, than to cease to be an Enemy to Pharamond, and to repair what was pass'd by deeds quite contrary to those which might have given him a just cause of hatred, I only thought to absent my self far from those places where I had warred too much, to seek out means to give some satisfaction to my love; and without having determin'd any thing, neither as to one, or t'other design, I expected as much from my courage as I could hope, and left the rest to Heaven and fortune. I had no intention to return into Suevia, not only because I knew I should be ill received of the King, having so ill follow'd his instructions, but because this journey deprived me of the means to see Polixena, who at that time took up all my thoughts, and from whom I could not without much difficulty absent my self: I was unwilling to go to King Pharamond, not that I doubted his generosity, nor that I fear'd any thing of unkindness from him, contrary to the grandeur of his Soul, but because (although I no longer made war against him) honour did not permit me to associate my self with him, whilst he had war with my Father.

But I could have been well pleas'd to have waited on Polixena, without being seen by Pharamond, and this was it which most perplexed me, not doubting but that through the peace which the Princess would soon enjoy, the King of the Franks would for some time take a progress about her Country, and visit his Cities, the people after so many years absence most eagerly desiring it, and that the Princess his Sister would always accompany him, or at least be as little distant from him as was possible. Neither did I know, though

fortune should be so favourable to give me an opportunity to see her, under what name to present my self to her, or that of Almeric, or Viridomar. Under that of Almeric, the quality of a private person, prohibited me to hope from Polixena, what I might have hoped from Blessinda; and on the other side, this Almeric, whose name I borrowed, had been killed in battel by Pharamond's own hand, at the head of a Wing of Horse which he commanded; and as he had always kept that degree, which rendred him remarkable to all the world, his death was no less known in the Camp of the Franks, than in ours. Under that of Viridomar, although I did not doubt but Polixena had a large and generous Soul, I feared some remains of a resentment against an Enemy, who had caused so much desolation and damage to her Country, and who had so often assaulted the person of the King her Brother; and though I had some hopes, that through the satisfaction I had made, she might have pardoned me in part; I thought however, that a Virtue so scrupulous as hers, would with much difficulty frame it self to endure a private suit, without the approbation of the King her Brother; since even by reason of that happiness which I had to see her bathing, she could not suffer my sight without reluctance, after so considerable a service. The remembrance of the offers made me by Theodmira, and of the assistance which I might hope from her, brought a kind of relief to my disquiet; and when I called to mind the affection with which she fastened this assurance upon me, I flattered my self with a hope which afforded me some content: but fate had designed it for my misfortune, that I should wound Prince Priam her Husband with my own hand, in the first Battel which I gave to Pharamond; and though she did not accuse Almeric for his wound, she too well knew that he had received it from Viridomar, and could not in fine know me for what I was, without looking on me as a person that had exposed her to so sensible a grief. This diversity of thoughts which disturbed my mind, and this uncertainty, which of the two names I ought to assume, made me to loiter some days in Franconia, without determining what resolution to take; and as my equipage could hardly give any suspicion of my quality, I freely visited many Cities in that Country, expecting what the Heavens would inspire me, or some favourable occasion to make me take a resolution.

I knew not very well what I should in fine have done, for I still found difficulties sufficiently great in every design which I contriv'd: but in reapproaching Peapolis, after I had taken a great circuit by the side of Franckfort, Mogunce, and some other places near the Rhine, I learn'd that King Pharamond, upon the news of the great Forces which the King of the Cimbrians had raised against him, was gone to visit the Frontiers; and that upon a belief which they had, that he could not suddenly return, the Princess Polixena, who loved much more a Country than the City Habitation, was retired to Fenuse, a Royal Seat, distant one days journey from the City, and situated upon the Banks of Tiberon, somewhat near the place where that River discharges her self into the Mein. I likewise knew that the principal Ladies of the Court had accompanied her, and particularly the Princess Theodmira, who left her as little as was possible, and whom for her fair qualities; and the care she had taken in her education, she loved rather like a Mother than a Kinswoman; that together with Theodmira, the Princess Artesinda her Daughter, who is a very beautiful person, and the very same which I had seen with the Princess Polixena in the River, and Laomira Daughter to Basogastus were there also, and that the Court would be both full and pleasant. This news which seemed to offer me the conveniency which I had so long desired, gave me sufficient contentment, and although from Theodmira I feared some resentments against Viridomar for the wounds of Priam, I would nevertheless venture to present her Almeric, and recal to her memory the retreat she had offered him; and because that at Fenuse besides the Royal Palace, there is a very large Town not much inferior to a City; I thought I might there lodge my small attendance, till an occasion offered it self for me to go to the Castle, and shew my self to Theodmira, by whom I only intended to be presented to the Princess. As I had resolved it, I put it in execution; and through the care of my men which I had sent before, I found a convenient Lodging near the Castle, where I pass'd a night full of all those passionate motions, which my desires, and the hopes to see a Beauty that I adored, could possibly raise in me; and in the morning as soon as I thought the Ladies in a condition to be seen, I went to the Palace, going as I was guided, to Princess Theodmira's Apartment. Neither she, nor the Princess of the Franks had ever seen me out of Armour; and that day it not being necessary, nor indeed very convenient to go armed to such a place, I had clothed my self in a habit very rich, and much in the fashion, which through the care we take to please those whom we love, had nothing of very negligent about it: this made me, as I pass'd, to be observed more than I cared for, and obliged those persons to whom I addressed my self, to shew me more civility than was requisite to my remaining unknown. For

For the rest, neither in the carriage of our persons, nor in the accent of our tongues, are we very different from the Franks, and I spoke their language well enough to make me pass for a Native of that Country, so that very few amongst them took me for a stranger: and the first of whom I enquired the appartinent of Theodmira, offered himself most officiously to be my guide where I might speak with her. As soon as I was in her chamber, and that she had cast her eyes upon me she knew me, and putting from the place where she was, with a voice which denoted astonishment, “Oh! Almeric, said she, is it possible that I should see you again? And at the same time coming towards me with open Arms, and believing her self obliged, to make me a reception more obliging, and more familiar than at our former encounters; she embraced me, and treated me with as much kindness, as she possibly could have shewn to Prince Genevand her son. I received her Caresses with all the submission that Almeric might owe her, but a little time after, withdrawing her self a little back, and looking on my face with some signs of astonishment; “But is not this an illusion, said she, that I have newly embraced, have we not all heard that Almeric by the King’s own hand lost his life in the Battel. “He that dyed by King Pharamond’s hand, replied I to her, was called Almeric like me; for that name hath been born by divers persons in Suevia: but you see Madam, that I am not that Almeric. “It is true, replied Theodmira, that by the report made to us of his age, and the make of his person, we concluded that it was another of your name, or else (added she with an inward smile) we should not so soon have left mourning for the loss of a person to whom we stand so much obliged. “You are not, said I, obliged to me for having only rendred what I owed, and what every man born of a noble blood, would have done for you as well as I. But although that service doth not (for this reason) merit your remembrance, it hath nevertheless produced the effect which I feared, and my King thereby hath been so exasperated against me, that all my friends and Prince Uridomar himself, who is not in the best condition, did not believe there was any safety for me in Suevia.

I mused some time what Sanctuary to take, and remembering my self in fine of the offer you had made me, I thought that you would not be displeas’d, if I came to spend some days with you, in expectation of my peace being made with the King: or till the Prince his Son should be in a condition to give me a retreat, or until I might find one elsewhere, which may not perhaps be very difficult. Whilst I was speaking in this manner, Theodmira gave sufficient proof in her countenance of the content she received in my discourse; and as gratitude had worked upon her soul, all those effects it could possibly produce in a worthy mind, she could not but hear with a great deal of pleasure, the occasion which fortune had offered her to witness her resentments. She made it appear to me by new Caresses more obliging than the former, and when she took upon her to explain her self farther; “In truth, said she, you could never have seconded the first kindness you did for us, with any other more obliging or more grateful than this: and we are much more indebted to you, for having sought out this little retirement with us, than you to us for granting it. So that I not only confirm to you with all my heart, the offer I made you at our last parting, but I likewise assure you, that Prince Priam my Husband, and Genevand my son will not omit to render you what from them is due to our preserver: and that the King himself like a noble Prince will let you know how sensible he is of any service done to the Princess his Sister. “I have reason Madam, said I, to hope by your own proceedings, that the actions of all yours must be very generous: And I doubt not but that King Pharamond will act in this affair, as he acts in all other, but as for divers reasons I am constrained to obscure my retreat, if you will permit me I would keep it as secret as possible. “You will be content at least, (said she smilingly) that Blesinda should have knowledge of your being there, for I do not believe you have designed to conceal your self from her. “For Blesinda, replied I, I may have some reasons if you approve them to shew my self to her: But for the Princess Polixena, I do not think fit to hazard it after the faults which your deceit made me commit. “I deceived you (said she) by an order which I could not violate; and it was of great importance in such an encounter, that the Sister of a King should be concealed: but you saw plainly that when I spoke of my self and family I was sincere. However it were, I assure you that this deceit hath worked no bad effect for you, and that if Blesinda can behold you without being ashamed, Polixena will see you without any ill will. And of this I am so well persuaded, that I will defer no longer to give her notice of your coming, and so advance the joy which you will receive from her sight. And at the same time without expecting a reply, she left me with the Princess Artesinda her Daughter, whom I very respectfully saluted, and she gave me a very civil reception (although the same accident gave her a part in the bashfulness of Blesinda) and after she had entreated me to stay with her daughter till her return, she went into the Princess Polixena's Chamber, Artefinda, who to a great deal of beauty, had an equal proportion of wit, testified unto me in the most obliging terms her particular resentments: and some of those maids being present, which had shared in the relief I had given their Ladies, made it appear to me both by their discourse and Actions, that they had not forgot it: But they had not then much time, although it seems always tedious in the expectation of a happiness we much desire, for Theodmira coming soon after to call me, gave me her hand, and led me to Polixena's Chamber. I followed all the way trembling, although I desired nothing so vehemently as to go to the place where she led me: And as methought, I used a second deceit to the Princess, in hiding again from her Viridomar under the shape of Almeric, I entred her Chamber with many marks of fear, which she might have perceived upon my face, had she but well observed it. My sight at first begat a blush, which as I judged, was raised by the remembrance of that first accident, which neither she nor I could ever forget, yet nevertheless she gave me a reception full of civility and sweetness: and though I saluted her as Almeric ought to salute her, and not as Viridomar might have saluted her, she appeared with less fierceness under the personage of Polixena, than of Blesinda. The generosity of her Soul without doubt produced this effect, and as she was but newly informed by Theodmira, that through the service I had rendred her I had lost the Liberty to return to my Country, and was reduced to seek for shelter elsewhere, she was willing to sweeten her natural fierceness, and make her struggle with the remembrance which gave her some trouble to see me, to let me understand that I was to expect all that from her acknowledgments, which Theodmira had made me to hope. Upon this consideration, without doubt looking with a favourable eye upon me; "I am very glad, said she, that you have not forgot us, and that you are so just to make your retreat amongst those persons that had cauted your disgrace. I hope you will not find them ungrateful, and that if you will see the King at his return, he will not give you any cause to repent your good deeds. "Your bounty (said I unto her with a great deal of submission) makes me too much ashamed of my self, and in lieu of expecting here marks of acknowledgments, I ought to demand pardon for those faults, which my ignorance of the truth made me commit. "I plainly see (said she with a charming smile) that you remember still Blesinda, but if they used any deceit towards you, accuse none but my Cousin who deceived you: "Ah Madam, (said Theodmira unto her,) you know that I did nothing but by your order, and besides that which you gave me in parting, not to permit you to be known in case of any encounter: tell me before Almeric, did you not afresh (as we were getting into the Chariots) command me not to discover you. "All that you say is very true, said the Princess, but you know that I had sufficient reason to do it, although I had none to be distrustful of Almeric's virtue; nor am I satisfied that he hath not dealt to us the same measure, for we have sufficient subject to distrust him, seeing him return alive, after he had taken the name of a person that was slain some days before. These words put me into a kind of confusion, and to augment it, Theodmira undertaking to speak, whilst this little disorder obstructed my reply; "To return the like measure (said she to Polixena) it must have fall'n out, that Almeric had been Prince Viridomar, as Blesinda was the Princess Polixena: and if you can remember it Madam, I wished it in your presence. "I know not in fine, said I unto her, if I am obliged to you for this wish, nor can I believe it at present to be very advantageous for me. "The Prince of the Sueves is in all things so excellent, replied Theodmira, that there are few persons can be injured by that wish; for besides the grandeur of his birth and the glory of his Actions, which fame hath spread through the world, all that he hath done in Franconia appears to me so great, that though in the last Combat his face was hid by the Viser of his Helmet, his person appeared so fair upon his Horse, and all his deportment so majestick; that I believe there are few men in the world, which might not wish themselves to be the same, or to resemble him. "I am too good a subject, replied I, to dispute with you the praises which you allow my Prince: but all these advantages will never make me envy his condition, till I am assured that he is not hated by the Princess Polixena. "I shall answer you sincerely, said the Princess, that the first Actions of the Prince of the Sueves against us, and the eager desire which he manifested to fight hand to hand with the King, had begot in me such a resentment against him, as might well have grown to a perfect hatred: but by the last Actions he perform'd in quitting the Combat against the King, and restoring peace to our Country, he might easily have reconciled himself to me, if in that short Letter, so much noised in the world, he had not writ something which displeas'd me. "Ah Madam (said I unto her with an action sufficiently passionate) is it possible that a person so divine as your self, could be capable of so great an injustice, and that you should nourish resentments against love, when you pardon injuries. "Although I could,

“replied the Princeſſ, pardon the ſentiments which Viridomar hath for me, if it be true that they be ſuch as he hath publiſhed them, I ſhould never approve the confidence he had to declare them to the whole world, and with a boldneſs which poſſibly wants a precedent. This Action of my Prince, replied I, was ſomething extraordinary, but to him it was of an indiſpenſible neceſſity, if he meant to preſerve his reputation: for as it depended upon the quitting a Combat, already begun againſt ſo brave an Enemy as King Pharamond, and the abandoning a War to which he was obliged, by a double obedience to his father, and to his King; ſo he judged, that he could neither perform the one nor the other, without manifeſting to the world that great cauſe which conſtrained it, and was only capable to juſtify it. It is true, added Theodomira, that it was of great importance to him to juſtify an action which might cauſe rumours, and judgments ſo diſadvantageous to his honour. He did all then for his own glory, replied the Princeſſ, but he had done much more for his love, in caſe that he had really any, if through a reſpect to me he had not publiſhed it, but rather expoſed to hazard an honour, which his former Actions merited perhaps enough to protect. This which you ſay Madam is moſt true, replied I unto her, and Viridomar had doubtleſſy done well, to have ſacrificed all his honour, as he hath ſacrificed unto you all things elſe: but perhaps in a paſſion which might diſturb his mind, he did not ſo nicely argue it: nor is Reason always predominant in an amorous ſoul. I know not if it were a ſenſe of this crime, which made him to abſent himſelf from you, as ſoon as he had made known his love: but in what place ſoever his diſgraces make him at this time wander, if he believes that he hath diſpleaſed you, I am confident that he is there with more afflicted, than with the anger of the King his father. I am extremely ſorry, ſaid the Princeſſ, that what he did for us ſhould expoſe him to this diſgrace, but he will make it ceaſe by forgetting us, for the ſight of Rofamond will eaſily raze from his Soul, all that which renders him criminal to his father. I was going to reply to this diſcourſe, with an eagerneſs enough to have diſcovered me, but I moderated my ſelf, by appearing leſs paſſionate in the concerns of Viridomar: ſo that I was only content to ſay very coolly; I cannot believe Madam, that the ſight of Rofamond nor of any other beauty, can work the effect you conjecture, and ſeem to deſire: but although the beauty of Rofamond were capable, I know that the Prince of the Sueves will not ſeek there his remedy, and that he too much deſires the friendſhip of King Pharamond to become his Rival. I believe, ſaid then Arteſinda, that it will not be very difficult for him to acquire the amity of the King, and if the Princeſſ were as favourable to him as he, he would not be much unfortunate. You paſs this Verdict, ſaid the Princeſſ to her, upon the diſcourſe you heard the King make after he had read the little Note, but you know that he is too noble to have ſpoke in any other manner, and you ought to attribute what he ſo largely expreſſed at that inſtant, to an exceſs of joy which he received, in finding himſelf quit of a Rival to whom Rofamond was deſign'd: But methinks we ſpend too much time in ſpeaking of a perſon, who happily at preſent thinks not of us, and it would be as juſt to aſk Almeric of his own concerns, as to entertain him with Viridomar's. I would not answer what I thought to this diſcourſe, for fear of diſcovering my ſelf too much: ſo that without oppoſition, I ſuffered them to change the ſubject of their diſcourſe, and having answered ſome queſtions which the Princeſſ asked me, concerning the reaſons which obſtructed my return into Suevia with the Army; I liſtned with a great deal of pleaſure, though with little deſign to benefit my ſelf, to the obliging offers ſhe made me, and to the aſſurance ſhe gave me, of the King's her Brother's acknowledgments, for the ſervice I had done her. She would not permit me to return to the lodging I had taken in the Town, but entreated Theodomira to take care of me as her Gueſt, ſince it was to her that I had firſt addreſſed my ſelf. Theodomira but too well acquitted her ſelf of her charge, and having provided me a lodging in the Caſtle, although ſhe knew me for no other than Almeric, yet my entertainment was little different from that which ſhe could have given to Viridomar.

Thus by a happineſs as great as I could deſire, was I obliged to remain near the Princeſſ, and from that time I had liberty to ſee her, if not ſo much as my paſſion made me to wiſh, as much at leaſt as civility did permit, or a man of my quality, to whom ſhe believed her ſelf extremely obliged, could demand: And dear Siſter it was by this ſight, and this converſation that my heart became more and more enflamed, and now perceiving a thouſand admirable qualities in this fair Princeſſ, which a ſlight enterview would not let me diſcover, I approv'd, as an effect of the beſt and moſt wary judgement in the world, all that which a paſſion born in an inſtant had made me perform. In effect Siſter, together with this charming beauty which had given the firſt ſtroke, and ſo much enchanted me, in a few days, I diſcovered an excellent wit, an admirable wiſdom, a generous bounty, a greatneſs of courage, not only much above her ſex, but ſuch as might ſhame ours in many reſpects, and a regularity in all her behaviour, which was much admired by the moſt prudent persons; upon knowledge whereof my love augmented, and through that increase of my affection, all the fears I had conceived of the King's severity, and of the oppositions which the enmity of our houses might raise, gave place to the sole fear of not being able to make my self be loved by Polixena.

This was in effect the only perplexity of my Soul, for as I did not doubt, by the advantages of the person beloved, but my affection would be approved by the whole world; I did not longer think of justifying it, either in the opinion of men, or in the apprehension of the King my father: but employed all my thoughts to combat a heart, which I perceived naturally very distant, from all those sentiments which love might infuse. It was here I met the greatest difficulties, not knowing how I ought to behave my self under the personage I presented: for although I did not doubt but that I had given the Princess occasion, to discern the love I had for her, both by my words and by my Actions, in our two first encounters, and that she had received this knowledge of love without offence, through the knowledge she had of my error. I knew withal, that what was pardonable to Almeric from Blefinda, would not be Venial from Polixena, and it was no longer time to continue that which my ignorance, upon occasions that sprung from a strange adventure, had made her suffer, and that few would endure it at a time when the danger was past, and where the assistance of the defender was no more necessary: So that I found my thoughts in a suspense which way to go, and what to resolve, whether I should endeavour to please her under the Title of Almeric, or whether I should labour for Viridomar, by justifying his Actions to the Princess, and discoursing advantagiously unto her, both of the grandeur of his love and of the merit of his person. I knew too well, that whatever resentment she had for the good office Almeric had done her, (if it were possible that his person were not displeasing unto her) she would never humble her thoughts to so unequal a person: and truly methought I ought not to have desired it, since the interest of Viridomar more nearly touched me than that of Almeric, and that Viridomar ought not to suffer Almeric to have the advantage upon him, nor even permit him to enter into competition with him. To forget the interests and personage of Almeric, whose person had been known unto her, who had had the happiness to have done her so great a service, only to speak of Viridomar, whose face she had never seen, and to whom her sentiments seem'd no ways favourable, appeared to me somewhat severe, for that I lost by that means, all which my good fortune or that service might have gained upon her soul, and it might be surprizing to her, to see me act a personage so opposite to that which might be expected from a person, who had but too much manifested the passion he laboured with.

Amidst these contrarities, I found my self for some days following disturb'd, without being able to determine what I ought to do: But methought in fine, that it made for my purpose, to render the person of Almeric (if it were possible) grateful to the Princess, without making the least mention to her of his love, and to extol with my utmost eloquence, the love and merit of Viridomar, that so when she came to the true knowledge of me, she might encounter with that love the merit and rank of Viridomar, which she had conceived to the person of Almeric, and meet in the person Almeric (which had not been disagreeable to her) the birth and glories of Viridomar, which could be no ways displeasing to her. This was my thought, and this was likewise my resolution, and from that moment I searched all occasions to please her, and omitted none which might better her opinion of Viridomar, or represent his affections unto her. This proceeding was much more pleasing to her, than the contrary could have been, and although naturally she was unwilling to hear any speak of love, she lent an ear with much more patience, to the discourse of Viridomar's affection, than she could have afforded to the love of Almeric: And I confess, that though I had designed to have acted otherwise, I should not have had the confidence to have done it, knowing the Princess's spirit so fierce, and so nice withal upon this occasion, that all the advantages which I might have pretended, were not capable to have secured me from her anger, if I had run the hazard. She no ways admired at my new manner of proceeding, judging that through the knowledge of her quality, I had corrected those passionate inclinations which I had testified for Blefinda, and although she might possibly believe, that my soul was not fully released from a mischief which had shewn it self so vigorous in its birth, she was glad to see that my respect did predominate over my passion, and that in my proceedings she found no cause to exasperate her against a person, to whom she believed her self obliged. I found my self nevertheless at the beginning sufficiently puzzled to act this personage, for I fancied that I acted somewhat contrary to my self, in serving Viridomar to Almeric's prejudice, and that after I had felt my self wounded by this beauty, I acted something unworthy my courage, in pleading to her the interest of another. I likewise endeavoured to do Viridomar the best offices to Theodomira which might be convenient; nor did I forget to justify as much as was possible, those wounds which he gave her Husband, by telling her, that in the heat of a Battel, no person could distinguish his Friends from his Enemies; that I my self, not knowing Prince Priam, might have acted in the same manner as the Prince of the Sueves; and that if he had been informed of his hurt, and known him (as I did) to be Husband to the Princess Theodomira, he would have questionless manifested a real sorrow for those wounds which he gave him. Theodomira hearkened most favourably to this justification, and as she was a very rational person, she told me, that these many years, both under the Reign of Pharamond, and of Marcomire his Father, she had been accustomed to see her Husband dangerously wounded, and that her resentments against the Prince of the Sueves, had lasted no longer than the danger which menaced her Husbands life, and that she had more easily left them, because his wounds were honourable, and that the person who gave them, could not be hated, nor with reason accused: and that for these reasons, I ought not only to believe that she had nothing of hatred for him, but assure my self, that none would be more favourable to him towards the Princess, than her self. And she was for the most part, really the first that put us upon the discourse, for the Princess, although she gave us liberty to speak our opinions, did never minister an occasion.

We walked one day in an Alley of the fair Gardens of that Palace, where the Princess keeping Theodomira on the one side, permitted me to walk by her on the other, when Theodomira, who knew well this discourse was not ungrateful unto me, surprisingly ask'd me, whether I did not know in what place the Prince of the Sueves resided at present; I demurred some time before I replied: but soon after, I cannot tell you, said I unto her, where his body is at present, but I can assure you, that his heart is not much distant from you; and that it is never absent from the Princess. You speak of Viridomar's heart, (said the Princess, with an inward smile) as if you were in it; I doubt whether he would avouch a quarter of what you have said. I should be very imprudent, replied I, to have spoke in this manner, without having had knowledge of his inclinations; for besides that which the Prince hath evidenced by those proofs which nothing can convince, he hath sufficiently explained himself to me, to answer this point with boldness. Although this might have been true, replied the Princess, it may not be so at present; and since the question is concerning hearts, there happen in the hearts of men greater changes than this, in less time than you have been absent from the Prince of the Sueves. It is not long, said I, since I had the honour to be with him; and that which cannot happen in a thousand years, can much less fall out in so few days. As he is a Prince that delights in war, and prefers honour above all things, said the Princess, I have reason to believe that the grand hurry of those high affairs, and the pursuit of Renown, may drive all other thoughts from his Soul. Till now, replied I, he hath delighted in war, and evidenced a sufficient passion for glory; but Madam, for your sake he hath both renounced the one, and the other, and could not, in my opinion, declare it in a higher manner than he hath done. He hath put an end to the war among us, added the princess, but as you once told me, he hath not forgot his honour for our sake, and as I have also told you, he had much more obliged me, if he had taken less care of his reputation. Ah Madam, said I, permit me to tell you, that were Viridomar without reputation, he could not be worthy to think of you, and that if he should forget it, he could not merit your esteem. I do not say, Viridomar ought to forget his reputation for us, neither am I so unjust to desire it, but I believe his fame was so sufficiently established in the world, that there was no need of what, by your confession, he did for its preservation. You judge of his fame, said I to her, much more favourably than of his affection, and it were to be wished in his behalf, that you were more favourable to his love, than to his reputation. If we should believe you, replied the Princess, I fancy he would not be very unfortunate, for you defend his cause so well, that you give us occasion to judge, that you are rather come to propagate his interest, than to flee the rage and anger of your King. These words begat a blush, and Theodomira having observed it; Confess truly, said she unto me, and so much the more sincerely, for that the Princess, if it were true, would have no cause to disgust it, or to blame you for it. I shall not agree to that, said the Princess, for I had much rather that he only came hither to visit us, than to serve the Prince of the Sueves. I shall tell you then sincerely, said I very promptly, that it was only a desire to see you, which brought me hither; and although my disgrace were really such as I related it, it was not a design to take Sanctuary, which I might have taken in another place, but to review what I had seen, a beauty which my memory could not lose, which made me abuse that offer which the Princess Theodomira with so good a grace had made me. I did observe, that the Princess blush'd at these words, because without doubt they revived our first adventure in her memory, which still gave her some little reason to be ashamed; turning my self to the Princess Theodomira; But to answer sincerely, said I, to what you have demanded, I shall con-

felt to you, upon the assurance you have given me: that really Prince Viridomar hath charged me with some Commissions for his service, and hath so well manifested unto me the excess of his love, that I dare answer as to the thoughts of his heart. All that you can imagine, Madam, of most tender and passionate can never come near what he hath represented unto me, and of necessity it must have touch'd me nearly, since it hath engag'd me to an employment so little conformable to my inclinations, which I should not have accepted for the world, if Bleilinda had continued Bleilinda, or that Almeric might have become Viridomar. These words, by which in speaking again for Almeric, I justified a manner of acting, towards which I had an aversion, made me to blush; and as I perceived that Polixena blush'd her self, In fine, Madam, said I, to divert her thoughts, for fear they might exasperate her, since you have made me confess so much, you must permit me to acquit my self of that which I owe my Prince, by telling you, that nothing but the love of Viridomar can be worthy of Polixena. I shall not represent unto you what his affection makes him at present to suffer; and though it is not much that he is deprived of a Father's favour, who will never pardon him, or that he should wander through the world, without knowing where to find the period of uncertain travels; yet it is severe, abandoning all things for your sake, that he dares not tell you, kneeling at your feet, that he dies for you; or that he should be ignorant, whether all this which he suffers for you, doth touch you with the least motive to pity, and that he should preserve a life which he hath given you, without knowing whether it be grateful unto you. I spoke in this manner, and through a passion which transported me, I was perhaps engaging my self farther than I ought, when the Princess looked upon me with an aspect which made me fear, that she had some suspicion of the truth: whilst that fear interrupted my speech; In truth, Almeric, said she, you acquit you well of the Commissions which are given you; and the Prince of the Sueves will be very unfortunate, if such an intercessor be unprofitable unto him. He hath much more to expect, replied I, from his own, than from my intercession; for he hath such a reputation in the world, as may easily persuade you, that he is not altogether destitute of merit. You speak modestly of his desert, replied the Princess, and exceedingly aggravate his love, whereas you ought to speak less of his love, and to be more just to his merit. It is Madam, said I, because I am charged to speak of his love, and not of his desert; and if you find me modest in speaking of his merit, you may likewise judge, that I speak not half that of his love, which he himself would persuade you, were he so happy as to be in Almeric's place. It is neither requisite, replied the Princess, for him, nor me, that he should be in Almeric's place; and surely you might wish things more advantageous to him, and less displeasing to me. These words uttered somewhat fiercely, suddenly struck me with a kind of grief, and keeping the silence which they impos'd on me, for some time: Theodomira taking her time, I pray Sir, said she, be pleas'd to clear a doubt which hath given me much disturbance, and to many other persons as well as my self, and tell me whether Prince Viridomar had not seen the Princess elsewhere, than upon the Scaffold, where she was seated the day of the Combat, and where, that moment he evidenced the effect which this sight had produced upon his Soul. This question, for which I was no way prepared, though I had much reason to have been so, entangled me more than all they had said to me, since I was near the Princess; and being altogether ignorant what answer to make, I remained for a time somewhat amazed; but Theodomira importuning me to answer: I know not, said I to her in fine, why you should rest astonish'd at this effect of so admirable a Beauty, which I hold able to produce much greater wonders. "I am of the same persuasion, replied Theodomira, concerning the Princess Beauty; but besides, having an Enemy so formidable as King Pharamond before him, that it was very difficult for him to have a moment free to receive such an impression, that were persons upon the Scaffold, which did hear the Prince of the Sueves say, "looking upon the Princess, Oh ye Gods! 'tis she her self: and these words seem'd to "denote sufficiently, that this was not the first time he had seen her. I cannot thereupon, said I, answer you precisely; and were there any secret which my Prince had confided to me, you might well pardon my not revealing it. "He is very happy, said the Princess then to me, "in having a friend like you, so faithful and passionate for his interests. I am Madam, said I, much more than you can believe, and would willingly forget all the interests of Almeric, for those of Viridomar. We had also more discourse, the remaining time we were together, and I often found my self much entangled by the questions they asked me, against which I was not sufficiently forearm'd.

In the interim I had observ'd, and more and more dayly did observe, the Princess to be touch'd with a sensible grief, and that it was not without much violence to her self she strove to dissemble it. I likewise saw very much in the visage of Theodomira, and that a kind of sadness was spread through the whole Palace. I shar'd immediately in their grief,

though the cause of their sadness was to me unknown, and I had in fine so great a disturbance, that I could no longer hide it; and as nothing could grieve Polixena without wounding me to the heart; I could not but observe, that often entering her Chamber, I found her eyes red with weeping, and that often through a remembrance which made her shed some tears, she would withdraw into her Closet, either to dry them, or give them a free course, without being much more cruelly afflicted than she herself felt; and having one day found her in the Closet of Theodmira in this sad condition, with only her and Artesinda in her company, and some time observed with an insupportable torment, the endeavours she used at my arrival, to conceal her afflictions; not being able in fine to master that which this sight had caused, I cast my self at the Princesses feet, and intreated her to pardon the passion that I had for her interest, which did not permit me, without dying, to be longer ignorant of the cause of her grief, if it were such at least as was lawful for a faithful person to enquire into. The Princess made me presently to rise, but continued some time without speaking to me, wiping her eyes with greater liberty, and having in fine consulted Theodmira by a look, and judged by her eyes, that she believed me worthy of a trust, she told me, That the grief I observed in her, (which she had endeavoured by the King's Command, and for other reasons to conceal as much as was possible) was caused by the imprisonment of Prince Marcomire her Brother, a Prince great and amiable for a thousand fair qualities, to whom she was bound by the most tender, and most powerful amity, which blood could introduce: that he was a Prisoner in Bohemia, not a fair Prisoner of War, but through the baseness and ingratitude of the King of the Cimbrians, who caused him to be seized in one of his Cities, where he remained in cure of those wounds he had received in fighting against Gondemar, and the Burgundians, for the liberty of the Princess of Suevia; and she told me in fine, Sister, the entire story (as it was reported to the King her Brother) of all that had happened to Marcomire, and made me understand, that it was only for your interest, and for those succours (which with the price of his dearest blood he had given you) that he was in the power of the King of Cimbria. She added, with a sufficient confidence of my fidelity, that it was for this reason King Pharamond was departed Peapolis, to march towards the Frontiers with a part of his Cavalry; and that he found himself reduced to cruel extremities, between his obligations to relieve a Brother, and his insupportable displeasure to war against the Father of Kesmond; that upon his departure, he had entreated her not to publish this accident, and to conceal her grief (for divers considerations) as much as was possible, and that for any other than my self, of whose good intentions she was conscious, she had made some difficulties of disobeying his orders.

This discourse of the Princess, which she accompanied with divers remarkable circumstances, made me as sensibly afflicted, as I had ever been in my life, as well by a participation of her grief, as through the necessity I saw of absenting my self from her, to search out occasions of serving her in the person of her Brother: But besides this, dear Sister, I must confess, that I thought my self thereto likewise obliged by your interest, and although I had not been amorous of Marcomire's Sister, I had nevertheless hazarded all things to relieve a Prince, that had so generously exposed his life for your defence, and that was seized against all the Laws of Honour by the King of the Cimbrians. Neither did I pause one moment upon the resolution which I took, but addressing my self to the Princess as soon as she had done speaking; I am too much obliged to your bounty, said I unto her, *for the honour you have done me, by informing me of the cause of your afflictions; and I assure you, that it passes from your Soul to mine, with a violence no less vigorous than those which afflicted you. It is not by words that I must testify it, for words would be very feeble, and weak upon such an important occasion, but because the service which you might receive from Almeric would be little considerable, I shall arm a person in your quarrel, more powerful than my self: And in the midst of this misfortune, I praise the Gods for the opportunity they give the Prince of Suevia, either to render you so grateful a service, or to die in the attempt of performing it; had he nothing of affection for you, he were obliged in honour to succour a Prince, who was only a prisoner for the services he had rendered his Sister; and if he did not owe in honour this succour to Marcomire, you might easily judge what his love would constrain him to undertake for the Brother of Polixena. Quite forsaken as he is, he hath yet some friends, and not only might arm a part of Suevia in his quarrel, if he pleased, but find as much obedience in the Army, as the King his Father could find there, and possibly he will put himself in a condition to go and break open the prison of Marcomire, malgré all the power and puissance of the King of Cimbria. If he be so happy as to render you this service, he will supplicate you to receive it without reluctancy, from a person, to whom the least opportunities to serve you, are a thousand* times more dear than his life; and if he forfeits his life in this design, I conjure you on his behalf, to receive the gift he will make you thereof, as a thing that may merit the honour to be accepted by you. I know in what corner of the earth to find him, and I should depart this very instant about that design, had I but day enough remaining to further my journey: But I shall take horse to morrow by break of day, and I give you my parol, upon which you may build an assurance, that Viridomar will either restore you Marcomire, or lose his life in the design. I pronounced these words with so passionate a behaviour, and with such a forgetfulness of the personage I presented, that I have oftentimes admired, how such intelligent persons as I discoursed with, could so long escape the knowledge of me; but, were it because their thoughts were very distant from the truth, or because the Princess her mind was taken up by her grief, I had the fortune to remain undiscovered.

The Princess nevertheless, looked upon me with a countenance which denoted the astonishment my bold promises had given; and after some few moments of silence, I am too much obliged to you (said she) for the passion which you testify for my interest, and as I am much engaged to you already, I should be exceeding glad likewise to owe you for my Brother's liberty, but as it is not perhaps so easie to perform, as you believe it, I am not of opinion that you should leave us upon that design, nor that you go to find out the Prince of Suevia, to give him a trouble which he will not happily entertain, with that willingness as you imagine: it is not but that I believe (through the good opinion I have of you) you are very well ascertain'd of all that you tell me, and that the Prince of Suevia is sufficiently generous, to undertake things most difficult, and most dangerous; but as in that design there may be much more hazard and danger than you can foresee, I should be very sorry to expose therein the person of so great a Prince, or to trespass on his generosity, and perhaps unsuccessfully. "I well perceive," said I very sorrowfully unto her, that you have no very good intention to do justice to that poor Prince, and that he hath very much to suffer, before he can touch your heart; but I do not despair, but this opportunity may contribute to his happiness, and whatever grief I resent in absenting my self so soon from you, I die with impatience to see him flye to those opportunities which may as much please you, as his actions hitherto have displeas'd you. Finishing these words, I departed from the place where I was; and though the Princess and Theodmira used some persuasions to detain me, I got privately from the Closet, to go and prepare my self for my voyage; after I had demanded liberty of the Princess, to take my leave of her that night, that I might depart the earlier next morning. I went to prepare all things for my departure, which would have mortally afflicted me, had I not divided my thoughts between the grief I had to absent my self from Polixena, and the hope (with which I flattered my self) of doing her a service, which might be grateful to her, and which might give me an assurance of presenting my self to her in my real person, and of acquiring King Pharamond's friendship, which ought of necessity to be gained, if I desired to be happy. It was not but that I foresaw great difficulties in the deliverance of Prince Marcomire, neither could I imagine by what means to perfect my design, without carrying matters to a great extremity; but I was determin'd, if easie means failed me, to make use of the most rigid extremes, and either perish in the attempt, or bring it (as I had lately promised) to a successful period: but for that time I had neither the trouble to employ my self therein, nor to depart Fenuse; for an hour after I had quitted the Princess, Genebaud, Son of Priam and Theodmira, a Knight full of valour and merit, who made himself known by many fair deeds under King Pharamond, arriv'd thither from the Frontiers where he had left the King, and brought news of Marcomire's liberty, who had (as it was said) been delivered by unknown persons in Arms, whilst they were conducting him by the King of the Cimbrians's order, from Egitina to Marobuda. This news restored joy to the Princess (as much at least as the absence of the King her Brother, and the part which she shared in the misfortune of his amours, might give her) and at the very same instant, she had the bounty to send one of her Train to inform me of it, and to assure me on her behalf, that the news was the more grateful, because it would obstruct my departure, and the trouble to which I design'd to engage my self. As I could not omit being very sensible of all her concerns, so I immediately shared a part of her joy; and if I saw my self on the one side, deprived of those hopes to render her so great a service, I saw my self on the other enfranchis'd from that grief I had conceived, to absent my self from her, at a time wherein I made so delightful and pleasant a stay, and from those troubles I was casting my self into, which would have expos'd me to all the hatred of the King my Father. As soon as I returned to the Princess, who made me a reception much more obliging than she had ever done before, and retaining a fresh memory of the offers which I had lately made her, she made me larger acknowledgments for this, than for all which I had done till that time, or had any intention to do in her service. Genebaud, was present, who having long since from his Mother and Sister, understood what I had done in their service, and having had no little desire to see me, through the advantageous character they had given him of my person, he carressed me in the highest manner as that time (the Princess being present) could permit, and an hour after in his Mothers apartment he gave me all those proofs of his esteem which he could possibly give, and demanded my friendship with the best grace, and in the most accomplish'd manner in the world.

The next morning, Prince Sunnon came from Peapolis to Fenuse to visit his Sister, and Ibere and Meroveus with him, all Princes like Priam and Genebaud, of the Royal Family of the Franks, whom King Pharamond had dispatcht with orders from the frontiers to make great Levies, and with these, divers other personages very considerable both for their birth and merit. The famous Priam remained still at Peapolis, where with Bisogastus he gave orders for the preparations of war, which in the opinion of all the world was pouring down in a short time upon Franconia, not only by the united powers of the Kings of Cimbria, and of Suevia, Pharamond's most cruel and inveterate enemies, but by the forces of divers other Kings, whom Rosamond's beauty had attracted to her Father's interest, and armed against their common Rival.

The Princess presented me to her brother, who by the relation he had had of the timely relief I gave his Sister, was already well affected towards me, and shewed me all those marks of acknowledgment and esteem, that I could have possibly expected from a well bred Prince: I received them not as Viridomar, but as Almeric ought to receive them: and besides that the merit of Sunnon, who for his goodly aspect, his valour, and all other fair qualities to none inferiour, was sufficient to render them very considerable; you may judge that I priz'd them much more as coming from the brother of Polixenz. I likewise tendred to Ibere and Meroveus, all those civilities that might be thought due from Almeric, and certainly through those advantages which raised them no less than their birth beyond the vulgar, I paid this duty without reluctancy, and especially to Ibere, whose valour I had tryed in the second Battel I gave Pharamond. Sunnon immediately assured me (as the Princess and Theodora had often before done) of what I had to hope, from the acknowledgements of the King his Brother: and finding somewhat in my person which did not displease him, he was unmindful of nothing that was probable to oblige me to him, offering me, upon the assurance which he had that it would be well approved, not only a secure retirement in his Court, but likewise employments enough considerable for the quality of Almeric, to make him forget his grief for what he had lost in Suevia. I answered these generous and obliging offers, in the same manner as I had replyed to those of the Princess, and nevertheless in such a manner, that I gave him only cause to believe that the engagements that I had to the Prince of Suevia, hinder'd me from accepting them. This fair Company met that night at the Princesses lodgings, where their first discourses were of the imprisonment and freedom of Marcomire, who after he had been delivered by unknown persons, whom those that conducted him took for Burgundians, had not as yet appeared in any place from whence they could receive any tydings of him, although he had had time sufficient (if he had taken that way) to have returned into Franconia: From these discourses of Marcomire, they passed to those of Viridomar, and as that which I had acted in Suevia, either in making war, or in concluding of peace, had been sufficiently noised to give matter of discourse, the discourse continued upon that subject, and Prince Sunnon addressing himself to the Princess with an extraordinary grace; In truth Sister, said he, beauty hath large advantages, and considering what yours hath done for your Country, you have reason to respect it: for in fine, Franconia had never seen so great an Enemy, nor the King never cop'd with Viridomar's equal. Polixenz made no reply to these words, and because the whole Company looked upon me as a person interested in what was said of my Prince, I judged my self obliged to a reply: and addressing my self to Prince Sunnon; It was rather my Lord (said I unto him) the good fortune of Suevia, than that of Franconia, which armed a beauty in our favour: and as there is no glory which ought not to yield to Pharamond's, that of Viridomar was in great danger, if love had not decided the Combat. I believe, replyed Sunnon, *they would have put themselves to no small trouble, and that the victory would not have been easily obtained: But if one may credit the testimony of King Pharamond, there is nothing in the world more great than Viridomar; and for my self by what I have seen of him in two battels, and in particular Combats, I confess that all his Actions have charm'd me. I perfectly hated him some days for the wounds of Priam, said Genebaud, and I would have given a part of my blood, to have fronted him in the battel. You might happily have been quickly weary of it (said the valiant Ibere) *if at least your fortune had been like unto mine, for although I had the glory to sustain some time the whole force of his valour, it was with the price of my blood, and with so little advantage to my self, that if the Combat had lasted any thing longer, the event on my part was much to have been feared. I have heard the Prince of Suevia speak of it, (said I to Ihere) in another manner than your modesty permits you to discourse it, and I know he was as much satisfied of your valour, as he would rest unsatisfied of his own, if he knew it had procured him the hatred of Genebaud. Although I had conceiv'd a hatred, replied Genebaud, it could not have been so lasting, for that which Viridomar hath since that time done, must of necessity have razed it from my memory. As for my self, added Meroveus, I have not only admired his valour, and his martial knowledge (although I may say he arrested victory which was not accustomed to waver before Pharamond) but all that which appeared of his person, both in the general and the particular Combat, although I only saw him in Armour and on horseback; I found his carriage so noble, his form so majestic, and all his actions so graceful; that according to my opinion there were few could equal him, and those that have seen his face say, that there are few persons in the world of a better aspect.

Although I heard my self flattered by these discourses, I had nevertheless a secret joy to hear my self praised before Polixena, on whose soul I ardently desired an advantageous impression of Viridomar might be stamped; and as a fear of discovering my self, did not permit me through modesty to oppose the praises of Viridomar, nor my modesty to maintain a discourse so much to my advantage; I took a medium between both, which might neither render me suspected, nor give me any cause to be ashamed; and addressing to those which had spoken of me so well; The Prince of Suevia is very fortunate, said I, to have merited that esteem you all affirm to have for him, and although you were not in your selves entirely perswaded, of all that good you speak of him; you could not discourse it before the Princess, without rendering him the best office he could ever hope from your generousities. As for my self, said Prince Sunnon, I shall render him both that and all others with an excess of joy, as often as fortune shall favour me with an opportunity, and on the other side I am fully perswaded that my Sister cannot make a nobler choice than this which her fortune or her merit (if you will so have it) hath made for her, so that I believe I may always serve the Prince of Suevia, in her bearing without offence. Some may displease without offending, said the Princess to Sunnon, though I believe Brother you will do neither the one nor the other. I would not, replied Sunnon, displease you to pleasure any one of my friends, but to oppose a little this scrupulous severity, which we have so often quarrelled with you for, for so great a merit as Viridomar's, I would do it Sister, without any reluctancy. You ought at least (replied the Princess with a little shew of anger) stay till he employed you, and perhaps you would not do much for him, although you effected all that you could desire. I was making a repartee to this discourse, when Theodmira prevented me, But Almeric, said she, I pray you tell us if it be true, that Prince Viridomar hath so good an aspect as fame reports, for as you know we have only seen the proportion of his body. I found my self hindred from answering to this discourse, for those reasons I told you, and I was searching some means to disentangle my self, when Sunnon resumming the discourse; “Rather Madam (said he to Theodmira) ask Almeric if Viridomar have as good an aspect as himself, for if he have, he doth not yield in that particular to any man in the world. This discourse of Sunnon assisted me to withdraw my self from the question of Theodmira, and taking upon Almeric all the shame which it could possibly cast upon me; “I should make you understand, said I to Sunnon, very ill, the aspect of Viridomar by this comparison, for those that have seen him may certifie you, that there is very little between that of Almeric and his: They made me several other discourses upon this subject, of which in the end I found my self weary, fearing to fall into some mistake, or surprize to discover me, and particularly when I was necessitated to answer Sunnon to the same question which Theodmira had proposed some days before, about the beginning or rise of my love: to whom as near as I could, I gave the same answer, which I had before done to Theodmira.

The liberty of Marcomire in the mean time, although they had no news of his abode, had banish'd the extremity of grief from the Princess, but the absence of the King, and an absence which was attributed to such cruel causes, did not permit an entry for joy, but left still sufficient subject for sadness and inquietude. It was this which deterred that fair company, from giving the Princess those divertisements, which she would have gratefully received in a more happy season. Prince Sunnon nevertheless obliged me to be of the party he made to chase a wild Bull, that had some time remained in the Forrest of Fenuse, which had made himself sufficiently known about the Country, by the ill success of all those attempts that they had made to kill him. Prince Sunnon knowing how long this Beast had rendred himself formidable to all the Hunters; was pricked by honour to this chase, and having commanded a great inclosure to be made, about the place where they reported him to be; he invited the whole Court to this divertisement. The Princess had no mind to go, by reason of the stories stories which she had heard of this terrible beast : but the Prince her brother told her, she need not to fear any thing, with such a guard as she would have that day to accompany her, and that remaining in her Chariot without the Toils, she was expos'd to no danger : and in fine, because she had a great deal of kindness for him, he oblig'd her to it. By break of day he presented me a very fair horse, which he entreated me by the person that brought him to mount that day for his sake. I had rarely seen a statelier beast, and the richness of the Saddle and Harnes were not ill suited to his handsome shape. So that finding my self so well mounted for that day, and knowing that the Princess was of the company, and that for the Ladies sakes, the Knights would very gallantly accoutre themselves ; I was resolv'd if it were possible, to appear grateful to the eyes of Polixena : so that having brought rich suits with me, (for you know Sister I ever took a delight in bravery) I wore one that day, to which for a day of hunting or war, nothing could be added for its Gentleness, and very little for its richness. The Cassock was of a Tissue of gold and silk very light, but all the seams were embroidered with Pearls and little Emeralds at certain distances, and at the bottom of the sleeve, which reach'd below the Elbow, and the Cassock round about was set forth with the same imbelliments : and it was fastned by Clasps of fair and large Emeralds. The Chain of gold wherein my sword hung, appeared on the top of my shoulder suitable to my Cassock. The Hilt of my Sword was enriched with the same stones, and my head was covered with Plumes of white and green feathers, which reach'd almost to my shoulders. My habit was not too magnificent for the Prince of Suevia, but it was a little too noble for Almeric, and those that saw me in it were somewhat surpris'd. Sunnon and Theodomira thought them very gallant and fine, and as the Horse which Sunnon had given me, had much vigour and mettle ; I managed him in the riding with such a grace, to the end I might be the more view'd and observ'd by the Princess, and flattered my self with an opinion that she could discern nothing in me, that day of a bad deportment. I speak in this manner only before you, Sister, for before others I always speak of my self with more modesty.

I rode a long time by the side of the Princesses Chariot, in which Theodomira, Artesinda, and Laomira daughter to Basogastus, a fair Lady and of much merit, were seated with her, keeping incessantly my eyes fix'd upon that fair Visage which I adored, and when I was constrained to withdraw them to speak to Sunnon or other that spoke to me, it was always with a sigh or some other mark of the perplexity it gave me. The Princess spoke very often to me, and almost every time I retired at some distance from them, I observ'd Theodomira would, looking upon me, whisper her in the ear : I knew not well what judgment I ought to make thereof, neither did I well know what I ought then to wish : whether I should desire that Almeric's person might be favourably regarded, to the prejudice of Viridomar's affection ; or that the love and quality of Viridomar, might cause a forgetfulness of Almeric's person. When we were arriv'd at that part of the Forrest where the Toyles were extended, Sunnon caus'd the Chariot of the Princess and others that follow'd her, to be plac'd in a station from whence they might receive the pleasure of the Chase : her Chariot was open on every side, and having left some horsemen to guard her ; we entred into the Toyles to search the wild Bull. Now because Sunnon's Hunters had a great guess at the place where he was, we had not much difficulty to find him : and being at first affrighted with the noise of the Horns and the Dogs, for a long time he ran about without seeking other defences than by flight. But finding himself in fine penn'd up, both by the dogs and the Hunters, and that before the Toyles which obstructed his passage, he saw himself surrounded by men and dogs on all sides ; he turned head furiously, and having roared in a most terrible manner, he ran against all that resist'd his passage, and trampling over the Bellies of those dogs which he encountred, against whom he disdain'd to employ his other forces ; he turned his utmost fury upon the men, and encountering one of Sunnon's pikemen, whom fear had already disorder'd he bore him to the ground with the push of his Horn upon the stomach, of which he instantly dyed : and running upon others with his head stooping, he overthrew another in the same condition, and slew Meroveus's his horse with a stroke of his horn upon the flank. Ibere without fear with his Sword in his hand, came in between Meroveus and the Bull, which immediately made at him : when Prince Sunnon made full speed towards him, after having as it were desied him with a loud hollow, passing by him he wounded him with his sword in the Flank, which did not enter very far by reason the sword slipt along his side, but caus'd nevertheless much blood to spout forth, and so enraged the furious Bull, that leaving Ibere and Meroveus to pursue him that had wounded him, he overtaking him just upon the instant he was turning his horse to make at him, he thrust his two Horns with so much force in the Horse's breast, that the wounded Horse mounted on his hind feet, and overthrew himself upon the Prince. By good fortune I was near him, to do him the same office which Ibere had done to Meroveus, and striking the Bull upon the Flank, as he was making at him; I overthrew him with the blow upon some brakes on the other side: and as he rose again to come at me, I gave him so violent a stroke with my Sword upon the Nose; as split a part of his Nostril. I know not whether this wound astonished him, but instead of making at me again, or at Prince Sunnon, who was now risen by the help of Genebaud, he turned head another way: and having opened a passage through all those which opposed him, he ran to that side where we had left the Princess, broke the Toyles near the place where she was, and directed his course straight to the Chariot, as if he had been guided by some fatal star. But as I had by good fortune, an extraordinary swift beast under me, seeing him take that way I followed him so near, that I got there almost as soon as he: and redoubling my course with a great shout, when I saw him coming near the Chariot, through the cowardise of her defenders whom fear had made run away; I rode in with such a flying speed, that I arrived in time between the Chariot and the Bull, just as he was running his terrible head into the boot of the Princess's Chariot. My horse received the main blow upon his shoulder, for I had only a small scratch on the thigh: but I gave the Bull at the same instant, such a strong and fortunate blow upon the neck; that my sword, whose edge was exceeding sharp, and managed by an arm whose strength was redoubled by love; struck his head clear off, and it fell amongst the wheels of the Chariot. My horse at the same time fell from under me, but not so suddenly, but that I had time to slip my feet out of the Stirrups, and so throw myself upon my feet. But when I turned myself towards the Chariot, on which my thoughts were always fix'd, I saw that the Princess through the fright she had received, had almost lost her senses, and neither knew nor saw any thing that had past. Laomira, who sat at the same side of the Chariot, was in a perfect swoon: but Theodomira and Artesinda, who were on the other side, and for that reason much less exposed to danger; were in a better condition, and seeing the danger now past, turned themselves to the Princess to assist her. I approach'd her like a person almost distracted, through the sad condition I found her in, and Theodomira who had seen with no small content, the happy blow I had newly given in her defence, looking upon me in the most obliging manner in the world; Ab Almeric, said she, Is it then you that the Gods always send to our relief? She said no more by reason of the sad condition wherein she saw the Princess, and believing it only an effect of her fright, which would be soon over, she desired us to take her out of the Chariot, and to carry her to a fountain, which was not twenty paces distant from thence. You may easily believe, Sister, that I did not suffer myself to be much importun'd, to be once more serviceable to her: but when that I had taken her in my Arms, and was carrying her out of the Coach, she came to herself, opened her eyes, and entirely recovered both her Senses and knowledge. She cast her eyes immediately upon me, and seeing that I yet embraced her in my Arms, she pushed me gently away with her hand, flinging her self towards Theodomira, and looking upon me in a languishing manner; How Almeric, said she, must I find my self again in your Arms, am I never to receive any relief from you, but I must purchase it with so much shame. I was opening my mouth to justify myself, but Theodomira prevented me, and briefly informed her of the condition wherein she was, and the reason that brought her into my Arms: but in justifying me she made her likewise understand, that she was obliged to me for her life: and shewing her the head of the wild Beast, and my dead horse near the Chariot, she made her sensible of the importance of what I had newly perform'd in her service. Polixena listened favourably to her discourse, and then gently turning her eyes towards me; Well Almeric, (said she with a low voice) could you also wish Viridomar the happiness of this encounter, and had you rather that I should be indebted to him than to Almeric for the saving of my life. I knew not well what answer to make to this question, neither had I time to do it, for immediately Prince Sunnon, Ibere, Genebaud, Meroveus, and all the whole company came about the Chariot. They had all seen what I had performed though at a distance, but when they saw nearer hand the Bull's head, and my Horse killed by the terrible blow he had receiv'd, they bestowed a thousand praises upon the brave Action I had performed, and admired the happiness I had to meet the Beast so precisely, at that necessary moment of time for the Princess's safety. But Prince Sunnon did not satisfy himself, with giving me these praises, nor by testifying an admiration of so extraordinary a success, but remembering what I had done for him, when the Bull had dismounted him, and cast him from his horse, he thanked me as the preserver of his life: and declared to the Princess in expressions full of acknowledgment, how in the same day I had saved both their lives, and that they were obliged to praise the Gods, for having sent me into Franconia, for the defence and safeguard of their family. He accompanied these words with all the Caresses, that a noble resentment might oblige him to render, and though I felt them as Viridomar, I always receiv'd them as Almeric, and answered both his thanks and his praises with all the modesty that was possible. The Princess remembring the danger to which her self, the Prince and Meroveus had been expos'd, and touch'd with compassion for the death of the two men, and the wounds of some others, whom she had seen carried off in a bad condition, blamed the Prince for his great imprudence, in committing them to so great a peril, and recalled to his memory how unwilling she was, that he should proceed in so dangerous a divertisement: Nor did the Prince say any thing else in his excuse, but that he was put upon this design by the Gods without doubt, for the glory of Almeric, to the end, she might be oblig'd for her life to a person, to whom she had been formerly so endebted, for some thing more precious. "It is not necessary, said then the Princess, that you remember me of those obligations I owe him, since they are much too great to be forgotten. In speaking these words, methought she look'd very favourably upon me; but a while after, there appeared a blush upon her cheeks, which I attributed to a remembrance of that adventure, which made her look upon me with a kind of shamefacedness. I mounted a while after, a Horse which Timanthus presented me, and shewing the Prince the Steed he had given me, in the bad condition it was; "I am very much troubled, my Lord, said I, to have lost him so soon, for you may believe, that coming from you, and having done me the service he did to day, he must have been always very much valued and esteem'd by me. "I hope, said the Prince, that you will not refuse another from the same hand; and I could heartily wish, that you would likewise receive all that would be offer'd you in the Court of King Pharamond. I thank'd him, shewing several signs of my satisfaction, but nevertheless, like a person that did not testify any design to abuse his offers. A while after, Theodomira calling me, I went to the Chariot, and because all others, either to favour a stranger, or to recompense the action I had lately performed, gave me way, I rode by the Boot of the Chariot as long as the way would permit it; and whilst I was searching in the fair eyes of the Princess, for that sweetness which was the entertainment of my life, Theodomira, who really loved me, as if I had been her own Son, looking on me with all the marks of a tender affection, "How much do I rejoyce, Almeric, said she, that we owe to you, rather than to any other person in the world, this last obligation: And if it pleas'd the Gods, I would that you were Prince Viridomar. "If that change, replied I very readily, could render my condition to the Princess more happy, I should wish it with all my Soul, but if it did not work that effect, nothing could make me desire it. "Remain still Almeric, said the Princess unto me, for after those obligations you have laid upon me, it would be difficult for me to have those sentiments for Viridomar, which I have for you. "If you did him justice, said I, you would put those services which all the world owes, and all the world would have pay'd you as well as my self, in comparison with what he hath done for you, or at least, with the love he hath for you. The Princess turn'd towards Theodomira with an inward smile, and Theodomira looking upon her with an action little different from hers, Well Madam, said she very softly to her, can you apprehend any thing by this? But Sunnon and the other company, then approaching the Chariot, caus'd the discourse to be general, all the remainder of the way. When we were got home, Prince Sunnon, who had caus'd the head of the wild Bull to be brought along, order'd it to be fasten'd to one of the Gates of the Castle, with these words engraven upon the stone which was under it.

To the Honour of the Sueve, Almeric, who sav'd by his valour, the lives of Sunnon, and of Polixena.

And because the urgent affairs of the King his Brother, constrain'd him to return next morning, he testified unto me all the remainder of that day his acknowledgments by so many real marks, as made me almost asham'd; and the next morning, one of his Grooms brought me two Horses for a present (handsomer, if possible, than that he gave me the day precedent) with a Suit of Armour most richly gilt, most excellently tempered, yet exceeding light, the workmanship of a famous Artist, who in his return from Greece, and passing through Germany, had made some stay at Francfort. I would not refuse this present from the Prince, which I might have accepted from him, had my real condition been known, but because I delighted as much in giving as he, and for that in these occasions, it was very difficult for me to belye my inclinations, not daring, under the figure of Almeric, return a present to Sunnon: I gave the Gentleman of his Horse, a Sword, whose Hilt was enamell'd with precious stones, which certainly far exceed'd in value the present of Sunnon, and desired him to keep it as a mark of the esteem I made of the present he brought, and of the merit of his person; the Gentleman shewed the Sword to his Prince, who admired to see such presents from a banish'd person, and laugh'd perhaps at the boldness of one of that quality wherein I appeared, who seem'd, as it were, to contend with the liberality of so great a Prince. He confirm'd to me oftentimes before his departure, the obliging offers he made me, and the Princes Ibere, Geneband and Meroveus, who were to return with him, forgot nothing which might evidence the great esteem they had for me. Summon entreated me not to quit this retirement for any other in the world, whilst the condition of my fortune kept me at a distance from my Country; and I told him that I should be constrain'd for some days to remain here, but that I did not despair to see him suddenly, and remember him of the good intentions he had testified towards Prince Viridomar.

After Summon's departure, I had more liberty to entertain the Princess, than during the time of his abode, and for that she treated me as well as I could desire; I should have been too happy, if she would have done as much for Viridomar, as she had done for Almeric; or rather, if I had received under my real form, those favours I received under a borrowed shape. The reflection which I daily made on the little solidity of my happiness, hinder'd me from enjoying it entirely, and on the other side, I saw it could be of no long continuance; and that it was very difficult for me to make a long stay in a place, where I had made my self more publick than I intended, without daily exposing my self to the danger of being known, either by my own proceedings in pleading (as I daily did) for Viridomar, or by the arrival of some person that might have seen me, or by a thousand other accidents which might discover me. And therefore, foreseeing it might so happen, I took up my resolution, for I really believed, that though they found me unknown in the Territories and in the House of King Pharamond, (an action in Politicks to be condemn'd) the King of the Franks would not accuse me to have come with any design against his State, nor with any intention which might not excuse me to a Prince, to whom the power of love was not altogether unknown. However, I observed, that what the Princess had foretold me, that she could not see me without real shame and continual bashfulness; and although in the remembrance of the services I had done her, she look'd favourably upon me, and us'd me more kindly than all other men that came near her; I often perceived a kind of blush upon her face, and always a reservedness in her actions, that she often told me the contrary, to what her eyes seem'd to tell me, and that the remembrance of her obligations, made her act some things against her inclination. I one day went to meet her in the Garden where she usually walk'd, and where after I had view'd many of the Allies, I found some of her women, who had all affection enough for me, near a fair fountain, and they imagining that I look'd for her, shewed me the place where she was, in a close Arbour at the end of the Alley, and told me that Artesinda and Laomira were with her: I immediately directed my feet thither, or rather, I made them follow my heart, which flew thither before them; but when I approach'd the Arbour, I saw Artesinda and Laomira at the portal, who presently by a sign which they made me, ordered me to make no noise, so that coming near the door, they shewed me the Princess asleep upon a little Grass Bank; she was late upon the ridge, from whence letting fall her head upon that part which was most raised upon one of her Arms which sustained it, she had fallen asleep. As in all postures she appear'd to me admirably fair, so I conceived her all charming in this, and although sleep had clos'd her bright eyes, and conceal'd a part of their beauties, methought it rendred them more supportable to mine, and that this negligent languishing, in which she appear'd to mine, added a sweet air to her whole person, which rendred her more amiable. Thus I beheld her from the portal like a person transported, nor had Artesinda much trouble to make me observe the silence she had commanded me. As she had often seen me in this condition, and that (as well as her Mother) she was not entirely ignorant of the cause, she did not admire to see me like a statue fix'd in this contemplation, nor to hear those sighs which forced a passage through my breast. In the mean time, they durst neither make a noise in that place for fear of awakening the Princess, nor be at any distance from her whilst she slept; but in fine, they ventured to walk near the Arbour, casting their eyes from time to time through the portal, till by little and little they went farther off insensibly, after they had desired me to have a care of the Princess from the place where I stood, and to call them, if she chanced to awake. Oh! how sweet was this Commission, and with what willingness did I charge my self with this care, to feast my eyes with the pleasure of that dear object, they so covetously desired. My Soul went many degrees beyond those bounds which limited my sight, and by force of the present object, the remembrance of what I had formerly seen, returning entirely to my memory,

plunged me in a Sea of amorous thoughts which arose in my breast, and in fine transport- ed me in such a manner, that not being able longer to remain within those limits they had prescribed me, I entred into the Arbour, and with a slow pace and a panting heart I approached the sleeping Princess: 'Twas not nevertheless without trembling, nor without being assaulted by a fear which a long time deterred me from advancing, and almost per- swaded me to retire out of the Arbour, but at last striving against it the best I could, I went to the very feet of the Princess, where calling my self upon my knees, as before a Deity, I fix'd my eyes upon her fair countenance, and I told her by my looks, and by my sighs, what my mouth could not tell her, and without doubt, had she been awake, she would have understood the dumb eloquence of my passions. In this reverent posture, Sister, I told her a thousand stories without opening my mouth, which through my imagi- nation did still pass to my heart, and methought by the struggling of my passion, that mine explained it self unto her more eloquently than in another condition it could have done, and with more variety of words, Fair Light of my Soul, said I to her closed eyes, restore us that light you deprive us of, and behold a Lover at your feet, that adores you as his Deity: This object ought to startle or affright you, and since your piercing brightness may even penetrate to the heart, there you will better discern what my looks and my discourse cannot make you understand: But do not, added I a moment after, fair eyes, but do not open your selves, per- haps you will discern a criminal in this lover, whose sight may disturb your serenity, by some motion of anger, which his boldness may inspire you withal, remain rather shut, to give him some few good minutes more with that good fortune which so favourably offers them, and do not envy him the happiness which he receives by adoring, so near, those Heavenly Beauties, which mu't eternally reign in his heart. Alas! added I a little while after, unfortunate Viri- domar, what a deplorable condition is thine, to fear all things, and yet not dare to desire any thing? Mightest thou not dispel some part of this fear which accompanies thy love, and make known to those fair eyes (when they shall open themselves) the true Viridomar in the feigned Almeric? Will thy presence be more odious to the Princess, when she shall see it accompanied with a Royal Dignity? Or is the deceit thou hast used in thy concealment, a crime of too high a nature, for thee to expect a pardon? Behold thy self in the condition and posture thou ought- est to be, to implore it; and it seems Heaven hath guided thee hither to that purpose, and fortune perhaps will never offer thee so favourable an opportunity. This thought made a pro- gress through my mind, but made no stay; and though possibly, I did not entirely want the boldness to execute a part of what I had propos'd, I judg'd it too early as yet, to attempt that hazard, and that neither as Almeric, nor as Viridomar, I had sufficiently en- gaged her affection. With grief I made a reflection hereupon, and I wavered in my re- solution, whether to depart that place, or to remain some few minutes longer, when one of her fair hands negligently extended upon her thigh, presented it self to my eyes, and lay so near me, that maugre the fear I had to displease the Princess, I could not find a sufficient succour from my reason against the violent endeavours of my love, to hinder me from carrying my lips to her hand, and press them thereon with such an extasie, as caused an unspeakable delight to pass in a moment from my lips to my heart, which had nothing of mortal in it, and which robbed me both of my knowledge and reason. By means of this violence of my lips, the Princess awaked, but not so quickly as to perceive my amo- rous theft: but as I well knew I could not hinder my self from being seen, I had much rather be found in that posture, than in any other less suitable to my condition, either of a Lover, or a criminal, if my fault had been known; so that as soon as the Princess open- ed her eyes, the first object that appeared, was Almeric at her feet, in a posture that gave her no less trouble, than astonishment. She fix'd her eyes for a time upon me, and after- wards turning them gently on the other side; What, said she, in coming out of the water, in returning out of a swoon, and in awaking from my sleep, always Almeric before my eyes! and I shall be constrained to have him always present to my memory; because he will be eter- nally present in my sight: Almeric, what make you here, (said she, continuing her discourse, and turning her eyes upon me) how am I here alone with you, in what a posture do you ap- pear before me? And what have you to ask me in this posture? I am to implore your pardon (said I, trembling all the while) for the boldness I assumed, to enter here whilst you slept, and for adoring in the posture you now see me, those celestial beauties, that a religious heart might worship to his grave, and which merit the adoration of the whole Universe. You doubt- lessly think (said the Princess) that I am still Blellinda, or else you believe your self to be that Viridomar, of whom you daily speak to me so much. For you, Madam, said I, I know full well you are no more Blellinda; but as for my self, I have much ado to know whether I am still Almeric, and I know not, if (against my own resolution) I shall not in fine desire to become Viridomar. I have already told you, replied the Princess, that if you were so, your condition would not be happier, and I add now, that if you were Viridomar, I should not pardon you that, which the remembrance of his services makes me forgive Almeric. In the mean time, (continued she, seeing Artesinda and Laomira entering the Arbour) do not abuse my indulgence, and for a penalty which you have deserved, by seeing me more than you ought, I command you to see me no more in three days. This penalty, said I unto her, is not so light as you imagine it, and if you ordered me to throw my self into the river Tyberon, it would not be so difficult a thing for me to obey you. The Princess looked upon me very stedfastly, and with no little admiration, to hear me speak in this manner, and taking hold of my words, (after she had given me a sign to rise,) I did not believe, said she, that you had such a passion to see me, if I were Viridomar's, as you so much desire, would you see me every day? Yes, Madam, said I, I would see you every day, and by that happy Star which bath still guided me where you were, which you accused some few moments since, I should not despair, but you might see me again when you awaked. I had rather see you here, said the Princess, and in the interim not to refuse my presence to a person, I am so much obliged to; I will change the penalty I so enjoy'd, to a prohibition not to speak to me of Viridomar in eight days. I shall more easily obey (said I) this order, than the former; and I shall the more willingly abstain from speaking of Viridomar, because I hope that every time you shall see me, you will have cause to remember him. I confess (said then the Princess, turning to Artesinda) that I understand you not, and I shall be very glad to hear no more of it. After that she complain'd softly to Artesinda and Laomira, for that they had left her alone, and suffer'd me to enter the Arbour whilst she was asleep, but they appeas'd her by telling her the truth; which when they had inform'd her of, It had been a very ingrateful thing, said Laomira unto her, to prohibit him the entering that place where you were, who had so well defended you against the Sueves, and the wild Bull. And besides, (added the fair Artesinda, with a smile) we did believe, that he who had seen you in the water, and who had more than once embraced you as you were swooning in his Arms, might well have the privilege to see you asleep. Ah Cousin, (said the Princess very smartly) tell me of those last accidents as much as you please, but do not recal that first to my memory, which was common to us both, in which you might perhaps receive as little satisfaction as my self. In pronouncing these words, she blush'd as much as she could have done, if she had then seen her self in the same condition as she appear'd to my eyes, in coming out of the Mein; and Artesinda, whom she had made not a little ashamed, had her face for some time dyed with the same tincture of modesty: but Laomira desiring to relieve them, by changing the subject of the discourse, presented to the Princess a Letter which she had in her hand, and which I had let fall by carelessness a little distance from the Arbour, and in giving it, Madam, said she unto her, if Almeric had not been wanting to his promise, in keeping Sentinel at the portal of the Arbour without entering it, and had not expos'd us, by his boldness, to the peril of incurring your anger, I should not have done him the unkindness, which I am about to do him, by presenting you this Letter, which he newly dropp'd, which may perhaps inform you of his affairs, much more than he desires we should know. Laomira jestingly discours'd in this manner, without any design of doing me a bad office, because indeed she had not perus'd the Letter which she presented the Princess; but I no sooner perceiv'd it in her hand, but I knew it for a Letter which I had received from Haldan some few days before, and that it was sufficient to discover me, if I did not think of an invention to remedy it. By good fortune the Princess cast her eyes upon the Letter, before she look'd on my face, which might have given her to understand a part of that disquiet which perplex'd my mind; and withdrawing her eyes a while after from the Letter, whilst I was using my utmost endeavours to recover my self; If you had had discretion enough (said she in a merry humour unto me) to have abstain'd from entering into this Arbour, I had had civility enough not to have made an enquiry into your secrets, but since you have wanted it for me, you must not be angry that I entrench a little upon you, and that according to Laomira's counsel, I take this small revenge. " But Madam, said I, you have already impos'd upon my crime that penalty you thought it deserved, and I am confident, you are more just than to punish me beyond my desert, or more generous, than to revoke the favour you have done me. " It shall not be, replied the Princess, to punish the crime you committed against me, but that Artesinda and Laomira may revenge themselves, with whom you broke your word. And at the same time, casting her eyes upon the Letter, she read aloud these words therein.

Haldin to Prince Viridomar.

WE have marched the Army back, my Lord, according to your orders, and were received by the King, as we before expected; for we had like to have felt the utmost effects of his anger, and I verily believe, that the orders which he had given us to obey you, would not have defended us, if his greatest rage had not fallen upon you. It is not, my Lord, necessary to inform you of all that which I discerned therein, but you must know enough to hinder your appearing before him, before his anger be somewhat appeas'd; and although your presence be very dear to all the Sueves, your most faithful Servants do supplicate you not to afford it them, till the storm be over. Nor do I doubt, but that your love gives you a sufficient employment in the places where you are, to make you forget——

The Princess would not read any farther, but restoring me the Letter (when she had read to that place) with a countenance wherein I perceiv'd the marks of a disturbance sufficiently apparent: “ I did believe, said she unto me, to have seen some of Almeric's affairs in this Letter, but since I perceive it was directed to Viridomar, I have not the same curiosity for his. “ Yes Madam, (said I very readily, and with a much greater confidence in appearance than I was really owner of) it was directed to Prince Viridomar, and you will know wherefore he sent it me: I had brought it hither this day to have shewn you, but fortune hath happily done more for me, than my intention could have effected; but I shall say no more, for I well remember, that I am not to speak of Viridomar for the space of eight days. No, Almeric, (replyed the Princess, with an action which made me judge, that the trouble of her mind was not entirely removed by my words) you ought not to speak of him these eight days, and in that time, both you and I may consider what we have to do. In truth, (said Laomira, perhaps to disguise the suspicion she had of the truth) I am very sorry to have rendred you a good office, in believing I did you an injury, but another time I shall better consult my revenges. “ You may perceive, Madam, said I, that fortune doth not always favour bad intentions, though, to say the truth, I do not believe you have done any great good in seconding mine. “ As for my self who am not so malicious, said Artesinda, if I have done you no good, at least I have done you no harm, and I assure you moreover, that I shall never have an intention to do it. “ To speak seriously, replyed Laomira, I will assure Almeric, that I have no worse intention for him, than you, and I had rather do him a kindness (if the opportunity were favourable) than to Viridomar, who hath wounded your Father, and won a Battel from mine. “ I am confident, replyed I unto her, that neither Priam nor Basogastus bear any hatred to Viridomar, but I could have wish'd, the Princess had prohibited you as well as me from speaking of him, for I believe this discourse is not very pleasing to her. “ I know not how it may be to her, said Artesinda, but I believe we have not displeas'd the Prince of Suevia, by shewing this Letter; for I doubt not, but that this disgrace to which he hath expos'd himself for the love which he bore the Princess, will merit some esteem from her. Ab Madam, (said I unto her, with a look full of acknowledgments) how worthy a Daughter are you of Priam and Theodomira, and how well I know you by your generous proceedings for a Princess of the blood of King Pharamond. Whilst we were in this manner discoursing, the Princess observ'd a silence which astonish'd me, calling oftentimes her eyes upon me, with a carriage very different from her accustomed demeanour. but after I had replyed with so much ardency to Artesinda, looking fix'dly upon me: I clearly perceive, said she to me, that you continue very sensible of the interests of Viridomar; and in the end, you will persuade me that they are not less dear to you than your own: but remember in the mean time, the penalty I have impos'd upon you; and let us change this place, that we may the better change our discourse. Concluding these words, she rose up, and went out of the Arbour, permitting me as she had formerly often done, to receive the honour of supporting her as she walked.

I usually pay'd her this service with an excess of joy; but this time I perform'd it with such a disturbance, that I could no ways dissemble, which by another accident was immediately augmented. The Princess, when she had walk'd enough, directed her steps towards the Castle, when as some persons of quality newly arriv'd from Peapolis, came to kiss her hand, and amongst them, a person of a very fair appearance, who having, as the others, others performed his duty to the Princess, and received, by the reception she made him, the marks of a very particular esteem; cast his eyes upon my face: and he had no sooner discern'd it, but shewing some signs of astonishment upon his own; he came to salute me with a respect that was no ways due to Almeric; and after he had (with a behaviour full of submission) withdrawn himself at some distance; Ab my Lord, said he, is it possible that I should have the honour to see you here, and to thank you before our Princess, for that civil usage which I received from your bounty. Although this adventure put me much to a nonplus, I return'd him nevertheless his complement if not with so much civility as I might have done at another time, as much at least as the Princess's presence, and the trouble which it caused could permit me, and looking upon him with eyes, which in my opinion might have made him understand my intention; I am extremely happy, said I unto him, if any action of my whole life hath been seasonable to serve you, and I shall testify my content to you, much more amply in another place, than I can do it before the Princess. I did believe that these words might have obliged him, to remit the rest of his civilities till another time: but he was ignorant of my design, and taking hold of the words with a behaviour as respectful as at first, and with an obeyance that could not be due from a person of his quality to Almeric; My Lord, said he, I have not merited you should preserve the Idea of my face; but yet permit me (if you please) to recal to your memory, that I was not the least of those prisoners you so generously sent back to Basogastus, after he had lost the Battel: and that doubtlesly there were none that have preserved a resentment of that benefit, with an acknowledgement equal to mine. I did make him no reply for fear of obliging him to an answer which might hasten my discovery; but only by shewing him the Princess with a respectful look, I gave him to understand that this was no place to continue our discourse, so that being a person that knew the world, either through the respect that he owed the Princess, or that he believed due to me, he withdrew himself amongst those other persons with whom he came, and walked with them at some distance after the Princess. When I saw him at a distance not to hear me, I perceive (said I to the Princess) that it is the name which I bear hath deceived this Knight: And as at the battel which Basogastus lost, that Almeric (who was since slain) had the first command under Prince Viridomar in the Army, it was doubtlesly from him that he received this usage, for which he appears so gratefully acknowledging. It appears to me nevertheless (replied the Princess very seriously) that it was to your face and not to your name, he yielded those marks of acknowledgment and resentment: and on the other side, I could not have believed that Almeric had the power of dismissing Prisoners, in an Army where his Prince was in person. The Prince (replied I very much astonish'd with this answer) left the Army often to attend the King his father, who was on the other side of the country; and during that time, Almeric remained in the Army with an absolute power. The Princess made no reply to these words, but did not less astonish me now by her silence, than she had done before by her answer: and a while after being come to her apartment, and having intimated her desire to be private; I withdrew my self with so disturbed a soul, that I scarcely could find out my own Lodgings.

As soon as I was got thither, making a reflection upon all that had befall'n me that day, and particularly upon all which I had observed in the looks, and in the discourse of the Princess; I no ways doubted but that she had entertained in her mind, many, and great suspicions of the truth: and methought she had sufficient reason for them, as well by the reading of the Letter, as by the complement of the French Knight; who had treated me as Viridomar, and not as Almeric. Timanthus, whom I informed of all that had happened, as a person to whom I trusted all things, was of the same opinion: and then recalling to our memories all those discourses I had had with Polixena, the eagerness I had always testified for the interests of Viridomar, and all that which I had said and done, more conformable to the personage of Viridomar than that of Almeric: we admired between our selves, that she could permit her self to be so long deluded, and we likewise believed that if the truth were not already really discovered, it was suddenly in danger of being so; since even the Princess her self might conclude it, by clearing her doubts with that person that had formerly known me. Then did I send Timanthus to find him out, with hopes, that if I could speak with him, I should divert him from all that might injure me: but Timanthus could not find him and learnt that after that he had entertained the Princess, with some affairs which had brought him to Court, he was departed again for Peapolis. I then found my self involved in a deep perplexity, and a great irresolution, what I had to do, in case I should be reduced to the necessity to act as Viridomar, and no more as Almeric: and though I might always think it very difficult, for a person of my quality to remain incognito, and shew himself freely to the world, and principally in a Country, where he had made himself so famous by so many renowned actions, and in a place where his love obliged him, to act in a manner sufficient ent of it self to discover him, though his countenance did nothing contribute: I always trilled more to fortune than reason, nor could I resolve how to behave my self in this affair, so that I found my self very much perplex'd, and I passed the succeeding night in such a various agitation of thoughts, as gave little or no liberty to sleep: but the next morning, much about that hour the Princess usually shewed her self in the presence, a Gentleman belonging to Theodora, came to entreat me on the behalf of his Lady, to wait upon her in her Chamber. I presently conceived that she had some advice to give me, concerning those accidents which had fall'n out the day before, which turmoyle'd my mind: but my surprise was much greater, when (entring in her Chamber) I understood she was in her Closet with the Princess, who both desired to speak with me, and had obliged her to send the messenger to fetch me. This proceeding of the Princess astonish'd me; and I entred into the Closet with a greater apprehension of fear, than in the most hazardous encounters that ever I had been in. The Princess (who was alone in effect with Theodora) received me with much civility, but with a very serious countenance, and full of such a Majesty as made me more timorous than I was; through all her charms, she constrained me to behold the sovereign authority which she had over me. She remained some time ere she began to express her intentions, when on a sudden with an incomparable grace; Almeric, said she, you ought not to doubt, but that (through a remembrance of those obligations we bear you, and that great esteem your person merits) your presence is very dear unto us, and I believe that hitherto you might easily perceive it; but because we have at present some reasons which constrain us to deprive our selves of it, you cannot be offended that I entreat you to retire your self, not out of the Territories of King Pharamond, but out of the house of his Sister, and from those places wherein she shall make her abode. We are not so ungrateful as to refuse you a sanctuary, during those disgraces you suffer for love of us, but you will find it, if it be true you need it, much more secure and honourable near the King than near our person; and during his absence near Prince Sannon his brother, or in any fortified place you shall please to make choice of. You shall there find all things disposed to receive you, as you can expect from persons that lose not the memory of those obligations they owe you; and in the mean time you must pardon me, that which I now impose out of necessity, and by the command of my duty which I am no ways permitted to disobey. These words, though I expected somewhat to this purpose, struck me like a thunder-bolt, and for some time I remained sufficiently stupified, not being able either to do or say; but at last, putting a force upon my astonishment, or rather abandoning my self to my passion, at a time wherein I saw there was no more use of fiction; Ab Madam, (said I throwing my self at her feet) for what offence could I merit so cruel a disgrace? Shall I see myself at the same time exposed both to that of my King and that of my Sovereign? And should I cease to be this Almeric, to whom fortune had gave those opportunities, to merit some marks of your bounty, could I possibly assume a shape so odious, as to deserve so cruel a banishment. I believe, replied the Princess, that you are still Almeric; and those likelihoods which might make others judge you were Viridomar, cannot persuade me to that belief. Viridomar is a Prince too highly generous, to have exposed such a Princess as my self to those reproaches she might reasonably fear; or to the displeasure she might suffer all her days, for having concealed in her House a person disguised, who had declared to the whole world the excess of affection he had for her; and Almeric hath merited too well from me by all his other actions, to have endeavoured to blot out the obligation by so cruel an injury: so that I believe not that you can be Viridomar: and should you be so, I do not believe that you are so much an enemy either to him or me as to confess it, and to constrain me by that confession to a severity which would be so little agreeable unto me. 'Tis not but that I have all that esteem for the Prince of the Sueves, which is due to his merit; nor but that I was touch'd with a just resentment, for that which he did in favour of my country, by ceasing to make any further war upon it: and if to his illustrious Rank, to those glories which environ him, and to that which he hath acted for us, were added these services I have received from Almeric, with those advantages we have observed in his person, there were too many perfections and obligations to make him merit a better fortune than his could possibly hope from the esteem of Polixena. But all these great advantages could not take from me the resentment and shame I should have all my life, for those faults he has made me commit: And if Almeric had been Viridomar, he would have preserved the respect due to his own dignity and mine, and had sought his satisfaction near the King my Brother, and not in a disguise so much unworthy of his courage and my virtue. “But Madam (said I unto her with a more passionate behaviour) should Viridomar have presented himself unto you under the person of Almeric, had he been so criminal as you make him? and although he ought to have sought a part of his good fortune in the approbation of the King your brother, was he lets concern'd to seek it in the happiness of pleasing you, if fortune had so far favoured him as to have let him effect it. Could he have done you so cruel an injury by endeavouring to make you kind

“to his person by services no ways distasteful, before he discovered by any other way his design? or had he shewed any more consideration for your repose, or for your satisfaction, by imploring the consent of the King your brother, before he knew that his person was acceptable unto your self? I speak this Madam in the defence of Viridomar, though I am still Almeric: and although the services, the thoughts, and the person of Almeric, might assume a form much more advantagious from the birth and renown of Viridomar; I should be very sorry (if it were possible for me) to be Viridomar, whilst he remains so odious to you. I’ll go and inform him that he is the most unfortunate of men, though possibly not the most criminal; and that he must seek for refuge in the Arms of death, and not in the Court of King Pharamond. “He shall nevertheless find one there, replied the Princess, whensoever he pleases to honour the King by accepting it: for it is just that he should be well received in the King’s dominions, so long as he remains for our sake in his father’s displeasure; which I believe is to him of much greater importance, than the frowns of Polixena: but neither the one nor the other will further his death, pronounce their anger how severely soever unto him: neither is it his death nor his misfortune that I desire, but only the departure of Almeric which is necessary, although his services are so dear unto me, that his person cannot be odious. Finishing these words with a look which had nothing of unkind in it, and upon which methought (for my comfort I observed a very great constraint) she saluted me in another manner than she was accustomed, and departed out of the Closet of Theodomira, to retire into her Chamber. She would not permit Theodomira to accompany her, judging perhaps in the condition I was, that she might be useful unto me: And Theodomira returning to me from the portal of her Chamber, to which she had followed her, and finding me with a discontented countenance; “What my lord (said she unto me with a merry and lively countenance) have you then deceived us? “If that which you believe were true, replied I to her, you highly deserve to be deceiv’d for the trick which you put upon me: But Madam I am still Almeric, and Viridomar is too much unfortunate for me ever to wish my self the person. For my part, replied Theodomira, I have too often wished you before your face to have been Viridomar, to be troubled at it now; and I cannot dissemble the joy which I now have to find it so. “And wherefore (said I unto her with a mournful voice) ought you to rejoyce, to see me under the disguise of an unfortunate Prince, hated by a Princess which I adored, after you had seen me under another form, no way odious to her. I rejoyce, replied Theodomira, to see Almeric become the Prince of the Sueves, because I could not wish a more glorious fortune to a Person to whom I was so highly obliged, than to see him from a private person, become one of the greatest Princes in the world, both by his birth and from the renown of his actions: and I rejoyce because that in your love to the Princess (which I was always conscious of) had you still continued Almeric, you had nothing to hope; whereas you may hope all things being Prince Viridomar. “Alas (said I fetching a sigh) you may perceive what Viridomar hath to hope, and you see how the heavens and the inclinations of the Princess favour him. “You ought not, replied Theodomira, to wonder at the proceedings of the Princess, who hath treated you much more kindly than I could have expected, according to her accustomed severity. It was an obedience to her duty, which cannot permit her to retain in her house, a person disguised that pretends so much of affection, which made her pray you to retire your self: And though I am as much engaged in your interests as your own heart can desire, I could not contradict her purpose, when she communicated her intentions to me: but be confident that your person is not hateful to her, and that when the King her brother shall dispose (in your favour) of her inclinations, she will freely change her mind to your content. I must likewise counsel you to pursue that course, as the most assured for your self, and the most honourable for the Princess, and as you well know the great soul of King Pharamond, and how much he is sensible of a merit like yours, and favourable to a passion to which he hath but too much abandon’d himself; you ought not to doubt, but that he will take as favourable a cognizance of your design, as you your self can desire. You have heard what Prince Sumon hath spoken to your face, and I have heard sufficient from the King’s own mouth to give you this assurance; nor can it be accounted a misfortune to the Princess Polixena, to have enslaved the heart of Viridomar, nor to King Pharamond to have disengaged himself from such a Rival, and a Rival for whom Rosalind was designed. Theodomira spoke to me in this manner, and to these words added many others, by which in fine she made me apprehend, that I was not so unfortunate as I had imagined my self, and that the design which I had in my disguise could not possibly have met with a better success. She afterwards informed me, that the Princess had had some days before a great jealousy of the truth, by some serious reflections she had made upon my actions, upon my discourses, upon the eager-

ncfs I had testified for the interests of Viridomar, in a time wherein I had already made known, that I had my self an affection for her, and upon the conformity the found between my person, and the report they had made her of that of Viridomar, besides, that they had not heard of any other Almeric, that was considerable in the Court of the Saxons, except him that had been slain; that the reading of Haldan's Letter, had left her little to make any farther doubt; and that she was fully confirmed by that person who took acquaintance of me in the Garden, that she had conversed with him after that I was departed from her; and that after she had received the confirmation of the truth from his mouth, she had obliged him by promise, not to discover to any person in the world, that he had known me, passionately desiring him to deprive the world, as much as in him lay, of the knowledge of this accident; or at least, to take away all suspicion, which men might have, that she had thereto contributed, she being so very nice upon this matter, that the least scruple deprived her of her repose. She afterwards counselled me to obey her without farther delay, and not to seek any occasion of seeing her before my departure, for fear of exasperating her mind, wherein I should find something more terrible, than what had yet appeared to me, if she had once proposed to her self the obligations of Duty; and after that she did not only assure me of the services of her Husband, her Son, and all her Family, upon all occasions which might concern my interest, but she promised me withal, to maintain them with an inviolable affection to the Princess, and that she would render me all those good offices, which I could possibly hope from that person in the world the best affected towards me. In fine, she told me all that which might either give me comfort or hope, and would not permit me to depart from her, till she had fully perswaded me, that there were more unfortunate persons in the world than my self. She likewise permitted me, before I went out of the Closet, to write a short Letter to the Princess, which she promised to shew her after my departure, whereof the words were these.

To the Princess Polixena.

IT is not, Madam, Viridomar, but Almeric that takes his leave of you; and since through his good fortune, and not through his merit, the person of the last is not odious to you, he will borrow nothing from that of the first, who by his misfortune, and not out of any design, hath displeas'd you; Almeric nevertheless will die with grief, if Viridomar hath deserved your anger, for neither the one, nor the other can live, if the hopes of appeasing you, be to them prohibited. They have sought in the occasions to serve the King your Brother, those which might bring them to the glory of being owned by you, but if fortune have oppos'd them in this design, death will be favourable in that of dying for you.

I shall not, Sister, dilate my self upon what remains to me to tell you; for besides, the recital would not be much pleasing, if I should confine my self to the repetition of particulars; I find my self shortened in time, and obliged to retire, and leave you to take some repose; and I shall only tell you, that after I had received from Theolomira, all the assurances that she could give me, either of her affections, or assistances; I departed not only from her presence, but within an hour after from Fenuse, not with any design to stay at Peapolis, or in any other City of Franconia, nor to oblige my self near Pharamond, whilst he was in war with the King my Father, being conscious that my honour could not permit it, although my affections might approve it, but with an intention to seek out some occasion of seeing Pharamond upon the Frontiers, where he was gone, to the end I might make him understand my love, and my intentions; no ways doubting, but that through his virtue, I might excuse the misfortune which hindred me from prosecuting my own inclinations, and that I should oblige him to have more favourable thoughts of me, than I could ever hope from the obstinacy of the King my Father: But I had neither the time, nor the occasion to execute what I had propos'd; for I had scarce travelled some days journey beyond Peapolis, travelling towards the Frontiers, towards which the King of the Franks was gone, when I heard the cruel news that was newly brought, of his being imprisoned by the King of the Cimbrians, whose prisoner he had voluntarily made himself. This news pierced my heart with a mortal grief, but it did not permit me to study what resolution I ought to take; for although I foresaw great difficulties in this design, I easily resolved, either to die, or set King Pharamond at liberty, not knowing any rule of Duty, which ought to obstruct the performance of so generous a deed, had not my love there-to obliged me. For such a design, I was resolved not to consider neither my fortune, nor my life it self, and to put in practice all that, which the succour of my Friends, or that of my courage might furnish, at a time where all my concerns were at stake; and wherein I ever believed, that the interests of my honour, were not inferior to those of my love, through that engagement which had chained me to the Princess his Sister. But all those designs which I had in my head for Pharamond, vanished like those which I had made for Marcomire, and we understood some few days after, that he was delivered out of prison by an accident much like his Brother's, and had retired himself, together with him, to whom they had committed the custody of Marobuda. The difficulties which I foresaw in my design to deliver him, caused me to receive the news with an excess of joy, although it deprived me of an occasion to render the Princess the most important, and most grateful service she could ever receive from me, and of meriting by this action the amity of Pharamond, which for the happiness of my life was become so necessary: And as the cruelty of his Enemies had made me fear for him, I forgot all that I might hope from his misfortune, to rejoice at a happiness wherein the whole world ought to have interested it self. I was upon the Frontiers of Bohemia, but I faced about, and steered my course towards Franconia, to endeavour the execution of what I had proposed some days before, when that by an encounter, which had like to have cost me my life; having engaged my self in the defence of a Knight, whom divers others endeavoured to assassinate, I received a very great wound, and was constrained to stay the cure a long time in his House whom I had rescued; who ordered me to be served (though he knew me not) with all manner of care and acknowledgment. It was during the abode I made with him, that I heard of the march of the King of the Cimbrians, and his Allies, towards Franconia; and some few days after, I likewise heard of the departure of the King my Father, with Gondioch, in order to joyn their Armies with the King of the Cimbrian's Forces, and to pour them altogether upon the King of the Franks, who received on his part the succour of his Allies, to defend himself from so formidable a power. I then heard with an extreme grief, all that which fortune acted against a person so renowned amongst men, for his admirable virtue; and if I did not resolve to fight on his side against my Father, because my Duty did prohibit me, there was at least, a strange disdain kindled in my Breast, against all those Princes, whom the hope of possessing Rosamond, or some other consideration, had cruelly armed against his life; and I nourished a resolution to encounter the most valiant amongst them, if I could meet with an opportunity, hoping thereby, as well to satisfy the inclination which moved me to it, as to render Pharamond a kindness, which might bring me to merit his friendship. I took Horse as soon as I was in a condition so to do, and though I was unwilling to appear in the Army of the King my Father, because my love forbid me; or in that of Pharamond, because my Duty would not permit it, I nevertheless took my journey towards Peapolis, without having any design determined, hoping from fortune some favourable occasion which might effect more for me, than all I could premeditate. But I was scarce departed, when I heard that the King of the Cimbrians, who with divers other Kings was entered some days before into Franconia, had given battle to King Pharamond, and had lost it with the lives of a hundred thousand men, which remained dead in the Field, together with two Kings, and divers other illustrious persons. I knew in course, the arrival of the King my Father, and of Gondioch, the union of their Army with the King of the Cimbrians, the King of the Cimbrians's death, with all that which had happened considerable, or of importance, during these great emergencies.

I heard also with an excess of joy, the illustrious actions of the King of the Franks, and that glorious victory which he had obtained; for as my love, and the esteem of his virtue, had made me take his part; I confess that I fostered no favourable wishes for my Father's: and I testified at full some days after, that I was not of his side, in an encounter which I had in a Forest somewhat near the Camp, with the most valiant of all the Rivals of Pharamond; against whom, in satisfying my inclinations, the glory which I knew I should purchase, was enough to excite me to the design. Oh my dear Brother, (said then Albisinda to the Prince, stopping the current of his discourse) was it then you that fought so near this Camp with the valiant Balamir, and who left him so large a subject to speak worthily of your valour, and all that appeared to him of your person. Yes, my dear Sister, replied the Prince, It was I that encountered Balamir, or at least that had begun to encounter him, when we were separated by a Knight, whom I have since understood to be the Prince of Persia; and that soon after, the sight of some Troops of Horse which I saw coming from that Camp, constrained me to retire. I pass'd by the Army of the Franks, and took my way towards Francfort, where I was inform'd, that the Princess Theodmira was arriv'd some days before, and knowing that she had left Polixena at Peapolis, by reason of some affairs which had brought her to Francfort, which was under the Government of her Husband, I design'd to see her, and consult with her, as with an Oracle of my Fortune. Here, Sister, I saw, and was received by her, as if I had been her own Son; I found her as well affected towards me, as she had given me reason to believe; and in fine, Sister, to finish this recital, and to tell you what now brought me hither, I learn'd from her the love which Marcomire had for you, with part of those actions he hath performed to let you understand it, I knew moreover, by the strict tye which is between Polixena and Marcomire, nothing could be more favourable to my Amours, than those assistances that I might receive from Marcomire; and that doubtlesly, he would never refuse them me, if I desired the same kindness, which I could desire from him, on his behalf from the Princess my Sister. I accepted the proposal with an excess of joy, not only because it flattered my hopes, but because there was nothing in effect in the person of Marcomire, either by his birth, by the fair qualities of his person, or by the glory of his actions, which made me not judge him most worthy of your affections; and which did not oblige me (if the choice depended on me) to prefer him before the greatest part of those Princes that I now see crown'd with Diadems. So that after I had entreated Theodmira to assure Marcomire, when she found an opportunity, of the intention I had to serve him, I took leave of her to come secretly to this Camp, and find the means to see you without being known. And by the assistance of Haldan, I thrived in my design, to whom I have trusted my self upon all accounts, and he having the same power in the Army of the Sueves I had formerly given him, and the first command near the King's person, had the means to conceal me in his Lodgings, and to afford me the casie opportunity to see you, and to give you fresh assurances of the affection which I have always had for my dear Sister.

PHARAMOND.

BOOK III.

V*iridomar* thus finish'd his discourse, and made the Princess to blush in such a manner by his last words, that of a long time she was in no condition to answer. He often importun'd her to a reply, but seeing his importunity augmented her confusion, and the trouble which appeared in her face, he endeavour'd to help her in the perplexity wherein he had cast her, and so with a smile. I did not believe, Sister, said he, that that which I told you of Prince Marcomire, could have wrought that effect upon you which it hath produced; or rather, that you could have sufficiently forgot that amity which hath always been between us, to understand with so much shame, and happily with so much distaste, that I know any thing of your affairs: Nobody will admire, that a Princess so fair, and amiable as your self, should have yielded some love to Marcomire; and though the knowledge of his love, with that of his merit, had

touched your heart, I should neither admire, nor could I blame you for it, I know him of so divine a form, that there are few persons in the world, which might not be sensible of his affections; and should scarce have loved you better, if you had been as refer'd as Polixena. But, my Lord, (said the Princess at last, taking some confidence from his discourse) although the person of Marcomire were perhaps such as you describe it, and that I only began to understand it by a kindness which he did me at the price of all his blood, what judgment might you have pass upon me, if I had entertained any complacence for the love of a Prince, whom I ought always to look upon as the Brother of Pharamond, and consequently as a person, who in lieu of the consent, will always have the hatred of the King my Father. I should judge, replied the Prince of the Sueves, that you were Mistress of a Soul capable to discern merit, and to acknowledge services, and as by being born of the same Father as your self, my thoughts however are not conformable to his, I am not to think it strange, that you should not conform your self to those, which he cannot without injustice have against a Prince so innocent of his displeasure, and who at the peril of his life freed you from the hands of his Enemies. I must needs tell you, Sister, and I speak it with sincerity, that I should blame you, if that complacence for the inclinations of a Father too rigorous, and in his hatred too immoderate, could have rendred you ungrateful towards a Prince, to whom you were so much obliged, and whom, escaping from one danger, in which he had almost lost his life in your defence, you saw fall into another, which through the injustice of the King of the Cimbrians, was not less desperate, nor less considerable. I know not, Brother, (said the Princess, with more joy than she durst express) whether I ought to believe, that your thoughts are really such as you endeavour to persuade me, and whether you have so much indulgence, as you tell me, for those which you seem to infuse into me. And I know not, replied the Prince, wherefore you should have this diffidence of my sincerity, if it be true, that you have so good an opinion of me, as you have formerly had. But dear Brother, replied the Princess, do you know all which hath happened during the love that Marcomire hath had for me? And hath Theodomira informed you of all those particulars? They were not known to her, added the Prince, for she only told me that since his return, and some days after the great Battel, Marcomire had visited the Princess Polixena at Peapolis, and in declaring to her the love which he had for you, he had entreated her for his sake to be favourable to me, and to do the same thing for him, which I now pray you to do for me; that she had trusted this secret to her, but she told me no more particulars of the love of Marcomire, whether it were because she was really ignorant of them, or that she would keep her Brother's secrets: That she only knew, that Marcomire died for love of you, and that I could do nothing more advantageous for my own affection, than to be favourable unto him in his. Since it is so, (replied Albisinda, fully assured by her Brother's discourse) and that I ought to give an entire belief to those assurances which you give me, I shall open my heart to you, even to the very secretest of my thoughts, without concealing any thing I have learn'd of Marcomire's: but it will be necessary, that you give me to this effect a hearing, like to that I have afforded you, when you can conveniently do it; and when you are thoroughly inform'd in all my concerns, you shall prescribe me what rules you please, with this entire assurance, that though the person of Marcomire should be less acceptable unto me than it is, there should be nothing that were possible for me to do, which I would not submit to for your satisfaction. At these obliging words, Viridomar embraced the Princess his Sister with all the marks of a most tender affection; and immediately after, I never doubted of your affection, (said he with a confident look) although you deserved it for that distrust you had of mine; and as I am content to owe a great part of that happiness that I expect from my love, to that you intend to do for me, so you may rest confident, that to favour the love of Marcomire, if it be not disagreeable to you, I shall pass over all those difficulties which you might fear from me. I have already told you, that I consider not his not being a King, which may seem to hinder him, from aspiring to a Princess that may well expect to espouse a King, seeing that for his valour, and the rare endowments of his person, there are few Kings in the world, to whom I would not willingly prefer him: But I shall add, to satisfy the desire you might cherish, not to descend in dignity, that (as Theodomira informed me) King Pharamond did declare, when he went to receive the Crown of the Gauls, to which he is called, and which is of much higher importance than that of Franconia, that he is resolv'd to give that of Franconia to Marcomire: But of this we shall speak more at leisure, and since time forces me to retire, and leave you to your repose, we will remit the rest till to morrow, when I shall most gladly give all attention to the recital of your Adventures, in which I interest my self as much as for my own. To this effect, I shall return hither at the same hour I came to day, and when we shall rest equally instructed in our affairs, we will cause our friendship to act, as it behoves us, for our mutual satisfaction. As I have not hitherto concealed any thing from the Queen of the Cimbrians, said Albisinda unto him, and that I cannot see you often without giving her suspicion, and that for her secrets, I dare better answer for her than my self, you would highly oblige me, to permit me to speak of you to her, and more especially to let her see you; and I am confident, that if the sight of her do not make you forget Polixena, it will at the least, shake your affection. To convince you that I fear not that danger, replied the Prince, I will see her when you please, well knowing that she hath a courage too great, and that she hath lost too little of it, to nourish any resentment against me; and for the management of this interview, that it may be secret, I shall wholly rely upon you, wholly committing all to your prudence. After these words and some caresses, which a long absence exacted from a tender and strong amity, the Prince had his Sister Good Night, and withdrew himself by the same way that he came, by means of that liberty which Haldan afforded him. Albisinda, after his departure, went into her chamber, and so to Bed, but it was not without sharing to Imbergida a part of that joy she reflected, both by the return of her Brother, whom she so dearly loved, and by the hope of a protection, she expected from him in an affection wherein the severity of the King her Father, had created many fears of great oppositions. This joy in effect, which then took up her whole heart, was not so slight, but that it might hinder her rest, which Imbergida knowing, and that she had need of sleep after so long sitting up, gave such orders that she might lie a bed the greatest part of the next day.

But if joy could interrupt the sleep of Albisinda, there were other persons not far off, in whom different passions did cruelly work the same effect; for whilst silence and darkness gave repose to a great part of the world, the unfortunate Amalazontha was miserably tormented by all that which an affection born under a fatal Star, could make her feel, of most doleful, or most terrible. It seemed in all other places, that this passion, to men so natural, insinuated it self with a kind of sweetness, or at least presented at first, something of flattery agreeable to the mind. But in this fair Queen, the same passion seemed to introduce it self as an enemy, and that having forced those defences she had made to oppose it, it carried a fire every where without pity, and establish'd it self with a severe tyranny. Sometimes she likewise look'd upon it as an effect of Heavens anger, which she believed to have been exasperated by an ingratitude, with which she some times reproach'd her self; and in fighting for the evils that it made her feel, she languished without any hope of relief, and without daring to desire it. And the more she defy'd her misfortunes, the more terrible she found them, through the small disposition she naturally had to submit her self to love; and making a comparison of her condition upon that of other persons, upon whom fortune exercised her power with rigour, she found nothing in theirs which was not less strange, and less cruel than that which she made trial of in her own. The sad reflection she made thereupon, plunged her into a Sea of grief, in which all her constancy was shipwreck'd, and her eyes, those fair eyes which both knew to give life and death, and which more than once had given wounds, which death only could cure, were either then drown'd in tears, or cast down with a languishment, no ways natural unto them: it even seemed, as if she never turned them but with disdain upon all other objects, not seeing any more that charming object, upon which she had so fatally fixed them: and if contrary to her design, any of those dangerous glances, which might enflame a heart of Ice, escaped her eyes, they disowned the effect at the same instant, and denoted it by sad and slow motions, which grief only could teach them. She strove very much, and many ways to dissuade her torments; but if at some times these endeavours produced their effects, at other times they stood her in no stead, for they imprinted upon her visage (maugre her) the marks of that cruel constraint she imposed upon her self. She was likewise deprived of that sweet consolation which is found in the greatest evils, when we are permitted to communicate them; and she found something in hers so extraordinary, and so little suitable to her courage, and to her first inclinations, that she hardly durst open her mouth to deposit the lightest part of her griefs, in the bosoms of those of her Attendants that she most loved; for although she discerned in the fair Queen of the Cimbrians, and in the charming Albisinda a most real and tender amity for her, which might merit her confidence; and that she had even proposed that comfort to her self, of laying her heart open unto them, in these misfortunes wherein they might give her both advice and comfort, all those desires were banish'd by the shame which she put in opposition to them, which set a vermilion dye upon her cheeks, in that very moment she fram'd the very thought in her mind. That same day by the tender caresses of the fair Queen of the Cimbrians, and by the sweet importunities of Albisinda, she was tempted more than ordinary, through an inclination we naturally have to discover the cause of our sufferings; but at last she became Mistress of her inclinations, and fancied that she had obtained no slight victory in the concealment of her secret. Though when she was in Bed, and that instead of the repose she there sought, that merciless passion came to attack her in her solitude and darkness, with much greater forces than those that could assail her, in places and at times where company might divert a part of her grief, she saw her self miserably abandoned to her most severe persecution; and this most cruel and importunate resemblance, or rather this amiable and dear Idea, which was become with so arbitrary a power, Mistress of her Soul, presented its self to her closed eyes in the obscurity of the night, as fair and visible, as if it had appeared in the clearest day-light. The endeavours she used to remove it from her, seemed to make a greater addition to it; and when she perceived, that she vainly laboured to put it out of her thoughts, exasperating her self through its obstinacy to torment her. Leave me, said she, leave me, thou merciless Enemy of my repose, and do not war with so much inhumanity, upon a heart which never before groaned under the like sufferings. Thy victory would be much fairer, if thou wouldst proceed with less cruelty; and thou mightest content thy self with making Amalazontha sigh for a mischief, to her altogether unknown, without carrying death, as well as love into her breast; neither canst thou long reign there, if thou reignest with so much violence; for it is a rare thing, that in a Soul so unaccustomed to such terrible torments, it should not produce a most fatal effect. But pursuing her Complaints, after a short silence, *What art thou, cried she, most importunate vision, that incessantly persecutest one? And what is it, that thou eternally presents to my memory? Must I burn, without knowing who hath cast the flame in my breast? And must I grow mad for an Apparition, or for a Phantom, which appeared, and disappeared like Lightning to my eyes? What know I, whether the thing I love be mortal or no? And how know I, whether revengeful love hath not presented me this fair Idea, to punish in me that ingratitude which might have exasperated him: this misfortune were not without president, nor should I be the first, upon whom this God in his anger hath exercised his vengeance. Alas! (proceeding a while after) unfortunate Amalazontha, dost thou not already perceive that thy love disturbs thy reason, and makes thee discourse like a Frantick enraged, having extinguish'd all the light of thy soul? He that thou lovest, is not only a mortal, though through thy own misfortune, perhaps more than in reality there appears to thee, something of Divinity in his person: But he is likewise a person of a Rank very much inferiour to thine, a person that is a Subject to Pharamond, a person thou canst not look upon without offending thy self: and with all this (she added, fetching a sigh) a person that loves thee not, and one perhaps that may never love thee whilst he lives. Hast thou observed any thing in him might make thee judge that thy sight hath wounded him? And when thy eyes discoursed to him, too largely of the sentiments of thy heart, couldst thou perceive by the least glance, that his were correspondent to thine? So little of this was discernable, that (to thy misfortune) thou mightest easily observe the contrary. He hardly afforded himself the time to speak to thee some words of civility for his Prince, and as if thy sight were troublesome to him, he quitted thy presence in an instant, without so much as turning his face towards thee. Thy eyes which followed him as far as they could, did but too well observe it, and whilst he was discoursing unto thee, he applyed himself much more to the justification of Pharamond, than to the contemplation of thy beauty: Oh that for thy happiness, or for thy consolation, it had pleased Heaven, that he had done as much as the Brother of Pharamond, who rendred thee a service, to which civility alone could not oblige him, who applyed himself with so much earnestness to accompany thee to the limits of this Camp, who discoursed to thee in so passionate a manner, both with his eyes and tongue, and who made thee judge, that he might have an affection for thee, if a wretch who could have so easily received it without a return, had been capable to touch a heart in that conjuncture of time wherein hers lost its precious liberty. But senseless creature (said she a while after, reproving her self) of what dost thou complain? And if it be true, that thou endeavourest thy cure, why dost thou look with discontent on what may advance it? That which thou desirest, had only served to have engaged thee farther, and made thee love perhaps all thy days, what thou oughtest not possibly to affect one moment. Alas! (continued the sighing) I know not whether I ought to love him, but I much fear that I shall always love him, and that all those endeavours I shall use to break my fetters, will only serve to clench them faster. Those succours which I hope from my courage and virtue, may well combat my passion, but I fear scarce vanquish it; for in fine, all the symptoms that I observe in my wound, rather foretel my death, than recovery. She paused some moments upon this sad lamentation, and passing in course to another, to which she frequently applyed her thoughts, her Soul laboured to find out who this amiable and too much beloved object of her thoughts might be, and revolving in her mind with some kind of delight, all those things which had appeared to her in his person. *But who, said she, can this miraculous man be, who like a Planet falling from Heaven presented himself to me? What man parallel to this (since it is not Pharamond) can be in Pharamond's Army in Germany, or in the whole universe, of whom fame hath been silent?

and what a personage ought Pharamond to be, of whom she hath published so many wonders; if there be men like this about his person of whom she makes no mention. But dost thou not know, (said the reproving her self) that fame is not accustomed to fix her self upon extraordinary appearances, that she would neither speak of Pharamond nor of Balamir, if they had nothing but a good aspect without other advantages: and that notwithstanding a celestial beauty, a majesty more than humane, and a grace altogether miraculous in his deportment and discourse, this person may be of so low a merit, that fame did scorn to bear his name upon her glorious wings unto thee. She had scarce entertained this thought, but she reproved her self, and disown'd it at the same instant: Ab let us not offend, said she, what we must love in spite of us, or rather let us not offend our selves, in believing that a subject without merit could give us shackles, which possibly we may wear all the days of our life. He that appeared to us is too great to be accompanied with a vulgar soul, a mediocrity of courage or a common merit: And my heart much better informs me, than fame could do with her hundred mouths, that he is but too worthy of our affections. What shall we then do? for it is time to determine our irresolutions: Shall we love that which we would not love; or shall we dye not to love against our will? Alas! (concluded she with many sighs) There is the difficulty, and it is a difficulty that must be decided by Heaven, and by that powerful star which governs my destiny not my own will. Suffer in the interim O my heart, since heaven and fortune so ordain it, without abusing thy self to any thought unworthy of thee: and you my eyes, since it was you that presented this poison to my heart, weep even to death for the crime you have committed, and wash it, if possible, away with my tears. The unfortunate Lady in this manner tormented her self, and her eyes to obey the commandment she imposed upon them, distilled at the same instant a River of tears upon her fair Cheeks, nor did the shower cease, untill that her grief insensibly stupified her spirits, and made them yield to the dominion of sleep. She slept indeed, but could not find repose in her sleep: for that amiable shape which she kept eternally in her memory, whilst her eyes were open; presented it self more charming to her imagination in her dream, and much fairer (if it were possible) than it appear'd in reality.

As in dreams all impressions form themselves, with no less violence than in the real sight of the object, so was she touched to the very bottom of her soul, with that so dear and desirable sight: and viewed with extasie the beloved object, and in her vision observed the same features which had wounded her; when she fancied that that adorable, though unknown person shewed her his heart open, and made her see therein a fair image which rul'd over it. Nor could he so content himself, but he added words to his gesture: “View, Malazontha, said he unto her, with how great a power this heart is defended which thou assaultest, it might burn for thy sake if it were free, for alas it is but too too sensible: but another object entirely employs it, and if thou dost not chase it thence, it is in vain for thee to hope to reign there. After these words she dream'd that he approaching unto her, shewed her the fair image at so near a distance, that she might easily observe all the traicts and lineaments, and that fixing her eyes upon it (transported with her grief and jealousy) she knew it for the Pourtraiture of Rosamond.

The knowledge whereof so sensibly wounded her, that sleep could not resist the smart thereof: for waking her self suddenly she opened her eyes, and cast them on every side of the bed, to find out the object she had lost. This vision remain'd so strongly imprinted on her imagination, that she found it difficult to perswade her self that it was not a real apparition: and the torment she suffered made her complain so loud, that one of her Women, who lay in her Chamber awaked, and running to her bed in a fright, demanded of her the cause of her complaints. At first she only answered with sighs, but being again importun'd by her woman; “Let me alone Euridice (said she unto her) it is my mind that suffers, and not my body: and the relief which thou canst give me, will work but little towards my cure. “But Madam, Euridice was saying to her———“Let me alone (said the Queen once more) and content thy self to know that I am unfortunate, and that I am hardly my self.

After these words which caused Euridice to withdraw, her thoughts returning to what she had heard in her dream; her mind was for some time so totally taken up therewith, and she listned thereto with so much attention, as if the words she had heard had been pronounced unto her by an Oracle: then turning her thoughts with some resentment upon the fair Queen of the Cimbrians; “What, said she, is it then Rosamond to whom I have vowed so tender and so sincere an affection, which must render me miserable, and that beauty which till now I have looked upon without envy, though she may cause it in all that the Earth hath of fair and excellent, will only make use of her Charms to my ruine? Ah Rosamond! how difficult it is to see you without loving you, and yet how hard will it be for me to “love you, if you procure my death. But wherefore, wherefore shouldst thou cease to love her, though she should enjoy the place which thou wouldst dispute with her? and what cause canst thou have to complain, if she had made this conquest before that thou sawest him, and before that thou hadst any interest in him? “But why dost thou so admire (continued she a while after) that in the condition thou art in, thou art capable of this injustice: Is it in love that one ought to seek reason? Rather comfort thy self in knowing this, that it was only in a dream that thou didst apprehend thy misfortune, and that dreams though not always false, are seldom true. She sought some repose in this thought, and having dispell’d (by the assistance of her reason) a part of those impressions which might have given her cause of resentment against Rosamond; she surrender’d up her self a new to the protection of sleep: But because it was day er’e sleep begun to close her eye-lids; she waked so late that the Queen of the Cimbrians (who by the privilege which her sex and friendship gave her, came to visit her a bed) was entred into her Chamber, and sat upon the side of her bed, before she opened her eyes: so that the first object which struck them in receiving the light, was the very same which perplex’d her mind the greatest part of the night.

This sight, which the remainder of an impression that she could not entirely chase from her mind, began in despite of all her power, to render the Queen’s presence less acceptable than (till that moment) it had been unto her, surprizing her with astonishment: and at the same instant recalling to her memory, all that her fatal dream had foretold, it extremely troubled her, and caused her to sigh and blush. The Cimbrian Queen no sooner spied her eyes open, but she gently embraced her; and kissing her divers times gave her the good morrow: and the fair Amalazontha not to appear insensible of her Carests, though perhaps she received them with less sensibility than at other times; drew her fair Arms out of the bed, slung them about her neck, and embracing her returned her kisses: but because at the same instant, her vision returned to her memory, entirely such as it appeared in her sleep; she could not conceal what it put in her mouth: and giving the Queen the last kiss with sighs, whose violent passage she could not obstruct, “Ah my Sister, said she, must it needs be you that must render me thus miserable? She had scarce uttered these words, moved thereto by a strong passion which she was not Mistress of; but the blushes which appeared on her face, witnessed her repentance: and the adorable Rosamond who had heard them with astonishment, looking earnestly upon her; “How Sister, said she unto her, is it I that render you miserable? “Alas dear Sister, replied Amalazontha, do not take notice of what I say, for in truth I am not very wise. “You are too wise (replied the fair Queen) to have uttered those words without reason, and I am too sensibly touched thereby to leave you at quiet till you have explained them. “You will soon see my wisdom (replied the charming Queen of the Turingiens) when you shall understand, that before my sleep I extoll’d my happiness in your friendship, and that through a dream I complain and exclaim against you. “I will not answer, replied Rosamond with a smile, for the harm I may do in your dreams: but in sincerity I know I shall never wilfully do you any, and that there are none in the world, to whom your repose and happiness is more dear than my self. “This good intention (replied Amalazontha with a fained smile) doth not secure me from the mischief which my dream foretold, and you might well (although it were true) sincerely love me, yet cause the misfortune of my life. “Make me understand then, said Rosamond, what this dream was which doth me so much prejudice, and then permit me to explain it with less disadvantage to my self than possibly you have done. “You can apprehend but little by my dream (said Amalazontha very sorrowfully unto her) so far as you are wholly ignorant of the state of my mind: and I shall inform you both of the one and the other, as soon as I am mistress of a sufficient courage to do it. “It is not courage that you want said the Queen unto her, but rather an entire confidence: and if I have no merited it whilst we were friends together, I shall not demand it of you now your dream hath set us at variance: I told you yesterday, dear Sister, replied Amalazontha, that nothing hindered me from telling you my misfortunes, but a desire I cherish’d to maintain my self in your esteem, and a fear that you had not kindness enough for me to attribute to my misfortune, and not to my natural inclinations; what really springs from my misfortunes. “When I shall be known to you sufficiently, and so much beloved by you to hope it; I shall open my heart farther unto you than you desire: and likewise to the Princess of the Sueves, who interestes her self equally with you in my afflictions, and whom through an opinion I have of her mildness) I should less fear than your self in confessing my weakness. “You have little reason to fear either the one or the other, said the charming Queen, or to expect a larger knowledge, or a stricter amity from us, since it is most certain (for I dare answer for Albifinda, as well as my self) that none can have a more sincere friendship than we “have really for you : and that we already sufficiently know you, to judge of you as ad-“vantagiously in all things as your self can desire. But if you have any reason to conceal “from us what we are ignorant of, or any reluctancy to let us understand it, do not con“strain your self, dear Sister, to inform us of any thing, till you really believe you shall find “some relief by imparting it to us : since you may sufficiently assure your self that the con“cealment can no ways alter our amity. In the interim you may rise for it is something “late, and when you are dress’d we will raise the Princess of the Sueves, who still sleeps as “I am inform’d : and we will endeavour to find (for the remainder of the day) some diver“sion together to qualify our misfortunes : for you may well believe dear Sister, that I have my share of them as well as you. After these words, she called for her women, and caused her to dress her self before her : Amalazontha did as she desired, and a while after they went forth together to the Princess Albisinda’s Chamber. Passing a Gallery which was in their way, they perceived on the one side the Prince of Persia, and Martian coming towards them, and on the other, Gondioch and Godegesle, who most courtcously gave them the time of the day : and taking them by the hand (which their Squires then quitted) led them to the Princess of the Sueves apartment : but so soon as the Queens told them, that she was in bed and slept, they took their leave and left them at liberty. Albisinda was yet in effect a sleep, through the care which Imbergrida had taken to favour her repose, and had possibly slept much longer, though the Sun had half finished his course, if the Queen of the Cim- brians who had been that day the most vigilant, had not waken’d her by accusing her of slothfulness. “What dear Sister, said she, you fancy your self still at Strazone, and believe “you are to sleep in War, and a Camp like this as peaceably as at home. “As I am no great “warriour (said Albisinda unto her rubbing her eyes) I confess that I accustom my self to the “maxims of war against my will, and yet possibly this night I was the last sleeper amongst “you. “I may perhaps dispute with you upon that point, said the fair Amalazontha unto “her, and peradventure (added the Queen of the Cimbrians) that those that complain least,

 “have not enjoyed a sleep, either more large or more peaceable than yours : But as for you “dear Sister (said she to Albisinda) who appear much more at ease than my self, and less “afflicted than Queen Amalazontha ; I would willingly know what employments can have “interrupted your sleep, since yesternight that we parted. It is not just (said she smi-lingly to her) that you should always know my affairs, for in fine I will begin to keep something reserved to my self. That will not prove perhaps so easie as you fancy it, said Rosamond unto her, for I know you so well at present, that it must be very hard for you to conceal any thing from me.
 I will not affirm the same of you, replied Albisinda, since I am very confident that you have often entertain’d thoughts which you have not communicated to me. Ah Sister, said the Queen, with how little reason do you accuse me, it being most true, that I often discovered those things to you, which I strive my self to be ignorant of. For the Queen of the Turingiens (replied the Princess of the Sueves) she is very careful in preserving a Secret : but if she have this advantage on the one side, to know that we cannot betray her ; she is deprived on the other side, of that comfort which we might administer to her griefs, had we the knowledge of them. I perceive, said Amala- zontha, that I shall not in the end be able to defend them against the desire you have to know them, although possibly I ought rather to dye than to declare them, and that I run an eminent danger to lose (if you have not a great kindness for my misfortune) a great part of the esteem and affection you have for me. But because it is very important for me, to make you judge of my inclinations, by other proofs, than those which you may extract from the confession I am to make you : before I come to it I shall relate to you with method, those principal events of my life which confusedly may have arrived to your knowledge : and by the discourse which I shall make you, I will fortifie my courage for a confession, which will make me so much ashamed of my self, that perhaps were you in my place, you would hardly confess so much to me. “Ah dear Sister (said the Queen of the Cim- brians) do not impose this violence upon your self, to satisfy the curioly of Albisinda, “who was never so unreasonable as she appears at this time : and yet doubtlesly only ceases
 “to be so, by intercessing her self so much in your griefs. But rest assured that our friend“ship will never take it ill although you should always conceal this secret from us, which “you have so much reluctancy to discover. The resolution is already made, said Amalazontha, and since it is so, the greatest difficulty is vanquish’d. But as through the design which I have to inform you of those passages of my life you are ignorant of, or but imperfectly know ; I am to make you a very long discourse, it is necessary that you should this day afford me the conveniency to perform it, in some place where we may not be interrupted. If you please (replied the Princess of the Sueves) we will dine together here in private, and upon the appearance which I will make of being indispos’d, I shall charge Imbergrida to give out, that you desire to be here alone for some hours, and to intreat those that have a design to see you, to defer their visits. The two Queens approv’d Albisinda’s

Albisinda's proposal, who only dress'd her self by halves, by reason she design'd to keep her Chamber that day, and to receive again Prince Viridomar in the Evening: and having caus'd their meat to be brought thither, they din'd together without any company but such Ladies as us'd to wait upon them when they eat in private.

After dinner Imbergida put in execution the order which was given her, (which was very cruel to the amorous Princes, who could not lose without much displeasure though but for an hour the sight of their beloved objects:) and the Princesses having dined in a private Lobby, Albisinda who was not quite dress'd, flung her self again upon her bed: Rosamond seated her self close by her, and the Queen of the Turingiens who was to speak, placing her self in a Chair, remained a long time silent; either to finish her resolve, or to recal to her memory those things which she had to say, and having often chang'd colour ere she could give liberty to her tongue, she express'd her self at last in manner following.

The History of Amalazontha.

BEfore I enter upon the recital of those things I am to inform you of, or rather of those last which I am to confess unto you (for I shall more easily make you a repetition of the former) give me leave to hope fair Princesses, that though the confession which I am to make you of my misfortune, should cause me to lose something in your opinions, it will not at least deprive me of any thing in your affections, and that you will rather attribute it to my sinister fortune, or to the anger of heaven, than to any thing which may render me unworthy of your friendship; that you will rather pity than condemn me, and that you will not deny me that consolation I desire of you, in a misfortune the most great, or at least the least common, which might befall a Princess of my birth. And upon this hope, after I have inform'd you of those accidents (whereof some part have been sufficiently important to come imperfectly to your knowledge) I shall pass to the severe confession I am to make you, of the original cause of my affliction; the remembrance whereof already clouds me in some confusion.

It is not necessary that I speak to you of my Birth, which is as well known to you as my self, nor that I tell you I am descended from many Kings to evidence my illustrious Blood. You likewise know, there only proceeded from King Cutheric my Father, the deceased King Amalaric and I, and that (my Mother dying when I was young) I was bred by my father's care with the Prince my brother, seven or eight years elder than my self. The King omitted nothing in our education, and finding me very conformable to his desire, he caus'd my youth to be carefully improv'd in all those Sciences he saw me naturally addicted to, or that he fancied might please him. He found me a proficient in all, and that for Musick, Dancing, and other accomplishments, few persons of my age excel'd me. Besides this, my person was not so contemptible (if I may be permitted to discourse thus of my self before the two perfections of the Universe) but that the discourse of flatterers (joyned with the love my father bore me) easily perswaded him that I was a fair Princess, and this received opinion easily augmented the affection he had for me, for he neglected nothing, to let me know it, of what he might produce for my advantage. I was bred up with a noble train, in a Palace magnificent for a person of my age, in the fair City of Lepbane situated upon the Elbe, a River to us sufficiently known: which taking its source in your Dominions, and passing through the King of the Sueves, and in course through the Country of the Calucons, and of the Catules, traverses all Turingia; and then powers it self into the Sea, between the Country of the Cauches and the Saxons: And therein I consum'd my childhood, which no memorable Actions renders worthy of recital. I shall therefore pass it over, believing that it can only prove tedious unto you: and shall tell you that in fine the tranquility of my first years was troubled with the publick, and that the King my father's dominions were cruelly assaulted by the Saxons, a furious and barbarous people; who some years since got footing upon our Coasts, and made all tremble by the terror of their Arms, from the shore of Suevia to the Ocean. Part of them fell with great forces into Denmark, and in a short time reduced that King to great extremity, from which he recovered himself by the valour of Prince Viridomar, who by divers triumphant victories acquir'd immortal glory in that war. Their other forces under the conduct of Genselaric the King's Son; came thundering upon Turingia, and by reason they surpris'd the King my father, who enjoyed a profound peace (while the other people of Germany were in Arms) they made a greater progress on the instant, than they could possibly have done had he been prepared: and foraging all the Country which they covered with a horrible number of armed men, they rendered themselves masters of all places, even to the Country of the Angilons. The King with his forces opposed them with all possible diligence, and Prince Amalric my brother, commanding them, acquired in divers battles he gave them a very fair reputation: but fortune was no favourer of his real courage: for through a youthful presumption, and a too great confidence of his valour, having hazarded battle with troops weaker behalf than those of our enemies, contrary to the advice of his old officers, and the King's intention, who was then sick at Lephane; he lost it with a great part of his men, and with the battle he lost his liberty: for covered with divers wounds, he remained a prisoner to our enemies. This great misfortune entirely ruined our affairs, for although the King with an extraordinary diligence, gathered forces from all parts of his dominions, and put all things in the best order was possible for him; he neither found himself in a condition to sustain the puissance of the Enemies, considering his own weak condition; nor to keep the field before so victorious an Army, which like a Torrent ravaged the whole Country: He might have hoped some succour from his Allies, but besides the impressions of fear which the Arms of the Saxons had already imprinted on all nations, which made them loth to draw their fury upon themselves; there were few Provinces which were not either engaged for themselves in war, or that found not themselves interested in the Alliances, which were enter'd into all Germany, either for the Romans and the King of the Cimbrians, and of the Sueves who fought for them, or for Pharamond and the King of the Burgundians, of whom the last had already obtained great advantages against the former; and the first began to make himself known by his early victories; so that the King of the Turingiens finding himself constrained to defend himself with his remaining forces, and deprived of the succour he might receive from his Son's valour; had not only always the disadvantage, but likewise saw many of his Towns lost, without being able to relieve them: and was in fine constrained to inclose himself in his Capital City, and put the Elbe between his remaining forces and his Enemies. From thence he sent for relief on every side, and yet received it from none: and a few days after the Saxons being come to lay siege to that City, gave him to understand that he must be reduced to the last extremities, if the Gods did not pity and relieve him.

As he was Master of a great and resolute courage, and that he had many more men than was requisite for the defence of the City, and a free retreat on the other side of the Elbe, which being in that place six times as large as in Bohemia or Suevia, hindered our Enemies, from besieging us (without much difficulty:) on the other side, he did not stoop to his misfortune, but endeavoured to the utmost of his power to resist it. I do not tell you any thing of my thoughts in that conjuncture, for you may well judge that interesting myself as I ought in the misfortune of our house and dominions, that I passed immediately from their ruine to the grief of a father who tenderly loved me, to the Prison of a Brother whom I had always dearly loved, and to all we had to fear in a City besieged. I suffered all that a person of my Age and of my Birth at such a time of distress could suffer: and every day with tears, implor'd the Gods to send those succours, which were necessary in so pressing a misfortune. The Gods in time sent it us from those hands whence we could least expect it; and I cannot without ingratitude but confess, that it was in a season when the King had no more hope of preserving any part of his Dominions: and had absolutely resolved to retire himself with me (by the way we had free on the other side of the Elbe) to some City which still remain'd to him on that side. But at that very time a fleet of fifty or sixty ships, appearing upon the Coast of the Cauches, came to an Anchor just at the mouth of the River Elbe. The Fleet was composed of Gauls, and commanded by the valiant Ambiomer, who by the fame of his valour had not only made himself known amongst the Gauls, but doubtlessly through the world. I believe you have heard much speech of his name, and that it is not necessary, that I should make you a copious recital of those brave actions, which have given him so great a reputation in the world to make you know him. No Sister, said the Queen of the Cimbrians, for there are few Nations and few persons even in the world, that ought to be strangers to the name of Ambiomer: For fame hath even given us an account of what he acted in Turingia, but not so orderly as to make us to dispense with the relation we expect from you. I shall make it you as succinctly as is possible, replied the fair Amalazontha, as well not to weary you with the length, as because I am little vers'd in the affairs of war, so that I cannot discourse of them but very imperfectly.

Arriving at the mouth of the Elbe, Ambiomer understood the war which the Saxons waged in Turingia, and the sad condition to which our affairs were reduced, and so far as much as he was a person that fought for honour in the War, and one that believed he could

could not find it but on the juster side, and was therefore an enemy to iniquity and oppression, and by reason of the rumour every where spread, of the Saxons cruelty, he had contracted a kind of hatred against them, and so resolv'd immediately to succour us, and to embrace this fair occasion of employing his valour in so legitimate a cause. He drew his Soldiers easily to consent, for they respect'd him as if he had been their King, although it was only for his own virtue that he then commanded them; and knowing that by the Elbe, Vessels of the greatest Burthen might pass a great way into Turingia, with the Sea Tide, which flow'd as far as Marionis, of which place the Enemy was then in possession; taking a time fit for his purpose, he made up the River with his Ships, and by the help of the Tide, advanced with an admirable diligence without any opposition, and without the Saxons least knowledge of his approach: he landed at a place very near Marionis, on that side where the Enemy was encamp'd; and having set ashore some of his Horse on the other side of the River, by which the passage into the besieged City was free, he sent them to advise the King of his Arrival to his succour, of the order of his march, and of the design he had to assault the Saxon Camp, counselling him to make a sally upon them with all his Forces, upon the signal he would give him of his arrival. The King received with an excess of joy, the news of a relief so little expected, and being conscious of the reputation of Ambiomer, he easily consented to his proposal: and to abridge the recital of those things I cannot discourse particularly to you, I shall tell you, that all things were executed as Ambiomer had designed, as well by reason of his diligence and good conduct, as through the negligence of our Enemies, who believing they had no other Foes to combat, than those behind the Walls of Lephane, neglected the Guard of their Camp; so that Ambiomer assaulting them on the one side, and my Father sallying out upon them on the other, with all his Forces, before they could dream of making any defence, Ambiomer and his Gauls had made a bloody execution; and at last when they had rally'd, and came up in good order, he fought them with so much valour, that on all sides he cover'd the ground with their dead carcases, and struck such a panick astonishment into their Camp, that he scarcely found any farther resistance, in gaining a passage to the King, who had assaulted, and broken with equal vigour (on his side) the Ranks of his Enemies, chasing the Saxons from those Posts and Trenches they possess'd nearest the City, and lodging his Gauls therein, who promis'd to defend them at the price of their lives. Having given necessary orders, they entred the City together, where the King received and treated him, rather according to the grandeur of the service he had received, and the future occasion he had of his assistance, than according to his Birth or Quality; for (as you may well know) Ambiomer was neither descended from Kings nor Princes, but only from Knights, who like himself had acquired Glory in Arms, and by their valour, had rendred themselves illustrious in their Country.

He had sought his first reputation in meaner employments, but raising himself from degree to degree, he had obtained in fine, such a rank amongst the Soldiers, and rendred himself so illustrious by many fair victories, in combating against the Romans for his Countreys liberty, that not only a considerable part of the Gauls had elected him for General of their Armies, but at the age of twenty five, which he then numbred, he had rendred himself the person most esteem'd; and most considerable for martial employments that was amongst the Gauls; fame recounted of him admirable things, as well for the valour of his person, which he had manifested in all his Combats, by actions which transcended belief, as for his understanding in War, which surmounted the capacity of the most ancient, and most famous Captains, and for his winning behaviour to gain the hearts of the Soldiers, amongst whom he was establish'd in such reputation, that they believed themselves invincible whilst he fought at their head. With these military virtues he possess'd all others in their highest perfection, and besides his knowledge in War, he was much more dignified with Learning, than you could believe of a person that had been always trained up in Arms, which Learning of his was accompanied with an admirable and natural eloquence. All his inclinations were tending to good, his manners full of innocence and equity, and with all these qualities you could rarely see a person of so good an aspect, nor more grateful in all his actions. I speak nothing of him to you which is not perhaps beneath the truth, and you will have reason to know at the end of my discourse, that it is not passion makes me speak in these terms. I saw him with the King as soon as he entred the City, and the King presenting him to me as a person to whom we owed all, I received him both as the importance of the relief he had given us did merit, and as his fair reputation, and as his advantageous presence oblig'd me. I saw nothing in his person which I did not judge worthy of consideration, and I wish'd nothing more in him, but the sole quality of a Prince, which

which was wanting. He saluted me, and spoke to me with a profound respect; and when I thank'd him for what he had done for us, he received my discourse with a better grace, than I could have expected from a person born and nourish'd in War; and he made me know that his courage was not greater in War, than his wit grateful and pleasant in Courtship: For my self, I know I was not displeasing unto him, as the sequel will sufficiently testify; but this time we had but a short entertainment, and as he well knew, that he had no time to lose, in finishing what he had so well begun, he employed that which he had, in learning the estate of the place, and the condition of our Army, and in putting himself in a posture to attack the Enemy, before they had time to unite their Forces after their defeat and disorder: He performed it before the next morning, for believing, himself with those men he brought with him, and those of ours that remained, too strong to be enclosed, he not only sallied out at their Head, but making use, like a great experienced Soldier, of the advantages of the former Combat, he charged the Enemy whilst they were yet in disorder, beat up many of their Quarters with great loss to them, and caused them to judge by the several assaults that he made, that his Forces were much greater than in effect they were; he constrained them to raise the Siege, and encamp at greater distance, but he left them no more there at quiet than before; for having entreated the King to slay at Lephane, where he might better provide for things necessary, than in marching with the Army, where his presence was not requisite, he tyred them without intermission, assailing them every day with great advantages to us; and in fine, so weakened them, that he believed himself in a condition to give them Battel, which because they did not refuse, as being yet much more numerous, he would not refuse them, and by his own admirable valour gained it so entirely, that there scarce remained a Saxon alive to carry news to his Country of their defeat. All their Officers were slain, and their Prince Genselaric with many wounds which he had received in fighting valiantly, was taken prisoner, and with much difficulty preserved by the care of Ambiomer from the fury of the Turingiens. After this Victory, all the Cities that were in the Saxons power, returned to the King's; and the Saxons which kept them, demanded no better conditions than to have the liberty of retiring safely to their Country. Ambiomer chased them all out of Turingia, and having rendred it as peaceable as it was before the Saxons arrival, he returned triumphantly to Lephane, where some days before he had sent Genselaric, with design to exchange him for Amalaric, whom the Saxons had sent into one of their Castles immediately after his taking. The King had honourably treated Genselaric as well through a consideration of his Dignity, as the recommendation of Ambiomer, and testified unto him, that notwithstanding the just resentment he might have towards him, for a war which he had waged with much injustice against him, he should suffer no greater displeasure by his captivity, than to be obliged to restore him his Son for the price of his liberty. Genselaric with much joy had accepted the proposition, but by reason he was much wounded, the King believed it more necessary to endeavour his recovery, than to labour in the exchange. The same day that Genselaric was conducted to Lephane, Rambaud, Son to the King of the Oriental Frisons, arrived there with some Troops he brought to our relief, which he had conducted into Turingia by passing the Visurgue, after he had cross'd the Bruçteres Country. Although his succour came late, and was fruitless, the King omitted not to own the obligation, knowing well when he left his Country to come to us, the War was neither finish'd, nor we able to judge what would prove the event thereof; and for this reason, and that which was due to his Birth, and to his illustrious Rank, the King received him as honourably as he could have possibly done, if he had arrived in our greatest necessity. Rambaud appeared much troubled that the war was finish'd without him, and that the glory was wholly Ambiomer's, whose fortune was envied by the greatest number of the young Princes of the age, but he had now no better way than to comfort himself with the proofs he had given of his good intentions, and to testify the share which he took in the King's joy, who after he had seen his Crown shaken, and his Dominions on the brink of ruine, now saw himself victorious, and peaceable in his Kingdom, by the valour and assistance of a person that was neither his Subject, nor Allye. The King really made him those acknowledgments to which he was obliged, calling him openly his Deliverer, his Defender and his Protector, and professing himself incapable to acknowledge what he owed him, unless he made him a tender of that same Crown which he held from his victorious Arms: And when he returned to Lephane, triumphant, and laden with Honour, and yet with as much modesty, as if he had performed nothing for us; he did not only go out of the City to meet him, and the victorious Army he brought with him; but he commanded me to accompany him with the principal Ladies of the Court, telling me, we could not render too much to a person, to whom we owed all things, and that he was more obliged, to perform this Honour to a Knight that had rendred him his Crown, than to a great King to whom he was not indebted. As the importance of those reliefs we had received of Ambiomer, merited in effect, that we should pay him that honour, I disposed my self thereto without any repugnancy; and I confess, that I saw Ambiomer that day in a condition, which might have infused favourable thoughts for him, into a heart that had greater dispositions to love. He marched at the Head of his Army, upon a very beautiful Horse, which he managed with the best grace in the world; his Arms were rich and magnificent, and being he was not to fight that day, his head was only covered with a small Helmet, shaded with a hundred white plumes; his shape appeared in his Armour the best proportioned in the world; his posture frank and unaffected in the Saddle, and his countenance so sweet, and so noble, that I believ'd (with all those that that day saw him) few men in the world could equal him: even the Prince of the Frisons, who had accompanied the King thither with ill will enough, being then near my Chariot, was constrained to agree to that opinion; but he no ways approved it, till Ambiomer alighted to make his obeysance to the King, the King descending from his Horse to embrace him, and render him all those observances which might be due to a King's Son. In short, the King being alighted approaching him, embraced him a thousand times, and told him all that a just resentment could put into his mouth of most obliging, and most honourable for him. Ambiomer received these marks of acknowledgment with much of modesty and submission, although with a free and cheerful aspect, and very gracefully opposed those praises which he had justly merited. After he had saluted Rambaud, who had alighted with the King, whom he treated with a more than ordinary respect, having learn'd who he was; the King conducted him to my Chariot, telling him, that since by his valour, Amalazontha and the other Ladies had obtained the liberty to go forth of a City, wherein they had been so long time immured, it was very just that they should employ it in coming to thank their Deliverer. Ambiomer replied very modestly to the King's discourse, and following to the Chariot, he saluted me much less like a Vanquisher, than a person vanquish'd; and he shewed much less courage and assurance at that time, than doubtlesly he had done in the Combat. He replied nevertheless like a man that well understood himself both to the acknowledgments I made him, and to those praises I justly rendred him; and when I represented unto him the importance of what he had done for us, It was very hard, Madam, said he, for those Enemies which fought against you, to have fortune favourable, for the victory can never be hardly obtained by those that fight on your side. It is not to me nevertheless that this honour is due, replied I with a smile, and if that of triumph amongst us, as with the Romans, were in use, it would be to you, and not to me that they would offer it, and one might justly confess, that few victories have so well merited it. Is it not a triumph sufficient for him (said then the Prince of the Frisons) to see the Princess Amalazontha come to meet him: was there ever Roman Captain that received an honour parallel in theirs? I confess, (said Ambiomer unto him) that it is much above my merit, and the service I have done, and I am not so presumptuous as to attribute it either to the one, or the other. You may attribute it unto both, said the King to him, for these marks of acknowledgments would seem very light, if we should not give you others of more importance. After these words and some others little differing, they all remounted, and returned on Horseback to the City, where the King not only that day, but at all other times, made Ambiomer know, that he thirsted with no greater desire, than that of acquitting himself of what he owed him, by all those ways that were possible for him. He likewise used his utmost endeavours therein, and on the instant offered him all his treasures, and all the Dignities of his Kingdom: but although Ambiomer testified no contempt of what he offered him, he would not accept of any thing, and only entreated the King to be pleased, that his Soldiers might benefit themselves with a part of that which they had gained upon the Saxons, whose Camp they had pillaged after the victory. The King would have given them greater recompences, but Ambiomer opposed it; and the King seeing he could not oblige him to receive any of those marks of his acknowledgment he had proffered him, although he presented him Provinces, resolved in despite of all denial to leave one to posterity in a Brass Statue, which he caused to be placed upon that Gate by which he entred the City, the first time that he vanquish'd the Saxons, and underneath the figure, which was equal to his natural proportion, on Horseback, and in Armour, he caused this Inscription to be writ.

To the eternal memory of the valiant Ambiomer, Deliverer of Turingia.

They treated in the mean timewith the King of the Saxons, Father to Genselaric, for his

his exchange for Amalaric; and by reason he was then engaged against the Danes in war, which began through the valour of Prince Viridomar to change the face of his affairs, he not only accepted the exchange of the two Princes, but he very willingly accepted of a peace; and after that it had been on both sides ratified, he sent back Amalaric, although Genselaric was still amongst us, knowing well that it was only an expectation of the healing of his wounds that retained him, and that after the peace concluded between the two Crowns, he remained with us not as a prisoner, but as a Friend, and an Allye. The peace being in this manner concluded, Ambiomer, who seeing that his Soldiers did nothing but pillage the Turingiens, who had already too much suffered, resolv'd to lead them back into Gallia; but the King could not consent to his departure, though he permitted it to his Army; and he entreated him so earnestly to remain some time with him, that Ambiomer, who perhaps had less mind to leave us, than he made us believe, resolv'd to comply with his desires, and sent back to their Country four thousand Horse, and ten thousand Foot which he had, under the conduct of their principal Officers, who as well as the Soldiers returned very sorry to leave him in Turingia, nor had they resolv'd to depart, but upon his promise to head them again within a short space. The Prince of the Frisons having found some reason to remain amongst us, sent likewise back those Troops which he had brought, so that within few days we were discharged of our men of War: But we had in our Court Genselaric, Rambaud and Ambiomer, the first staid by his wounds, the second, as he said, to see Amalaric, whom we expected, and the last to comply with the King's will; but all three by one and the same reason, more forcible than the other, as soon after appeared. Amalaric arriv'd some few days after, and by his arrival brought an inundation of joy into my Father's heart, into mine, and of all the Court, which for many days after gave publick demonstration thereof. The King received him with all tenderness imaginable; and I felt at his presence, all that joy which a real amity could possibly make any person feel upon the like occasion.

As Amalaric was generous, so he presently visited Genselaric, who was now almost well of his wounds, whom we had often before visited, and treated him as honourably as was possible. He likewise gave great testimonies of esteem, and acknowledgments to the Prince of the Frisons, who intimated to him an earnest desire of being link'd in a strict amity with him: but when he knew Ambiomer for the person to whom the State owed its safety, the King his Crown, and he his liberty, he omitted not any thing might make him judge he had a resentment proportionable to the greatness of the benefit, and finding him constant to his resolution, of accepting nothing the King had offer'd him, with which the ambitions of other men were usually contented, he perceiv'd in fine they were all beneath his courage; so that for the future, he look'd upon him with an esteem which could not permit him to present him any other recompence, than that which he found in the glory of his Actions.

Genselaric in the mean time being perfectly recovered, and receiving both from the King, and the Prince my Brother, an usage which might make him judge that his stay in our Court, was not displeasing; In lieu, of thinking of his departure, he put himself in an equipage conformable to his quality, and begun daily to visit me. Rambaud did the like, and Ambiomer came very often with them: But although the last, through the greatness of his services, and the advantages his person had upon theirs, had reason to believe himself more welcome than they; he was much less bold in his visits, and proceeded in all things towards me, in a manner much different from theirs; were it because he was conscious to himself, of the want of that dignity they gloried in, or that he had a natural inclination to act with more respect; but however it were, whilst the others spoke, he was for the most part silent, though he could have discours'd much better than they upon any subject, yet many times methought his eyes express'd more than their words. Genselaric could not see him without shame, nor resentment, by reason he still remembred how he had vanquish'd him, and snatch'd a fair Lawrel from his hand: and Rambaud bore an envy to his glory, and could not without much disaffection, endure that he should raise himself by his virtue, to a degree nearer his than he desired. Genselaric was a Prince couragious and valiant, he was of a handsome stature, but his aspect was somewhat grim, his wit tasted much of Barbarism, and the rudeness of his Nation, to let you know it was no way acceptable: Rambaud's was less rude, and indeed no way displeasing, when he pleas'd to shew it; but he was naturally proud, and much more conceited than he ought, of the greatness of his Birth, and merit of his person; he had a reasonable handsome aspect, and a high courage, full of ambition. As Rambaud and Genselaric fancied themselves of sufficient quality to mention love to me without offence, they both made me in a short time know the affection they bore me: But Ambiomer, who certainly had much more than they, concealed it to the utmost of his power, and acted a violence upon himself, to which, through their presumption they no ways judged themselves obliged.

The first that discovered himself to me by discourse, was Rambaud, who was naturally of a bolder spirit than Genselaric; and by reason he met not often with opportunities to speak to me without witnesses, he took one day his time as I went out of the Temple, with design to take a turn or two in a pleasant walk which fronted the Portal, he accosted me, and my Usher through respect quitting my hand, he ceremoniously assumed his office; and taking occasion to speak to me of what I came from doing, You come from praying to the Gods, Madam, said he to me, but I believe it was in a manner very different from ours. And what difference, said I, believe you to be between my prayers and yours? That, replied he, which may put us either in assurance, or incertitude of obtaining what we demand; for as you are certain that the Gods will deny you nothing, you petition them more boldly than those that have not that assurance. If I hope to obtain any thing of the Gods better than you, replied I to him, it is because I shall demand things more reasonable of them; for I know no other reason which can assure me of a greater credit with them than yours. You must pardon me, added he, if I am not of that opinion, and if I believe that amongst the Gods, as well as amongst men, the Dignity of the Petitioner is no less considerable than the justice of the petition. I cannot agree to your assertion, replied I unto him, without accusing the Gods of injustice; and besides, should what you affirm be true, that Dignity which creates a difference amongst men, hath not before the Gods the same effect, for the meanest have no mark to distinguish them there from the highest. Nor is it, replied Rambaud, of that Dignity you understand, that I would speak, for well I know, the Gods ought not to bear you more favourably than the people, because you are Princess of the Turingiens, but because your Beauty is celestial like theirs, and that like them you have Temples, and Adorers much more religious, and submissive than those which prostrate themselves before their Altars. He spoke these words in a manner sufficiently passionate, to make me apprehend the sequel; and to divert his discourse, I did not believe, (said I very coldly unto him) that you had thus designed to conclude, for there is a vast difference between real adoration, and adorations imaginary, of which you speak. Ah, Madam, replied he very smartly, call not imaginary, that which is the most real in the world; and believe, if you will be equitable (like the Gods) that no adoration is more true than that I have for you. Although I might have foreseen, by what had appeared some days before in the looks, and in the behaviour of Rambaud, a great part of what I then experimented, I could not nevertheless entirely defend my self against the surprize and displeasure his hardy confidence had caused; nor had I the power to dissemble it, but looking on him with a severe fierceness, I cannot credit, said I to him, that what you find of divine in me should render me more formidable, for if to you I had been so, you would perhaps have been more timorous in exasperating me. You see nevertheless, said he, that the Gods are never irritated by any of those marks we give them of our affections towards them, but on the contrary, ordain and require it of us. The Gods may do as they please, replied I very briskly, but since I am no Goddess, you will do well to consider me as a Princess, to whom you owe a respect. All Rambaud's confidence could no longer defend him from that astonishment which my severe proceedings had created in his mind, which was the more surprizing, because (by reason of the good opinion he held of himself) little suspected: so that returning to my Chariot, I got to it, and was mounted therein before he could recover himself. Although Rambaud were of a sufficient quality to evidence without offence, the design he had for me, I could not nevertheless (through a natural aversion I had to love) abstain from testifying my displeasure; and methought no man ought to have treated with me in that manner, without first obliging me (by my Father's orders) to suffer it. But if Rambaud that day angered me, Genselaric two days after was guilty of as much, for in the King's chamber, where we were, seeing me solely approach the window, I know not with what design, he followed me like a person that had some news to tell me; and having accosted me with a countenance which shewed less of assurance than at other times; I know not, said he, wherefore you retire from the company, nor which of us it is you sue thus; but as a prisoner is privileged, I take the liberty to come and trouble your retirement. You may come, replied I, for several other reasons, but not for those you have alledged; for you well know you are no more a prisoner. I cannot, replied he, be longer the King your Father's, but I shall be yours even to death; for all the peace which can be concluded betwixt our Fathers, is not able to free me from your Chains. My Chains, said I to him, *as much exasperated by his discourse as I had been by Rambaud's, are not perhaps so soft as you believe them: and you may as soon weary yourself in this Prison as in the former. I may suffer there*, replied he, but never be weary of my sufferings: for the glory of this

Prison will sufficiently sweeten its rigour, so as to make me willing to continue therein with pleasure to the end of my life. I doubt (replyed I somewhat hastily) you would never find any pleasure there, and as I should not have more than you, I neither desire the effect nor love the discourse. Genselaric at this answer remained some time as if he had been struck dumb, but at length going about to prosecute his discourse, he presently saw himself interrupted by Amalaric and Rambaud, who were then approaching us: And Rambaud might for his satisfaction have perceived in my looks, if he had observed it, that Genselaric's conversation had been as little grateful to me as his. I treated happily too roughly with those personages whose birth equaliz'd mine, but besides that methought their proceedings were not very conformable to the respect they owed me, I could not believe there was any man in the world, whose love I could endure, so much had the Gods endowed me with a soul, contrary by nature to what it is since become through my misfortune. Amalaric discovered my displeasure in my countenance, and as the jealous Rambaud had made him observe Genselaric's actions, when he followed me to the window, and had perhaps obliged him to come and interrupt our discourse; he easily imagined the cause: and taking me apart from the company; Is it not true, said he drolling, that Genselaric hath a mind to begin the War afresh with you, and that if we would believe him, we should sooner become allyed, than return to our former enmity. I know not, replyed I, his intention, but I know that if I consult my own, there is already a sufficient alliance between us. I shall not, replyed Amalaric, promote a greater, for I avow I have not sufficiently pardoned him, for the shame he made me undergo, to take his part against a Lover that was more grateful to you. "No lover, replyed I, can ever be pleasing or grateful to me, for that quality would render odious the most amiable person in the world. In these words I then spoke the reality of my thoughts, as being ignorant of my future destiny: and Amalaric smiling to himself, having heard what I said; "As for Genselaric, Sister, said he, I may excuse you: "and should you not much affect Rambaud; I should not much oppose you: but if Ambiomer had a descent equal to theirs; I cannot fancy you could hate him, because he had an affection for you." I know not, replyed I, what I should do, nor is it necessary I should; "since that Ambiomer can neither become a Prince, nor hath any affection for me. "The "one might more easily happen than the other, answered Amalaric, and I could wish that in "acknowledgment of our obligations unto him, it were as ealie for me to make him a Prince "as for you to give him an affection. "You are too much conceited of my power, replyed "I to him, but all the world is not of your opinion: for a soul like Ambiomer's cannot be so "easily vanquished as anothers might be. Ambiomer approached us whilst we were thus discoursing of him though with much less boldness than the others, as a Person timorous of being wanting in his respects by interrupting our converse. Amalaric presently assured him, that his company could not but be always very grateful to us, and a while after seeing that no body over heard us; "Sister, (said he smilingly to me) Ambiomer is too much our friend "not to be admitted into our familiarity, and there is no person you can better advise with, "upon the choicé you may make of Rambaud or Genselaric. These words with those he "spoke before of Ambiomer created a blush, but the vermilion which appeared in my cheeks "was little considerable, in comparison of the change you might have observed in Ambiomer's: which in effect was such, that the Prince my brother could not abstain from "asking him whether he were indisposed.

He notwithstanding very quickly recovered himself, but as neither he nor I had answered to what Amalaric had spoken to me: "What (continued he, addressing himself to Ambiomer) would you not counsel my Sister, if you found her at a loss which of these two Princes to prefer: It is not my Lord from me, said Ambiomer, that the Princess upon such an occasion would take counsel; for I believe either the King's or yours would be sufficient: But if she did me the honour to demand my judgment, concerning those Princes merits; I should with sincerity declare it. "Do us then the favour if you please, replyed Amalaric, for if she dare not make you that demand, I will request it for her. "I find, said Ambiomer, that both the one "and the other have much of merit, but neither sufficiently deserving to render them worthy "of Amalazontha. He accompanied these words with an action so full of concern and passion, that might easily make me judge he had an interest himself. But although they flattered me, I could not abstain from hearing him with delight: And looking on him very favourably; "Either you have, said I, too good an opinion of me, or a very bad one of those "two Princes: or else you will make me believe that you love not Rambaud, and that you "still cherish some resentment against Genselaric for those evils he did us. "As for Rambaud, replyed Ambiomer, I know him not sufficiently either to love or hate: and for Genselaric, I ceased to hate him, when he ceased to be your Enemy. But neither hatred nor "any resentment could hinder me from doing them justice: and methinks to judge them "unworthy “unworthy of a fortune, which in my opinion no man can merit, is not to injure them: You do them so much the less, replied I to him, forasmuch as they think not of me; and that the Prince hath only put me upon this discourse to try my humour. “It is true, replied Amalaric, I had a mind to try your patience: But however I spoke it sincerely, and I spoke it before Ambiomar, because that after the service he hath rendered us, we ought not to keep any thing a secret from him. We had perhaps spoken farther upon this subject, but the King’s approaching us, hindred the prosecution of this discourse.

But if the boldness of Rambaud and Genfelaric were displeasing to me, their following proceedings were less agreeable: for they not only continued upon all occasions to speak to me as they had begun, and to make publickly known their affections for me; but believing to advance their affairs more with the King, than me; they address’d themselves to him: and endeavouring to prevent each other, they declared almost at the same time their design, and employed their utmost eloquence to make him approve it. As in effect it could neither offend the King nor me, they being both of a Quality that might openly declare it; the King received the knowledge very civilly, and without any sign of repugnancy: but he neither determined in favour of one or the other, for although he had had the intention, he had found it somewhat difficult to resolve. For in the dignities and Persons of these two Princes, there was not sufficient difference to incline him more towards the one than the other, and that which might more place the one in his inclinations, was sufficiently balanced by other powerful reasons. He was much more obliged to Rambaud, who was come into his Kingdom for its defence; than to Genfelaric who only entred it to ransack and ruine it: and consequently he ought to have been more favourable to his Ally than to his Enemy: But the Saxon considering the situation of his Territories, was a more formidable Enemy than the Frisson, whose Territories were separated from his by many Provinces, whereas the Saxon was his Neighbour both powerful and terrible, of whom we were every day in danger, and whose people were always seeking new occasions of war. This reason might hinder him from declaring himself, when his inclinations leaned towards Rambaud, and the fear of being accused of ingratitude, when it inclined to the other: so that he politickly explained himself to neither: but in acknowledging that their intention did much honour him, he gave them to understand that before they engaged themselves farther, they ought to learn the King’s their Fathers intentions, which happily might not be conformable to theirs: and that he was not ignorant of what ought to be observed between Kings in designs of this nature. By this means he gained time of these Princes, without being obliged to declare himself in favour of either: and I remained in the mean time exposed to their persecution which made me to suffer much, through the small disposition I had to hearken favourably to them. They spoke likewise thereof to Prince Amalaric, and equally endeavoured to render him favourable to them: But although his inclinations leaned more towards Rambaud than Genfelaric, the reason which had hindred the King from declaring in his favour, worked the same effect upon him: so that he let the King act according to his sentiments, without interrelling himself either for the one or the other. The King who always loved me with an excessive tenderness, and who was resolved not to vex me or make me unhappy, by contraining me to espouse a person, for whom I had no kindness, consulted my inclinations upon the choice of these two Princes: But although he found it entirely disposed to obey him, he nevertheless perceived it so far distant from any kindness to either of those Princes, that it caused him to defer the resolution he ought to have taken. They both in the interim remain’d at Court with magnificent Trains, making their expences answerable to their quality and their design: proposing every day some new braveries, either to make known their addresses, or to display their magnificence in emulation of each other. They daily met both in the King’s and my apartment, and as they were Rivals and competitors in the same design, they were not only in all things opposite to each other, and on all occasions testifying their little Amity; but without doubt had pass’d farther, without maintaining a verbal quarrel, but that they feared to offend the King, and displease me.

Whilst these were satisfying themselves by a publick manifestation of their passion, another person in this occasion less bold, though happily in all other things the most hardy of men, consumed and languish’d away without daring to declare his. Ambiomar, for you well know it is of him I speak, beholding with grief the defect of his Birth, though he knew himself greater than Princes by his Courage, and not doubting but that it was an invincible obstacle to his desires; covered with a respectful silence, the love he had really for me: But he could not restrain his eyes, which in despite of his Modesty did frequently discover it, nor to well order his countenance, but that you might easily perceive therein that his heart was wounded. After that great action he performed in our favour, he was in such credit credit in our Court, that you might have said he reigned there, had he been of a humour to have made use of his power; for the King having no way through the refusal he made of his offers, to acknowledge his obligations, chiefly testified his acknowledgments by the esteem he had of his counsel, and in the care he took to advance the persons he offered to dignities, and in preventing his thoughts in all things he judged might please him.

Ambiomer used his credit with an excessive modesty, but as the love of virtue reigned always in his Soul, he indulged the unfortunate virtue of his power, by advancing, through his recommendation, those persons about the King that he knew deserving, or that might have need of his assistance; so that by this generous and obliging humour, he had contracted in the Court a great number of Friends, who would for his interest have willingly exposed their lives. On the other side, the glory of his Actions, as well those he had performed in our defence, as those which had formerly acquir'd him such a reputation amongst the Gauls, having made the impression which they ought, upon the minds of our people, they not only looked on him as their valiant Defender and Deliverer, but as on a miraculous person, infinitely advanced beyond all others, so that he was received where ever he passed, with such acclamations and marks of honour as might amply satisfy the most ambitious Spirit, and the greatest admirer of glory in the world. Although he received nothing from the King, (I mean nothing but praises and marks of esteem and affection, such as I told you) his equipage was not less beautiful, nor his expences less magnificent, than the two Princes, for he received from his Country (whose liberty by many fair victories he had purchased at the price of his blood) much more than he desired, and more than was necessary to make him surpass the magnificence of others, and to testify his liberal inclinations by presents of greater price, which he made upon all occasions which presented themselves, with the best grace in the world: In fine, by all that appeared of his fortune, he had reason to rest satisfied, yet might we easily perceive a discontented mind in his countenance; and that in daily contemning and refusing what might satisfy the ambition of others, he aspired to somewhat more than was presented to him, and languish'd with a desire he durst not manifest. He saw me as often as he could, and when he could, he absented himself from company as much as good manners would allow of. Some times would he ride abroad to vent his griefs in the Country Air, and other whiles shut himself up in his Closet, as there either to read or write, which was easily believed, the world knowing his inclination to study, and how much he had thereby profited; and he would often retire himself into the Gardens of the Palace, which are the most pleasant in Germany, for the number and beauty of their Walks, and their situation, near the Banks of the Elbe, which delightfully watered it.

As his person was perfectly well compos'd, and that he had nothing, neither in his mind nor body, that was any way displeasing, he was not only well received amongst the men, but he had more than one Lady in our Court that cast favourable eyes upon him, and none by whom he was not well received; but although he rendred them all that they could hope from the civility of a valiant Knight, well born, and well educated, and that none had reason to complain of him; there was not one to whom he testified any particular affection, and fewer, whose company he courted when he could handsomely avoid it. But when he was engaged, and chiefly at Balls, or other meetings of Divertisement, he eclipsed the glory of the Princes in all they undertook; and as he surpassed them as much in address, and good grace in dancing, and all other exercises of the body, as in a good deportment, and all sorts of becoming qualities; and that he had no kindness for them, which obliged him to dissemble his advantages to please them; so when he made them known, he so much outshone them, that as soon as he appeared, they were scarcely looked on. They were both much enraged and exasperated against him, and had willingly express'd their resentment, but that they knew what person they had to do with, and saw what an esteem and consideration the King had for him. He was one night in my Chamber with them, together with many Courtiers of both Sexes, into which both Rambaud and Genfalaric press'd out of emulation to come near me, and endeavour'd by all their words and actions to testify what they had in their minds, Ambiomer had taken a place behind me, where he stood in a study, without meddling in our discourse; and because in turning my self divers times that way, I had perceived him in that condition, and that one time particularly I heard him fetch a deep sigh, and saw upon his countenance characters of an inward disturbance, I rais'd my head towards him, and speaking very low, because I would not be heard of any but himself: I pray, said I to him, inform me what it is that employs your thoughts, and what moves you to sigh and rave as you do. Ambiomer appeared somewhat surpris'd at my question, but very readily recovering himself, and making a quick reply:

You ask me, said he, a nice question, and I know not, Madam, whether I can answer to all as you command me. You will do it, if you desire to oblige me, said I, for it is a long time since I have desired any thing so earnestly. After this command, replied Ambiomere, I cannot dispense with my self, and I shall tell you, Madam, I begin to day to do that I never did in all my life, to complain of fortune, that she did not cause me to be born a Prince. You have so many other advantages, (said I to him, seeing that none listened unto us) that you may easily comfort your self for that defect, for you well know, that few persons in the world have so much esteem and glory in the world as your self. I confess, replied Ambiomere, that there are Princes of so small a merit, that all things considered, I never wish'd till now to resemble them, but because they have the advantages of speaking, when others must be modestly silent, and of expressing all that lies upon their hearts, when others are obliged to dissemble it; I confess that I envy their condition. Although these words might have much informed me, I then made no reflection on them, but answering Ambiomere according to the real esteem I had for him: And what can you have to dissemble, said I to him, in a place where you have all acquir'd by your merit, and by your services, and where you can desire nothing, but what you may be assured of obtaining. I desire then, said he, if you will permit me to be for this day silent, if you please to do me the favour, not to oblige me to a farther discovery. These words followed by some sighs, and the passionate behaviour which attended them, ought perhaps to have made me have known what he concealed from me, as much as the greatest demonstrations could have done, and really I cherish'd a kind of suspicion in my thoughts, but it was not sufficiently strong to convince them, yet it hindred me from pressing him any farther. At divers other times he departed himself after the same rate, and might have made me perhaps sufficiently know the love he had for me, if I had been desirous of that knowledge; but as I both avoided and feared it, I did not dive into those things which might prove the cause of my discontent, irritating me against a person to whom I owed so much, and for whom I had so great an esteem.

In the mean time, both what he suffered, and the violence he imposed upon himself to conceal the cause of his sufferings, wrought their effect as well upon his Body, as on his mind, and you might perceive his countenance to wax paler, and his health to impair. The King who was therewith excessively afflicted, demanded of him every day the cause, the like did Amalaric; but neither could learn it from his mouth, though both had possibly very great suspicion thereof: and whilst they perplex'd themselves, and that all the Court interested themselves in their griefs, through the high consideration they had of Ambiomere. Genselaric and Rambaud who hated him, and viewed all his Actions with envy, rejoiced in their Souls, although their fear to displease the King, hindred them from testifying it publickly; and taking their time whilst his indisposition, and the weakness it caused, disabled him from being a party in their Divertisements, in which he was always accustomed to eclipse them; they made many in which they did shew (in emulation of each other) much Magnificence and Address. Ambiomere beheld them with much discontent, though he found some comfort in the little effect they wrought in my soul to their advantage. But one day he had much ado to support their arrogance, in a kind of Tournament that they made in the great Piazza before the Palace, as it is now much in use in the world. They had obliged all Knights of the greatest ability to be at the match; and Amalaric would likewise have made one, but they had entreated him to dispense with it, and to permit them for that day an honour which they would not dispute against him. They were entred upon the place mounted upon very stately Horses, and clad in very glorious and costly Armour, with devices suitable to their design, and the name of Amalazontha deciphered in their Impress: They had broken many Lances upon each other without any considerable advantage, and in fine, by a mutual consent, they forbore to tilt at each other, and had placed themselves in the lists, with design to maintain it that day against all the Knights of the Court; and really as they had Address, Force and Valour, they had acquir'd honour by many fair Courses, for no Knight had presented himself which they had not born from his Horse. I was at the window of the Palace, with the principal Ladies of the Court; and that day also Ambiomere, who bore in his countenance the characters of his languishment, had taken his place behind me, which he took as often as he could, for the advantage it always gave him to speak sometimes in my ear, without being heard of the company. As he saw all that pass'd in the place, and heard the peoples acclamations for the fine courses of the two Princes, he from time to time enquired softly of me my judgment concerning them, and when in fine he saw the two Princes had almost beaten down all the Turinquean Knights, and that swelled with the pride of their success, they rode about the place with an insupportable arrogance; and that at the beginning beginning of each course they turned themselves towards the Window where I was, and by bowing down of their heads implor'd my favours: putting his Lips to my Ear, as he had already divers times done; Is it not true Madam, said he, that you divertise your self admirably well, and that you look with much joy upon the fine courses of these two Princes that adore you, and merely for your love perform them. I have so much joy (whispered I softly to him) that I could heartily wish to see their pride well humbled: If you so much desire it, said he unto me, it may possibly happen: for I know a person that would happily pay you this piece of service, if he thought it might be acceptable. I doubt not, replied I, but you might have well done it your self, had you been in a better condition: but as you are you have done well in abstaining from so violent an exercise. I confess, said he sighing, that I am in a bad condition, and in a worse than you imagine, but it ought not to hinder me from seeking all occasions to please you. I replied not to these words, by reason the King called to me at the same time, to make me take notice of what then past in the Piazza. But that being over, turning my self on his side to speak to him, I perceived he was not there, and having enquired after him of those persons that were near him, they told me that he found himself indispos'd, and was therefore retired. I immediately doubted the cause, but believing that I should pleasure him by keeping it secret; I discovered it to none: and continued in the mean time gazing upon what passed in the Piazza, expecting what was to succeed upon Ambiomer's departure. The attendance was not so long as I expected, for as he lodged in the Palace and required but little time to go to his Apartment to Arm himself: and that from thence he had a back pair of Stairs, by which he might descend without being perceived. I spied him much sooner than I expected, enter the Piazza, mounted upon one of the gallantest Horses in the world, and clad in Armour neither less beautiful nor less rich than those of Rambaud and Genselaric. The Mejestick deportment he had on horseback, rendred him remarkable to all, though (as I believe) he was known to none, but through a jealousy I had of his design, I easily discovered him: And though I expected from his valour some change in the two Princes fortunes, I feared that by the feebleness which then appeared in him, his strength was too much impair'd to produce those brave effects which we might have expected from him in a better condition. The two Princes gazed on him very earnestly, as well for the beauty of his stature, as the richness of his Armour, but as they believed that fortune which had been all day so favourable to them, would not at night forsake them. They had not the least suspicion it was Ambiomer, and they saw Amalaric at one of the Windows, so that they resolv'd to stand him in the same manner as they had stood the others: and Rambaud being advanc'd to run the first, with hopes to spare his Companion the labour, placed himself over against him as he had done in the former courses: and covering himself with his Shield, parted at the accustomed signal. The Course was gallant but the success was not fortunate to the opponent, for Ambiomer thrust him with such a force, that he raised him from his Saddle, so that he tumbled over the Crouper of his Horse. This fall raised a great shout through all the multitude, and so much the more because Ambiomer performed his Carrier, without being in the least moved in his saddle, where he sat like a Rock. And the King and Amalaric looking on each other, and at the same time casting their eyes upon me, seem'd to demand, who this Knight should be that had so well abated the Pride of the Prince of the Frisons: But whilst he was rising by the assistance of his Squires, so bruised that he could scarcely keep himself upon his legs, Genselaric had taken his place, but he took it with less confidence than he had before the fall of his companion: and arming himself with a strong Lance he ran against Ambiomer, but his fortune was nothing more favourable than his Companion's, for without having stirred his Enemy, he and his Steed were both overthrown, so that his horse rowled over and over divers times with him upon the Sand. After these two brave strokes, the Conquerour not seeking any glory from the other Knights, went presently out of the lists, and spurring his Horse he stole himself by his swiftness from our sight, and from the pursuit of those who had a design to know him; and by a Compass he fetch'd coming to a back gate of the Palace, he pass'd without being known amidst the huddle of Knights which were that day armed, and returned with an admirable diligence to his Apartment.

This event so little conformable to the two Princes expectations, was that night the whole discourse of the Court: but they did not visit me as they were wont, either through a resentment of the displeasure they had received, or through the incommodity their falls might make them feel; they spent that night between themselves without being seen to any. All the Court was in my Apartment with the King and Amalaric, and Ambiomer also came thither. The King, the Prince and divers others had great suspicion of him, as well because they had observed his stature, which was no ways common to other persons, as for that they believed few persons able to perform what he had done: But by reason he was seen almost all that day at the window, and that they could not think him prepared for that action, they knew not what judgment they ought to make. The King and the Prince pressed him sufficiently to know the truth, and he defended himself so well, as to take away a part of the suspicion they had contracted. But as for my self, when I spoke to him at the end of my Chamber where I drew him, that we might not be over heard, Madam, said he, whosoever you can suspect to have humbled the pride of Genselaric and Rambaud, I can assure you he only did it to please you: and he will be very unfortunate if he have not succeeded in his design. He is certainly therein very successful, replied I to him, or rather, Ambiomer, you have been so, for to me you cannot make it a secret. If this action hath displeas'd you, said he, I may well conceal it, but if it were not displeasing unto you, I will confess that it gave me some contentment. You have then no friendship, replied I smilingly, to those persons that love me. If they are unfortunate (replied he blushing) or if they suffer through respect their misfortunes without speaking, they may create a pity in me: But if fortunate, and that their good fortune render them insolent, it would be difficult for me to love them. I assure you Ambiomer (said I to him) you may either love or pity these, for they have no fortune in their love, which may merit your dislike. They have the advantage, replied he, of discovering what they feel unto you, and to tell you daily they dye for love of you: and this happiness is not so slight, but it may make them envied by those that are less happy. These words which he pronounced with a mortal languishment, made me suspect somewhat, and therefore being willing to turn the discourse, If that happiness, said I, had made them proud, I am confident that the accident which this day befel them, hath sufficiently humbled them: and that for some time they will neither return to the Lists, nor be so confident as to brag much. You see I was not ill advised, to take the way I did to bring down their pride, for I could not believe that victory which had accompanied you in all your Combats, would this day abandon you. You will make me proud of my office (said he with a forced smile) but although it were true that I had some fortune in the war, I know too well that in all things else, I am the most unfortunate of Men. He spoke in this manner, and was about perhaps to have discover'd himself farther, when Amalaric approached us: and his suspicion being augmented by the secret discourse we held together; he pressed me in such sort before Ambiomer to make me confess what I knew, that at last my countenance betrayed me, and Amalaric having promised to keep counsel, I confessed the truth, and Ambiomer consented to it not caring to conceal it, but through Modesty and no other consideration. Nor did Amalaric keep his promise not judging it necessary, and incontinently after having informed the King, who kept the secret no more than he, although he knew that both the Princes could not but be much discontented at it: so that in a short time it was known to the Company and consequently by all the Court. As Ambiomer was the person they adored, both for the good he had done us and for his own virtue, the whole Kingdom received this news with an excessive joy, and the Knights which had been born down by Rambaud and Genselaric, were so satisfied to understand that it was he that had reveng'd their quarrel, that they could not abstain from manifesting their thanks in publick to him. The two Princes knew it that same night, and though the misfortune which had befall'n them, was no new thing among Knights that would venture, and that for the renown of Ambiomer, they had no great reason to afflict themselves, but rather to be glad that they were not vanquish'd by any person of less reputation; yet the envy which they bore him obstructed this consolation: and the grudge they had against him in such sort augmented their resentment, that if they had not feared to exasperate the King, and happily to encounter so valiant an Enemy; they had made it appear by some marks of violence. They could not nevertheless so well dissemble it, but the next morning in the King's presence, it appeared in their Faces to the view of Ambiomer; although they used a great violence upon themselves to hinder it, and that they endeavour'd to support cheerfully that little disgrace: and they believed themselves obliged to speak the first thereof, to take away the shame which appeared in their looks. Genselaric addressing himself the first to Ambiomer before the King, As you had formerly been a Victor over me, said he, you might have rested satisfied with that honour, without seeking another less important conquest, in which as well as in the former, fortune perhaps had her share. I confess, replied Ambiomer, that she hath her part in all things, and those to whom she never gave victory, are possibly indebted to her for advantages they enjoy, not by virtue of their own merits. The advantage of Birth, proudly added Rambaud, are neither the children of merit nor fortune: And it is not happily contemptible, since so valiant a person as your self doth still owe it a kind of respect. My descent is not Royal, answered Ambiomer, though it be sufficiently noble not to shame me: and I here render you without regret the respect I can owe to yours. But (smartly continued he) when I have my Arms in my hand I respect few persons: and I should cherish a better opinion of you in that condition, if you could force me to respect you. Rambaud was going to reply, and doubtlessly this his discourse had not ended but in some disorder, had it been maintained in any other place than before the King, who hindred the fatal consequence, and very sharply assured Rambaud that his proceedings were no ways pleasing to him, and that from a person such as Ambiomer, few Princes could exact a respect which he would not willingly tender. He nevertheless appeas'd all things so well, that through the respect they bore him they proceeded no farther. And whatever resentments the two Princes had against Ambiomer, they made no show of it. It likewise appeared to have been smother'd for some days after, till their hopes were re-animated by the Arrival of their Father's Ambassadors, who at the same time came to our Court to demand me of the King, with all those Ceremonies that are used upon such occasions. It was for my happiness that they almost arriv'd the same day, that for the reason which I have told you in this juncture of time, the King might find a way to suspend his resolution; which after succeeded according to my desires: for although he gave to the Ambassadors favourable audience, and assured them that their Masters intentions did him a great honour; he gave them nevertheless equally to understand, that the present state of his affairs would not permit him to resolve so readily, which of the two Princes he ought to prefer, not being willing (if it were possible) either to irritate the one or the other: and thinking it better to wait some more convenient time or change that might happen to give him a greater liberty. And when that Rambaud (discouraging upon this subject) told him that he ought to put some difference between an Ally, and a friend that entred into his Dominions to succour him, and a cruel Enemy who came thither to ruine him, and had shed whole Rivers of his Peoples blood. The King told him that this same Enemy who had brought him so near his ruine, might again reduce him to the same condition, if he should force him to renew the War, or if he did not put himself in a better posture to sustain it, than he conceiv'd himself at present to be in. And when Genfalaric represented the interest he had to conserve the Alliance, which he had made with such a Neighbour as the King of the Saxons, to the prejudice of a Prince, whose Territories were so distant from his, who could neither do him injury nor assist him. The King answered him that he could not (without exposing himself to the reproach of the World) make an Enemy of a King who was his Friend and Ally, and who had sent his Forces and his Son to his relief, and that it was necessary before he resolv'd to make use of such expedients as the present time did not afford.

In this manner he delayed them, without either granting or refusing what they demanded, and expected in effect both time and occasion to take his resolution. Ambiomer, whose counsel he took in all things, and whom he respected for his virtue as a miracle, confirmed him in this design, and dayly represented to him, that he ought not to be precipitate in an affair of this importance, upon which, both the repose of his life, and that of his people might have dependance: but by the pressing importunity of the two Princes the trouble of his mind increased, and so much the more, by reason he believed, that the fear of the Saxons power was more prevalent upon the King's Spirit, than the memory of the obligation he had to the Frison; and that he would in fine permit himself to be sway'd on that side, though his inclination less favoured the Saxon than the other, and that this fear might determine his irresolution, in which he found all his safety. I tell it you because he made me understand it himself, and his confidence being augmented by the disturbance of his thoughts, it became at last strong enough to make him break that silence, which till then he had impos'd on his affections. He one day accompanied me to walk in one of the Gardens of our Palace, and as really there was no company there that was so acceptable to me as his, I was content to give him my hand in walking, to entertain my self more particularly with him, than with other persons that wearied me; for this reason we walked at some distance from the rest of the company, which was then only compos'd of persons which durst not interrupt us; and we were walking in the large walks upon the Bank of the River Elbe, when he discovered the suspicion he had, that the King's fear of the Arms of the Saxons, would at last perswade him to declare for Genfalaric, and that the consideration he had for the Frison, was not sufficiently prevalent to keep him stedfast in his irresolution; and having made me this discovery with all the marks of a terrible disquiet, Shall I be so unfortunate, added he very sadly, to see you the prey of a person, who shall have gained by Iron and Blood, that which the services of a thousand Princes equal to himself could never merit? And did I unfortunately give him his life in the Battel, to make him triumph over another much better than his, though much less happy? Ah! Wherefore am I not permitted to renew the war with him upon this quarrel? Then should he see, whether the possession of Amalazontha ought to be the prey of a Barbarian. These words which he uttered with a behaviour the most passionate in the world, revived some suspicions in my Soul, which I had endeavour'd to smother; yet nevertheless, striving once more to dispel them, I hope, said I to him, that you will never see this misfortune which your friendship makes you fear will befall me; for I have too much confidence in the bounty the King hath testified to me, and hath particularly promis'd me in this very affair, to believe he would render me so miserably unfortunate, as to marry me either to Genscleric or Rambaud. But Madam, replyed Ambiomer, if the King had commanded you to espouse one of the two, you would not disobey him. No certainly, made I answer, for were they much more odious than either of them are to me, I would without murmuring espouse either, if the King had so ordained it. Ab Madam, (replyed Ambiomer, looking upon me very stedfastly) permit me to tell you, that neither Rambaud, nor Genscleric are in my opinion odious to you, for if they were, you would not so easily resolve to embrace your misfortune. I have no hatred for them, said I to him, that obliges me to wish them ill, but I have a sufficient aversion to their persons, to believe that I cannot be but very unfortunate with either. But Madam, added he, is it possible, the love they have for you can no ways change your inclinations, and that you can so firmly preserve them against Princes that adore you. I believe, said I smilingly, that yours have changed within this minute, since that after you have appeared so animated against them, you appear so disposed to speak in their favour. I should acquit my self ill, replyed Ambiomer, had I undertaken it; for they could not find in the whole world a person so unfit as my self, to do them such a kindness. But it is very difficult for me to believe, that by the dayly proofs of their love, they will not at length touch your heart; and that a faithful perseverance should not chase from your spirit, the dislike you have of their persons. You believe it, said I, without reason, for it hath been sufficiently experimented, that if the person cannot touch us, the greatest proofs of love are fruitless to obtain an affection. Alas, (said he, casting his eyes suddenly to the earth) and what could the unfortunate Ambiomer then hope, if with so much disadvantage he had the boldness to love you. These words (though I ought perhaps to have expected them from those that had preceded, and a thousand other marks of Ambiomer's affection) astonish'd me so far, as to take from me the liberty of a sudden reply; but at length, to hinder him from explaining himself farther: Ambiomer is too wise, said I, to entertain such unreasonable thoughts, and had he entertained them, is too prudent to declare them to me. Ab Madam, said he very readily, do not seek wisdom with love, and believe, if you please, that there is no prudence which can dissuade me from telling you, that I die for you. As Ambiomer was wholly abandoned to his Passion in speaking these words unto me, so had I almost given my self a prey to anger in listening to them: and I was so distast'd to hear them from the lips of a Knight, born without other advantages than those he achieved by his Sword, who believing that I ought not to endure them from any less than a King, and hardly from such; that by his injury he almost blotted from my mind, the memory of all that I owed to the great services he had rendered us, and all the esteem that I had for his Merit. In effect he appeared quite altered to me in a moment, and considering him much less as a Person that had done so much for us, than as a person that had cruelly offended me, I ponder'd in my mind upon many different resolutions which my resentments insus'd into it: and in time with much difficulty moderating my passion; "I could not have believed, said I, that the esteem and acknowledgments I gave to your Merits and Services, could have made you forfeit the respect that you owe to me. "In the person of one to whom we were less oblig'd, I knew how to punish this boldness "as it deserv'd: and in the mean time I prohibit you from ever more declaring it, if you desire not that I should hate you, as much as ever I esteem'd you. As I did not cast my eyes upon Ambiomer's face in speaking these words, I could not observe the effect they produc'd: But a while after I judg'd it by his words; for breaking that silence which for some time he observ'd; "I confess Madam, said he, that my rashness is worthy of punishment, but it "was not voluntary: for after I had long suffered, I spoke, compelled by a violence which "acknowledgeth no Empire. I shall without the least murmure obey what you have ordain- "ed me, or else dye if it be not possible to obey you." I would not, replyed I, that you should "dye, but I would have you either obey me or never more see me. Concluding these words, to hinder his reply I stay'd for the Company that were walking behind us, and I am confident if they had observ'd our faces, they might have perceiv'd marks of sufficient trouble, to make them judge the discourse we had held together, was no ordinary conversation.

In truth Madam (said the Princess Albilinda to Amalazontha interrupting her) your proceedings were very rigorous, towards such a person as you have represented him unto us, and to whom you owed so much: and in my opinion the offence he committed, was no way sufficient to make you so readily forget what you owed to his great services. It was irksome enough to such a Princess as Amalazontha, (said the Queen of the Cimbrians answering to the Princess of Suevia) to hear a declaration of love from the mouth of a person to much

“her inferiour: But I agree with you Sister, that this offence ought to have been supported “with more mildness from such a Person as Ambiomer, than from another to whom she had “less obligation, and that she might without treating him with too much rigour, have let “him understand she did not approve the fault he had committed, that he might not have “the confidence to continue it.” Listen but to the end of my discourse, said the Queen of the the Turingiens, and you may happily find therein greater cause either to bewail or ac-

The End of the Third Book of the Fifth Part.

PHARAMOND.

BOOK IV.

THE distaste which I had received at Ambiomer's boldness, bred in me for some days such a perplexity, which it was very difficult for me to dissemble and it was not without grief that I saw my self obliged to change my manner of converse with a person to whom we had so great obligations, whose person I infinitely esteem'd, and whose company was very pleasing to me.
 For in fine, my fair Princesses, you ought to believe that I either wanted due acknowledgments for such great Services, or that I was blind to his great Merits: I knew the one and forgot not the other, and both together fix'd in my thoughts so good an opinion of him, as he might assuredly have therewith rested contented, had he not so passionately loved me, I could not in effect remember what he had done for us, without having so great a grudge against him, as only freed me from being accounted altogether in-grateful: nor could I cast my eyes on his person, or on the glory of his Actions, without having for him an esteem and a consideration proportion'd to his merit. But as for love, as I believed that I ought not to suffer it, but from a person that might be my Husband; and that I would not espouse a person, who notwithstanding all the glory that environed him, was but a bare Knight, and a man that from my Royal dignity, would abase me to the condition of a private person: so the knowledge of his love touched me with a more sensible displeasure than I ever experimented in the whole Course of my life, and it was so much the greater, in regard of the high esteem, which with a great deal of reason I had for him. I looked upon the default of his birth as a misfortune to my self, since it opposed that happiness which I might really have enjoyed in the possession of a person so great in all besides; so that both for his and my own sake I daily complain'd on fortune: and seeing him some time with the Princes, I said often to my self, “Alas! wherefore with so great a merit “had not Ambiomer the Birth of Rambaud or Genselaric, and when I saw Rambaud or Gense- laric, and was not importun'd by them, “Wherefore, said I likewise, were not the merits “of Ambiomer joynd to such Royal descent.

In the mean time, he conversed with me as I had enjoynd him, and if his eyes and gestures did more publish the secret sentiments of his heart than I could have desired, his tongue at least observed that silence which I had impos'd upon him; and when chance made us encounter alone, in places where no body could hear our discourse, I call it chance because I thunn'd those occasions, and that he did not seek them for fear of displeasing me, he only acted by his looks what his tongue durst not perform, not permitting one word to escape his lips which might awaken my anger, or give me cause to accuse him of the least breach of that command I had imposed upon him: neither did he speak to me any more of Rambaud or Genfelaric, for he entertained me with discourses where the lover of Amalazontha should have no interest. If on his part he imposed a constraint on himself, I did no less on mine, that I might converse with him before the world, with the same freedom I had formerly done; and this constraint was neither so easie to the one, nor the other, but that divers persons took notice thereof, and Amalaric in particular, who through a particular friendship he had for me, interressing himself in all that concern'd me, observed divers times that Ambiomer did no more accost me, and spoke to me always with great appearances of fear; and that what endeavours soever I used, I could not receive him as I had formerly done. As soon as he had any suspicion of the truth, he tormented me to know it, and press'd me in fine so far, that through the confidence I had always in him, I could not abstain from imparting the secret, and related to him word by word what had happened between me and Ambiomer: Amalaric was not unmindful of the great obligations he had to him, and had that esteem for his great qualities which no body could deny him; but he entred into my sentiment, and like me was exasperated at Ambiomer's boldness. I confess, (said he, speaking of him) that if a Princely Birth were not wanting, he had sufficient merit to aspire to all things, and that what he had done for us, was enough considerable to deserve great recompences; but he might find them in those offers the King dayly makes him, if he had a reasonable ambition, for it is not at the expence of Amalazontha we ought to recompence his merit; though others had such intentions, Sister, I could not suffer it, for you shall espouse none with my consent, beneath a King. He promised me nevertheless, to manifest nothing hercof to Ambiomer, and that he would always feign an ignorance of his affections; and in effect he behaved himself to Ambiomer conformable to his promise, and changed nothing in appearance of his former manner of conversing with him, not being unwilling to appear ungrateful, nor disoblige a person, of whose valour we might have sufficient use: but he discovered the secret to the King, and related to him word by word what I had told him. The King, who already doubted it as much as he, was much afflicted, but by a motive different from his, and he resentend much more the trouble, which this passion wrought upon the Soul of Ambiomer, than the offence he had committed. "How unfortunate am I? (said he to Amalaric) and how will it afflict me, if I may not "in this occasion manifest to Ambiomer the affection my heart bears him. I could wish as "well as you that Amalazontha should espouse none but a King; but Ambiomer outva- "lues many Kings, and could I give him my Crown without depriving you of it, I would "raise him with all my heart to that Dignity, not to abase Amalazontha in giving "her to him. Look in the mean time, you behave your self towards him, as to a person "to whom you owe your Crown and Liberty; and pray to the Gods, you be not re- "duced to the necessity of offering him your Sister. He could not satisfie himself with speaking these words to Amalaric upon this subject; but he likewise spoke thereof to me, and testified so much of esteem for Ambiomer, so much displeasure that he could not do for him what he desired, and so much caution to preserve his amity, that it caused me to fear, that his inclinations were more favourable to him than I desired. "I am not angry, said "he to me, that you have a courage proportioned to your Birth, and that you affect not to "descend from the Rank whercin Heaven hath seated you; but I desire you should respect "virtue, and that you satisfie your self in not espousing Ambiomer, without looking on the "love he hath for you as an injury, or blemish to your Honour: I hope that time and his own "courage will free him from this passion; and in the interim, remember both what he "merits, and what we owe him, and rather listen to this remembrance, than to the coun- "sels of Amalaric, in whom with much grief I perceive ingratitude. He accompanied these words with divers others, which made me understand that he was tenderly touch'd with the merit of Ambiomer, and if he changed any thing in his manner of treating with him, it was in testifying much more of affection to him, than he had done formerly, in searching more occasions both to please, and oblige him, and by endeavouring as a sick person, to divert him by all those pleasures which he could procure him. In the mean time, either by the small care Amalaric had to conceal it, or by those marks Ambiomer gave against his will, his love came to the knowledge of divers persons, and in fine to the whole Court; yet had he the happiness that none spoke ill of his pretensions, but many on the contrary, would say, that a person like Ambiomer ought to be preferr'd before a King. For Rambaud and Genfelaric, they received the news thereof with an excessive rage, and had

shewn it much more than they did, had they been less sensible of the danger of offending such a person as Ambiomer. They had instantly recourse to me, and as the rumour which spread it self of Ambiomer's love, had augmented my resentment against him, they prospered in the design they had to exasperate me farther, although they met little success in the hope they might cherish of advancing their own affairs. They likewise spoke to me many times in a double sence before him, but without daring fully to explain themselves; and in fine, they gave him by divers actions to understand, that they were not ignorant of what he endeavoured to conceal from the whole world. When he found they had attain'd this knowledge, he soon grew careless of dissembling it, and believing it a kind of cowardise to constrain himself for such Rivals, he contented himself with obeying the command I had impos'd upon him not to speak to me of his love, and gave the interess'd persons occasion to believe all that the rumour of the Court, and their own jealousies might perswade them. They then found it very difficult to hold their peace, when fit occasions presented themselves of speaking, and principally before Amalaric, whom they knew less favourable to him than the King. And going with him one day to course a Stag, together with Ambiomer and divers others; this Beast, which at all other times is by nature timorous, is, as they say, furious and terrible when he comes to a Bay; and being near his end, and reduced to that extremity, which is accus'd to give him courage, he turned head against the Huntsmen, and having overthrow'd some with his Antler, and making, with his Head bended downwards (as they say it is his custom) at the first that stood in his way, he constrained Genselaric and Rambaud to give him passage, and to retire themselves in a sufficient disorder, Amalaric likewise avoided his fury by keeping at a distance, as they had done, only Ambiomer manfully fronted him, and kill'd him with two cuts of his Sword before their eyes. The three Princes abash'd to behold this action of Ambiomer, look'd upon his hardiness and good success with some shame to themselves: but Amalaric being less concern'd than the rest, and more careless of signalizing himself in his own Country than strangers, who would display all that might purchase them esteem, very readily recovered himself, and having prais'd the action of Ambiomer, as a person that bore him no envy. "We must confess, said he in course, that the bravest Atchievements are reserv'd for Ambiomer, and that he is not less hardy in the chase, than in the war. "I believe he is so in all, added Rambaud, for they say he is not less bold in love, than in the chase or war. "Perhaps they speak but the truth, (replyed Ambiomer very fiercely) and as a man cannot make me flee in the war, nor a Stag in the chase, I believe that a Rival cannot fright me in love. "The boldness in love doth not consist, said Genselaric to him, in not fearing a Rival, but in having too aspiring thoughts, as yours seems to be. And your Rival may be such, added Rambaud, that you may yield to him without disreputation, since it is not valour alone that decides the competitorship in such disputes. "Whosoever this Rival may be, replyed Ambiomer, he might find himself sufficiently embroiled, for I can hardly yield to Birth my self, if it be not accompanied with virtue. Rambaud was going to reply, and through the fiery dispositions which then possess'd their Spirits, they might perhaps have proceeded to an extremity, if Amalaric had not upon this occasion behaved himself as the King had done in the former, and obstructed by his care the sequel of their sharp dispute.

Since that time, the two Rival-Princes not doubting of the love of Ambiomer, and fearing that however inferiour to them in quality and birth, he might either through the King's inclination, or mine, prove happier than they, they turned upon him a part of that hatred they had for each other, and abstained from quarrelling as they were wont, that they might in some fashion joyn interest against their common enemy. But they had not long power to dissemble their hatred towards him; and although they were not ignorant of the influence he had upon the King's disposition, they could no longer constrain themselves to speak, and live with him as they were wont to do: Ambiomer made no difficulty to behave himself towards them after his usual manner, and was very glad to be no longer oblig'd to force his inclinations. The King by his prudence hindred this bad understanding from producing worse effects: but he could not hinder what happened a while after, which was of importance enough to have caused many disorders.

Neither Genselaric nor Rambaud lost any time in soliciting the King for the preferment which each of them hop'd for himself, and besides that which they themselves every day spake concerning it; they caus'd it to be urg'd by their Father's Ambassadors, that they might know his last resolt. But as the King had not as yet taken his resolution, or that he did not find himself in a condition to declare it, he deferred from day to day the answer they demanded, and payd them with those reasons I before related: and in this manner

he amused them so long, that in fine, Rambaud believed that his Rival was more happy than he, and that the King would forsake him, and put him off with delays, to give me to Genselaric as soon as he could rid himself of him; and Genselaric began not to doubt that the King's inclinations were more favourable to Rambaud than to him, and that he had an intention to espouse me to him, as soon as he had put his affairs in a condition not to fear a war with the Saxons; and even sometimes they believed that Ambiomer might be more happy than either, and that it was not impossible, but that the King had designed his Daughter for the price of his great services. Their suspicions were daily augmented by the King's proceedings, who, as they perceiv'd, had no disposition to declare himself; and they went in fine so far, that both the one and the other lost their hopes of obtaining me, by those ways they had attempted, and changed their thoughts to those their passions prompted them to. As their inclinations were very much alike, so they carried them both to the same resolution, and as they had a great number of men and Knights well qualified in their train, as well those that followed them, as those which came with their Father's Ambassadors, they fancied they might carry me away, and that with those men they had, they might conduct me even to those places, where, by the order they had taken, they expected to find a greater assistance.

They could not hope the execution of this enterprize whilst I remained at Lephane near the King my Father; but they had learn'd that I was to take the air for some few days, at a House five or six hours journey from thence; and they well knew, that through the small likelihood there was, that any should undertake to force away a King's Daughter from the heart of his Dominions, that I should only go attended with my own Domesticks, and should remain there without any fear of danger. This was it which doubtless gave birth to that enterprize, and they did not only agree in their design, but fate likewise decreed that they should both make use almost of the same means in the execution, for which they both appointed the same day, which was a day consecrated to Diana, upon which I was accustomed when I was at this House, to visit the Temple of that Deity, about four miles distance from thence. In all likelihood the safety and security the Daughter of a King might hope for in the midst of her Father's Dominions, and the peace which we then enjoyed might afford me this liberty, so that I made no difficulty in declaring my intention of visiting that place without the least circumspection. I departed in effect from Lephane, with a sufficient train of Ladies, but few men, besides those which were necessary for my service; and the Princes Genselaric, Rambaud and Amalaric stayd with the King, together with Ambiomer, and the whole Court. I shall not discourse to you the preparations which these Princes made in order to the execution of their design, nor the order they took in placing men on the way to defend them in case they should be pursued, nor in making those which were with them to depart the City without being perceiv'd, so that I shall only tell you, to abridge my discourse, whereof the most important passages still remain; that the day I had designed to visit the Temple of Diana being come, I mounted my Chariot with some Ladies of our Court, which had accompanied me to Birse (for that was the name of the Palace) followed by another, wherein were my Maids of Honour, and by some men on Horseback, rather for Majesty than defence; and in this equipage without the least fear of what afterwards happened, I had performed the greatest part of my journey, when that in arriving to a part of the Plain where our way lay between two woods equally distant from it, and about four or five hundred paces from each other, I perceived coming out of one of these Woods which lay of our right hand about a hundred Horsemen armed cap-a-pee, and at their head a person better armed and mounted than the rest, who advanced upon a Gallop towards my Chariot, and was followed by the rest upon a large Trot. The posture in which I saw them, and the countenance with which they approach'd me, gave me a sudden terrour, and caused me to divine a part of the truth. The women that were with me drowned in fear, cast up loud cries to Heaven; and from my Chariot which was on all sides open, I cast my eyes round about, to seek out that succour I then believed was necessary, when from a wood opposite to that on the right hand, I perceived another Troop of Knights in the same posture as the former, and little differing in number, with a Knight in the same garb as the former, at their head. The sight of this second Troop augmented my fear, fancying that both the one and the other must needs be Enemies; and I remained quite astonish'd, making my vows to Heaven, whilst the men of my Train were flying in disorder, and he that guided my Chariot being quite dismayed, had stopp'd it, when the two Squadrons (who had put themselves in marching from the time that they were discovered, in a posture of war) came within forty paces of each other, and their two Captains advancing themselves in the midst of that space towards each other with their Visiers up, I knew them for Genselaric and Rambaud. After this discovery I no longer doubted of my misfortune, and whilst I was venting sighs and Prayers to Heaven to implore its aid, the two Princes met, and Genselaric beginning first, For ought I see (said he to Rambaud) you are no happier than I, and that we meet here with the same intention. If I had not believed, replied Rambaud, that thy fortune had been better than mine, I had not this way sought the possession of Amalazontha; but since the attempt is begun, we must see the end of't, for I believe that neither of us will yield Amalazontha to his Rival. The Vanquish'd, replied the Saxon, shall yield her to his Vanquisher, or rather the dead to the survivor, for I do not believe any of us will abandon her but with his life. In finishing these words he laid hold of his Sword, and the Frison at the same time drawing his, they assaulted each other with an equal fury, and made terrible interchangeable passes; but the two Troops suddenly joyning gave them no time to pursue the particular Combat, and they were constrain'd to fight in a body with the rest, and to animate their men to victory both by voice and example: two men of each Troop had stopp'd the Horses of my Chariot, and guarded the Boots to hinder my getting out, whilst the rest were disputing for me at the price of their Blood, and that I saw my self miserably designed to be the prey of the Vanquisher. If I had afflicted Blood, I might have then received some satisfaction in seeing it run so plentifully from my common Enemies, and as I ought to desire equally the destruction of both parties; I might have wish'd a defeat to both, but the victory to neither; I am not so well versed in Combats to discourse to you effectually of this, nor to describe it at length; I shall only tell you, that the passion which obliged the two Princes to combat, having an equal influence on both parties, animated them in such sort, that in a short space you might perceive the earth covered with dead bodies, and all floating with blood. As the two Princes well knew there was no other way but the sole path of victory which lead to my conquest, so they pursued it with an unparallel'd fury, and I certainly saw them perform against each other, actions worthy of a better occasion: but when they were most furiously blooded, and engaged in the Combat, and that the number of their men were reduced to the moiety of what they were, by the same rode we held from Lephane, they perceived another Troop coming, and that it advanced with all speed towards them: some of my women having discovered it, advertised me at the same instant, and casting my eyes on that side, I discovered it as before I had done the former, and instantly believed they might arrive to our relief. Whilst I was flattering my self with this hope, Rambaud (who of the two Princes discovered it first) called to Genselaric with a loud cry, and by his voice and action having obliged him to hearken to him: Behold there, (said he to him, shewing him the Troop that was coming) behold, without doubt Ambiomere is coming to deprive us of Amalazontha: 'tis he, 'tis he himself who intends to take her from us both: let us joyntly turn our Arms upon this common Enemy, that he may not through our dissention triumph over us; and when we have vanquish'd him (if fortune please to give us the victory) we will finish our dispute. Genselaric approved his purpose, and having given him to understand so much by a motion of his hand, and the command he gave his men. The remainder of both parties reduced themselves in an instant into one Squadron, and joyning themselves with as much union, as if they had never drawn each others blood, they ranged themselves behind their Captains, who placed themselves at their head, expected their Enemies with a brave resolution, and with a resolution so much the greater, by reason they perceived when the distance permitted it, that they were not much weaker in number than they, and that they might apparently hope the victory. Rambaud was no ways deceiv'd when he judg'd it was Ambiomere that the Gods had sent to our relief, for it was really he himself, who upon the absence of the Princes and their Trains, which both disappeared at the same time, having suspected the design, declared his jealousy to the King; and mounting his Horse at the same instant, with those men he found ready to follow him, without expecting greater force, put himself upon the rode towards Birse with fifty or sixty Horse; before he overtook us he met some of my men, who by informing him of all that had pass'd, had animated him with a rage, which joyned to his great courage, made him contemn the number of his Enemies, and hope a victory over them. He was weaker almost by one half than they, but besides that, his presence more fortified his party than their number could have done, a part of the Enemy were either wounded, or wearied in the former Combat, and those that followed him were men of another courage, and higher quality than those they were going to encounter: neither did he stand to consider one minute, but thundering upon them with a loud cry, he shook in such sort the resolutions of the two Princes, that neither the one nor the other opposed themselves to his encounter. They did wisely to avoid him, for he that endured it felt the power of his Lance, which piercing through and through, appeared all bloody behind his his shoulders: immediately after he drew his sword, and thrusting himself in the midst of his enemies, with a fury which nothing could equalize; he destroyed as many lives as he had given blows with his sword. His great example animating his men, made them to fight with an admirable valour: for Genselaric and Rambaud quickly discern'd that the advantage of their number, gave them no assurance of the victory.

They laboured nevertheless on their sides with a great deal of courage to obtain it, but valiant as they were, they did not seek to encounter Ambiomer, nor were they displeas'd at the affections of their Men, who plac'd themselves before them to defend their lives from so eminent a peril. Oh how many brave Actions did I see performed in this occasion, by that valiant Person, which merit a recital which I must confess my self incapable to make you; and how often did I complain to heaven, for giving Birth to such a man as he in a Rank so unequal to mine. I really bemoan'd it as a misfortune as great for my self as him, and amongst the prayers which I then made to the Gods, the consideration of my interest had not perhaps a greater part than that of his safety. In fine by endeavours prodigious, which would not easily find belief could I relate them, he constrain'd victory to turn to his Party, but not without buying her with the greater part of his men, and a large share of his blood. He had lost much already by some wounds he had received, which the ardor of the Combat perhaps hindred him from feeling: when perceiving the trouble and disorder amongst his Enemies; amidst the bravest he forc'd his passage to Genselaric: and having got to him with a menacing cry, he charg'd him so terribly that he made him in a few moments see death before his eyes. Genselaric receiv'd him with a great deal of courage, and to the utmost of his strength, contend'd for victory: But it was much inferiour to Ambiomer, for he saw his blood distil upon his Armour from several wounds, and only hop'd his safety by some desperate blow: when that Rambaud, who would have seen him perish with joy at another time (but in this had turn'd all his hatred upon Ambiomer, whom he believ'd the happier) arriv'd to his succour, and passing behind Ambiomer, thrust his sword in his Flank: which through a default of Armour in that place, pass'd into his Body. Ambiomer felt the cruel wound, and turning towards him that gave it whom he knew at the same instant; Base Coward, said he to him, thou hast kill'd me but thou shalt dye for it: and in uttering these words, he forsook Genselaric, and made at Rambaud with so terrible a blow, that the Frison as valiant as he was, felt a mortal Ague which congeal'd his courage, and not having the boldness to meet him, retir'd affrighted amongst his men. when that the furious Ambiomer making his way with his sword against all those Obstacles which oppos'd them; forc'd his passage to him, or rather came thundering upon him like the Royal Eagle on his astonisht Prey, and thrusting his sword through his Viscer, that it pass'd to the other side of his Helmet, he thereby threw him breathless bathed in a River of blood under the Horses heels. After this revengeful stroke, he turn'd himself to Genselaric, and with a menacing countenance, pronounc'd to him a destiny parallel to Rambaud's: But the Saxon affrighted by the death of his Companion, and seeing his life at the point of the victorious sword; lost courage and was not ashamed to seek his safety in his flight. Ambiomer (who felt himself dying by the great wound he had receiv'd) and whom the desire of revenging his death had inflam'd with an extraordinary rage, follow'd him a while with much heat: But his strength did not second his anger, for extinguishing it self with his blood which ran in great streams to the earth, he began to totter on his Horse, and few moments after fell from his Saddle. Those that remain'd of his men, having no more Enemies to combat, for that the death of Rambaud and the flight of Genselaric had quite dissipat'd them; ran to him, wounded with fear and half dead with grief: and (casting themselves on the earth) made a circle about him, and endeavour'd to succour him by stopping the stream of his blood, which was all that their affections could inspire them.

I had seen from my Chariot the fall of Ambiomer, and I saw it with all the resentments that a high esteem and a just acknowledg'ment could give me: and being no longer held by those Enemies which had before deprived me of the liberty of going forth of my Chariot. I quitted it with a grief that did no ways permit me to resent the joy of that relief I had receiv'd, and running with all my force, together with those persons that were near me, to the place where our most valiant defender was extended in a stream of his own blood: I caus'd the croud to give place that was about him, and present'd my self to him, when he had scarce left in him any remainder of sense or knowledge: Nevertheless he had some for me, and seeing me near him; in a condition that might make him judge, that my soul was wounded with a real sorrow; he seem'd touch'd with a kind of joy, which for some moments retain'd his remaining forces, for finding enough to speak to me with a more lively posture, than his weakness (in all appearance) could permit him; Madam, said he to me,

You have prohibited me from living to adore you, but not from dying for your service, and without disobeying your commands, I have the happiness once more to tell you I dye for you. I hope you will not receive these last words for so great an injury as the former which I spoke to you, and that if my boldness hath merited your anger, you will give me a pardon at my death, which I willingly suffer for you. He would have spoken more if I had not opposed it, through the knowledge I had of the endeavours he used to speak that, and looking on him with eyes in which he might read that I was not insensible of his misfortune; For the offence you committed, said I to him, I did not require the reparation you have given me, for my anger was sufficiently appeased by the obedience you have testified: And I desire farther of you, if I have any power over your inclinations, and conjure you to live, by all the desires you have to please or obey me. If it were possible I would observe your orders (replied he with a faint voice) but inexorable death will take no notice of them, and I am happily more obliged to him than to your pity, which only commands me to live to render me miserable. These last words came from him with much difficulty, and some moments after his face was entirely clothed with a mortal paleness, and his eyes closing themselves, he remained in a Trance within the Arms of those that were labouring to stop his blood. I know not Sisters, what judgment you will make of the sentiments I had then for Ambiomer, but you may believe the truth, in believing that a person who had the most of affection for him, could not have been touched at that time with a more real sorrow than my soul felt: And although I had nothing of love for Ambiomer, I had so large a knowledge of his great merit, and in my heart such a resentment of his great services, and particularly for this last, which at the price of his life he had rendred me; that it was difficult for me to see him in that condition he appeared to my eyes, without suffering all that sorrow, which affliction in her highest cruelty can make us endure. I gave leave to the standers-by to judge as much by tears, which I did not so much as restrain from shedding themselves upon so just an occasion. Whilst a part of those that were employed in the helping of Ambiomer, were labouring to make him a Bier of some branches they had cut with their Swords, to carry him more easily to Birse, than could be done in the Chariot; the others had almost finished the binding up his wounds, and particularly that he had received from Rambaud, which had pierced him almost through; for the others were not very dangerous. In fine, both parties having finished their work, they put him upon the Bier, and every one striving with an unparallel'd affection to carry him, they raised him softly from the earth, and so marched with him a slow pace towards Birse, after they had dispatched some men that were best mounted to Lephane, to fetch the King's Chirurgions, and such others as were best experimented in the preservation of a life that ought to be so dear to the Turingiens. Before we reached this house we encountred Amalaric, with a strong Troop which he brought to our relief: and if through the Amity he bore me, he particularly interess'd himself in what had befall'n me; through a remembrance of what he owed Ambiomer, he considered the danger to which his life was reduced, with an extraordinary grief: But the King's (who arrived at Birse about Sun-set) was so immoderate that he could not have evidenced a greater for the Prince's death, or loss of his Kingdom: and when he perceived upon their countenances that searched his wounds in his presence, the little hope they had of his recovery, he abandoned himself to all those extremities of grief, that the most violent sorrow could produce in a heart which had no succour to oppose it: and he gave such evident marks thereof, as rendred all those that were near his Person, partakers of the same affliction: Oh! Turingiens, said he, you lose to day your valiant defender, and were you sensible of the greatness of your loss, you would deplore it in tears of blood: Oh valiant Ambiomer, the glory of our age, and the Protector of the weak and oppressed: Must Heaven take you from the unfortunate Eutharic with so much cruelty, and is this the reward you receive from a King and Kingdom, who had nothing great enough to offer you. He accompanied these words with many tears, and was so sollicitous in causing this illustrious wounded person to be served with care, that the meanest person in his Court, or the most affectionate of the Gaules could not have done more. He appeared pretty well satisfied of me, because he knew by many Signs that I was really afflicted, but by reason he fancied, there did not appear upon the face of Amalaric, such an excess of grief as was due to so great a misfortune; and that he had already suspected in him some ingratitude for his service, and envy to Ambiomer's glory; he looked on him with an eye enflamed, and could scarce endure to see him. He was not nevertheless obliged to testify to many his discontent upon the same occasions, for besides the complacency they had with his inclinations, the virtue of Ambiomer joyned with the memory of what he had done for the Turingiens safety, had link'd them to him with so strong an affection, that the danger which threatned his life, appeared as if it were the ruine of the Republick, and through all the Court who posted to Birse in great crouds, and amongst the people at Lephane, you might remark a desolation little different from that which appeared when the City was reduced by the Saxon Army to its greatest extremity. The first day they recovered Ambiomer out of his swoon, by the force of those remedies they had applyed, but permitted no person for the space of many others to visit him, and he remained a long time without any hope of his recovery: But in fine, those skilful persons that endeavour'd it, began to believe that it was not impossible that he might live, and a while after they told the King, that if the heavens assisted them, and that the wounded would lend a helping hand, they did not despair of his recovery. He that first carried this happy news to the King, knew the excess of his joy by the magnificent present he received from him, and by the same degrees as this hope augmented in his soul, you might (as it were) perceive him return from the grave, wherein this affliction before had plunged him. He had sent honourably back the body of Rambaud to the King of the Frisons his Father, and excused himself to him for the misfortune, to which he had no ways contributed, and for which he entreated him not to become an Enemy to a Prince so innocent, and so ancient an Ally: And at the same time he had dispatch'd an Ambassadour to the King of the Saxons, to complain to him of the injury and violent enterprize of his Son, and to entreat him not to uphold and sustain his evil intentions. But the care and diligence he used like a sweet and peaceful Prince to appease their resentments, did not succeed to his desires, for a while after he received but too large intelligence of what he fear'd.

In fine, after he had given much fear and affliction, to all those that interess'd themselves in the safety of Ambiomer, the Gods were pleas'd that they who labour'd therein, had greater reason to hope than fear it, and by little and little all the symptoms were so favourable that they did not any longer forbear from assuring the King of his recovery, or at the least from telling him, that if he had no other wounds than those of his body, they would be responsible for his life: but that they well perceived he had others in his mind, that gave them more fear, and which doubtlesly might hinder, or at best retard his cure. As the King was fully perswaded of the great love Ambiomer had for me, he no ways doubted but that was the inward wound which the Chirurgions had discovered, and that I was the person to whom he ought to address himself for remedy; so likewise he performed it, rather like the father of Ambiomer, than of Amalazontba: and he made me easily judge by his proceedings, that nothing was dearer to him than the life of this valiant person: Amalazontba, said he to me, if you love your Father, if you love your Country, or if you love your self; preserve, both for your self, for me, and for the Turingiens, the life of Ambiomer: and since that glory is reserved to you, do not refuse it through an ingratitude, which will be a scandal to you over all the world. I entreat you, although I might command you, and should I not desire it, yet you owe him too many obligations, not to be thereto disposed of your self. I shall not only approve and countenance all that you shall do for his safety, but I shall accept it as kindly as if you did perform it for mine; and in labouring for Ambiomer, you possibly labour for ours, and for the safety of Turingia. I testified to the King that I was ready to obey his orders, and to contribute what on me depended to the recovery of Ambiomer, as far as became the breeding and honour I had to be born his daughter: and by reason they already began to visit Ambiomer, and that the day before I had visited him my self, in the company of the King and of Amalaric; he commanded me to go see him alone, and that I should endeavour by a sweet and yielding converse, to give him a desire to live, and to banish that melancholly which oppos'd his recovery. Dear Sisters, I obeyed him, and even without repugnancy, not having any thought in my heart which was not advantagious to Ambiomer, and made me regard him as a person that merited possibly more than I was able to do for him: so that being informed by his Physicians, that he was in a condition to see me and speak to me, without exposing himself to a new danger, I went that day to his Chamber, only accompanied by two Ladies who did not come near his bed, but left me alone within the rails. He was no otherwise concerned in the visit I made him with the King, except in the pleasure we naturally take to see the persons we love, for besides that he could not then speak to me before the King and Amalaric, he only had reason to look on me as a person that accompanied the King, and not as a person that came to visit him: but seeing me enter alone within the Rail, and seat my self in a Chair by the side of his bed without any other company; he was so moved and surpris'd that of a long time he could neither reply to those questions I made him, concerning the state of his health, nor thank me but with his eyes for the favour I did him, and for interressing my self so far in the preservation of his life: But when the first effects of his passions were dissipated, gazing on me with eyes which too much explained what then was moving in his heart, and beginning his discourse with a trembling voice, much less perhaps through his weakness than the fear he had to displease me: Ab Madam, said he, is it possible that you should visit a wretch that hath offended you, and who too well merited death, since he hath deserved your anger. He stopp'd at these words, casting down his eyes somewhat dejectedly; and as I visited visited him with a design to perform all that was possible for me towards his satisfaction, looking on him with an eye that evidenced nothing of anger, I have already testified, said I to him, that I had no longer a resentment against you, for had not the offence you committed, been repaired by your obedience, there are few crimes which the blood you have lost in my defence could not wash away. Would to the Gods, said he to me with a sigh, that I had still it all, and that through the rage of Heaven I did not find my self reserved for a life much more cruel, than that favourable death to which I had surrendered my self. I neither would have you die, said I, nor do I desire your life should be miserable; and as your virtue will always be a great part of your happiness, I likewise assure my self you will rest contented with what others can contribute to it. Ab Madam, (replied he, liting his eyes once more towards my face) you know too well that I cannot contribute to my happiness, and if I feared not to irritate you once more, I would tell you— But no, (added he after some moments of silence) I will tell you nothing, for it was only in dying that I was permitted to speak. I had rather, said I, hear you speak, than see you die, for your death would be much more displeasing to me, than whatever you can speak to me offensive; live then Ambiomere, if you have any desire to please me, and be confident I shall not esteem my self less obliged for this proof of your obedience, than for those you have already given me. Alas, said he to me with a sigh, what impossibilities you desire of me? And how would you have me live, since all that should entertain my life is prohibited me? I have obeyed you, Madam, in those things that were possible, and I have had sufficient power over my tongue, to constrain it to observe that silence you commanded me, but my heart doth not acknowledge the same Empire; and as I cannot restrain it from adoring you even to death, it were but just, that by the period of my life, I should avoid this new occasion of displeasing you. If you could do it at another price, replied I to him, I should happily remain obliged: but at the price of your life which is of such importance, and ought to be so dear to us, I would not buy the greatest satisfaction; although the thoughts you have for me were much more distasteful, there is something which I ought to endure from a person to whom we are so highly obliged. As it seemed to him by this discourse that I approved his love, and that I had restored to him the liberty to speak of it, which I had before deprived him of, I thought I had spoken very obligingly to him, and had he been in another condition, it had not been possible for me to have told him so much without blushing, or without shamefacedness, so likewise did I observe, or at least I believed to observe in his eyes some marks of joy which had not before appeared; and some moments after they appeared in his whole countenance, so that with a voice more vigorous and chearful than ordinary; Ab, Madam, said he to me, I will live, since I am permitted to adore you, and I shall more willingly endeavour the conservation of my life, for that I hope it will not be useless to you, and that I shall have suddenly an occasion to employ it in your service. He would have happily said more (although I was careful not to let him spend his spirits) if Amalaric had not entred the Chamber; and his last words were but too much verified by the news which the King received that very day, of the great preparations that were making, both in Frisia, and in the Saxons Country, for a new invasion of our Country, and at the same time to destroy Turingia.

As the King before suspected it, he was less surpris'd than at the former invasion; but nevertheless he found himself much weakened by the losses he had suffered, and though he believed himself in a condition to sustain the power of one of these Kings, their united Forces gave him some terrour, and made him reasonably fear the success of that war. He prepared notwithstanding all things for our defence, with the best order that was possible, and Amalaric that very instant departed from Birse to go to Lephane, and all other places where his presence might be necessary to advance the Levies of the Soldiers, and to make them labour with greater diligence about the Ammunition and Fortifications of places. But as the greatest hope of the King was in his valiant Defender, and that he fancied himself invincible, if the Gods did sufficiently advance his cure, to enable him to fight in his assistance, he could not keep from him the news he had received, although he endeavoured to conceal it through the fear he had to disquiet him; and that very day he discovered to him the whole intelligence he had received of the design and power of their Enemies. Ambiomere testified to the King how much he shared in his misfortunes, although since the time that his health permitted him to reason, and consider of things better than he had done during his sickness, he had a fore-sight in part of what was then ensuing: and though in effect, he appeared afflicted for those misfortunes which threatened Turingia, and in particular for the King's affliction; he let him know that his greatest grief was to see himself then in a condition, which might not permit him to give him that succour he might expect from his valour. He notwithstanding believed, that he might be recovered, if not before that the Enemies had entred Turingia, at least, before they had made therein any considerable progress, since that Amalaric was in a condition to repel and oppose them with Forces sufficiently considerable; and that through the misfortune which had befallen him in the former war, he ought to be instructed in the managing of this after a better manner. He would nevertheless in attending his recovery, put himself in a posture of serving him better than with his own person, although the King considered his person much beyond the relief he might receive from a great Army; and the next day he dispatch'd one of his Attendants in whom he had the greatest confidence, to the Gauls, with all possible diligence, to demand relief from his Friends, as for his proper quarrel, by informing them of the State wherein he was, and how far he was interess'd in ours. He instructed him more, than in all appearance his health could permit him, concerning all he had to do, and charged him in particular to bring those Forces they gave him by Sea, and with them to assault the Frison or Saxon Countrey, as well to make a diversion, which could not be but very advantageous to us, as because the length of the way which the Troops had to travel by land, permitted him only to hope for a relief too late; and that they were much nearer by Sea to our Enemies Countrys, than to Turingia. After this first he sent also others the day following, for fear of accidents by which one might be stopp'd; and as his cure advanced, he gave more ample instructions to those he sent, touching his intentions; and in the interim, advis'd and counselled the King concerning the preparations for war, like a person no ways therein less interess'd than himself: the King (through the great opinion he had conceiv'd of him) submitted himself entirely to his counsels; and if he perceiv'd a zeal in Ambiomer to his interests, he evidenc'd no less kindness to him in all those things which might please him or advance his cure; and he even proceeded therein so far, either through his acknowledgment, and the real esteem he had for him, or through his desire of preserving to himself a person whom he judg'd might be so useful, that he no longer dissembled to him the design he had to be favourable to him in his love to me; and meeting me one day as he was coming from his chamber, Amalazontha, said he to me, I come from seeing a man who is much less wounded by the hurt he received from Rambaud, than that you have given him, but if you will follow my inclination, he should not be less fortunate in the wound he hath received from his friend, than in that which he hath suffered from the Arms of our Enemies. I wish, my Lord, reply'd I, that he may be quickly heal'd, both of the one, and the other, and it is the most advantageous wish I can make for him. For the wound of his Body, reply'd the King, I hope the cure from Heaven, and those remedies apply'd, but for that of his Soul I have not the same opinion, and perhaps you may be oblig'd to do more for him in that particular, than barely to wish his recovery. I shall ever do, reply'd I to him, all that your Majesty shall order me; and I hope that you will always cherish a remembrance of the Honour that I have to be your Daughter. You may believe, said he, that I shall never forget it; but if I should command my Daughter to prefer Ambiomer before Kings, I should not believe that I did her an injury. He only then spoke these words as he left me, but the days following, and upon all occasions that present'd themselves, he spoke many others which made me fear his intentions were more favourable for Ambiomer than I desired; and as I had no design to marry him, although I had an extraordinary esteem for him, and I may say an affection which went beyond good wilhes, yet this opinion of the King's intentions gave me really no small disquiet. I likewise knew that he had spoken to Ambiomer of it, and that though Ambiomer entertain'd his discourse with a great deal of humility, and an extraordinary modesty; he had manifest'd to him, that there was nothing so great to which his hopes might not pretend.

We were upon these disputes when the Saxons assaulted Turingia, with an Army of sixty thousand men, under the conduct of Genselaric; and that we were inform'd, that the Frisons with a power not much inferiour, had pass'd the River Anise, and through the Country of the lesser Braucieres had advanced as far as Visurgue. Amalaric was gone with a brave Army to encounter the Saxons, and the King had retain'd with himself some Troops to oppose the Frisons, Amalaric's Army, conduct'd by a Prince that had Valour, might have stopp'd the impetuosity of the Saxons, by disputing their passages, and making a politick use of those advantages the Country gave him; but the Troops design'd to oppose the Frisons, were too weak to permit us to hope a happy success; and though by Ambiomer's counsel the King sent them before him to those places, where they might defend the passage of some Rivers, which were upon their way: he could have expected little, if he had not perceiv'd Ambiomer's recovery advanced beyond his hopes, so that he found himself in a condition to go to Lephane, when the King was constrain'd by the urgency of his Affairs, which did not permit him to remain longer at Birse. In effect, we perceiv'd him to recover his health and forces from day to day; and divers persons rather attributed this good effect to the hopes which the King had given him, than to the virtue of the remedies apply'd:

plied: but notwithstanding the impatience he had to be well, and at the head of our Troops, his recovery was not speedy enough to obstruct the progress of our Enemies; and by this means to render him more necessary and considerable to us, made us still obliged to him for our safety; for after some conflicts which Amalaric had had with much valour, and a very equal fortune, he received a wound which kept him a long time from his Soldiers, and reduced him to a condition wholly incapable to think on the conduct of the Army, so that Genfalaric improving this advantage, pressed the Turingens so fiercely, that he constrained them to give ground, and to quit those passages, which till then they had courageously defended.

After this the Saxons assaulted them with such a fury, as rendered those Chiefs which commanded them in Amalaric's stead, unable to sustain the Brunt, so that before the Prince was in a condition to mount his Horse, he had received such great losses, it was impossible for him to keep the Field before the Saxons; for he was daily constrained to retire, only in making good those Passes which were most advantageous, which he still defended with much more courage than hopes of victory. Nor was fortune in our other war more favourable to us, for the Frisons had not only pass'd the River Visurgue, but many others in despite of those Troops the King had sent to oppose them; but after they had beaten them in divers encounters, by the advantage which their great number gave them, they had forced them to a disorderly retreat, and to quit all the Country from Visurgue to the River Elbe to their fury, so that daily advancing, without any resistance capable to stop them, they marched directly towards Lephane, threatening the whole Kingdom with a general desolation; and the Saxons on the other side, gaining always ground upon Amalaric, drove him towards the City, and made us by all appearance believe that we should within few days be enclosed between the two Armies, and reduced to our last extremities. But our fortune then decreed, not only that Ambiomer should believe himself in a condition to mount his Horse, and to fight in our behalfs, though he was sufficiently weak, and indisposed enough to have dispensed a much longer time with himself, had he had less courage, or less affection; but by and by he understood that the succours which he had demanded of the Gauls, were coming by Sea to our assistance, and that they were to arrive within few days at the mouth of the Elbe, under the conduct of Cillar and Dunnorix, two valiant Gauls, that under him had acquired much reputation, and to whom the Belgians with an incredible affection had granted threescore Ships: he was likewise made acquainted that they kept the coast of Frisia, and the Country of the Cauches; and that before they came near the mouth of the Elbe they expected his orders, to know whether they should attack the Saxons Country, according to his former intentions; or whether they should come to him up the River, as they did formerly. Ambiomer ravish'd with joy at this grateful news, and changing (through the then pressing necessity) the design which he had had to make a diversion, which could not produce so speedy an effect as was necessary for our relief, he sent to the Gauls with all possible speed, to make a show of assaulting the Saxons Country, and to leave some Ships near their Coasts to keep them in a continual Alarm, and to make with all the rest up the River, and to land on that side which looks upon Visurgue, and which was possess'd by the Frisons, hoping that Amalaric for some days more might withstand the Saxons, who could not joyn with the Frisons, by reason of the Elbe which separated them, and which was in that part of such a breadth and profundity, as rendered the passage impossible; and having chalked out the place to them where they should land, he put himself in a posture to go and meet them, and joyning with those Forces which had been chased by the Frisons, all those men he could find in Lephane capable of bearing Arms, and who in this urgent necessity resolv'd with too much joy to follow so famous a Captain, he formed a Body able to encounter all those Forces which the Frisons could oppose, to hinder his joyning with the Gauls; and as soon as he was in a condition to march, he resolv'd to head them, and advance towards the place where his Gauls were to land, before the Frisons had made themselves Masters of the Banks of the Elbe. It was then that the whole world look'd upon him once more as our Deliverer, and that the people following him with Acclamations which pierc'd the Heavens, and made him sufficiently know that it was on him they built their utmost hopes; but the King perform'd not less than the people, for not doubting that he was going to owe his Crown once more to Ambiomer, he made no difficulty of promising him Amalzoncha for the price of his Victory; Ambiomer received his promise with a great deal of modesty, and assur'd the King that he would not abuse it, but he refus'd not the performance; and this hope raising his courage, he march'd to the Battel with such a confidence, as promised us beforehand victory; and causing those Troops which were in the City to pass the Elbe over a Bridge, which for its largeness was not much inferiour to that which Trajan caused to be made over the Danube; he advanced with them to the place where he was to joyn with his Gauls, with the best order and discipline in the world.

The length to which I should extend this recital, if I recounted particulars, which would not perhaps be the least grateful part of my discourse, would hinder me from repeating the conversations I had with him before his departure; and it is likewise certain, that not being willing to abuse that advantage which the King's promise had then given him over me, he spoke to me less than ordinary, and did not mention the least word which might make me judge that his hopes were augmented, either by the King's promise, or by the necessity which we had of his relief; and when that the King embracing him before me, prayed him to go and fight, not only for the safety of the Turingiens, and of their King, but for the conquest of Amalazontha, which should be his recompence, his face was covered all over with a blush, equal to that he might have observed on mine; and casting down his eyes through modesty, Ab, my Lord, said he to him, do not make me hope a Glory which I know my self too much unworthy of, and do not give so great a cause to the Princess to pray against the prosperity of our Arms.

I remained with the King at Lephane, who by the counsel of Ambiomer was not to absent himself from thence; and I remained in a perplexity, which I cannot otherwise character, than by telling you my spirit was full of anxiety and disquiet, as well through the estate wherein I perceived our Affairs, which exposed us either to the danger of losing all, or to the necessity of owing it once more to Ambiomer. It was not (as I before told you) but that I esteemed him above all other men, and that I had more favourable thoughts for him than those of esteem, or that we commonly call friendship; but by the experience which I have since made, that which I felt for him could not be properly called love, and without much love, I could not see my self reduced from those hopes I had always cherish'd of espousing a King without much regret. In fine, whether I had reason on my side, or through a pride which I ought not to excuse, and for which I happily with justice suffer this present punishment, I could not bend my mind to it, nor endure the thought of it without much grief, and at last there wanted little in me of verifying the last words of Ambiomer, for indeed I was not very real in the wishes I ought to have made for the success of our Arms.

But whatsoever my wishes were, the success was greater, and more glorious for Ambiomer, than any one durst to have hoped; and to abreviate this discourse of the War, in the narration of which I am little skill'd, and whereof you have already learn'd the most important events, I shall only tell you, that Ambiomer with the Forces which he conducted, having in despite of the resistance which the Frisons (who were farther advanced than the others) could make, joyned with his Gauls; he faced them, and in divers conflicts cut their stragling Troops in pieces; and in fine, by a stratagem no ways inferiour to his valour, having taken his advantage upon the pass of a small River, which the Frisons were to cross to come to him, he not only defeated a part of their Army which was on his side of the River, but after he had so disabled them by that loss, believing himself sufficiently strong to fight the rest, he passed the River by night at some distance from that place where the Enemy lay encamped, and the next morning he gave them battel, and gained so entire a victory, that almost their whole Army with their Commanders perish'd upon the place, for there were saved a very small number, which were after taken prisoners. After this famous victory, he directed his course towards Lephane, where he came to pass the Elbe to meet the Saxons, who had chased and driven Amalaric even to the Gates of our City. It is most true, that this Prince (not being able without disgust, to see all the bravest actions reserved for Ambiomer, and willing to have his share in the safety of Turingia) had adventured farther than he ought, and by great losses had in such manner weakened himself, that one might conclude him utterly ruined, if Ambiomer had not come to his relief. Upon his arrival the face of our Affairs was immediately changed; for the name of Ambiomer so well known to the Saxons, struck them with so much terrour, that they were content to put themselves upon their defensive posture, without pursuing and pressing forward, as till then they had done: But Ambiomer being conscious of their astonishment, confiding in the valour of his men, and desirous to determine a war which ruined Turingia, stood not to dispute the giving them Battel, which Genselaric not refusing, it proved so bloody and terrible, that happily such inundations of blood were never seen before in the Fields of Turingia; and Genselaric, who was resolved either to die or conquer, having lost his life in the Battel by Ambiomer, the greatest part of his Saxons found the like destiny, either through their stubbornness in continuing the Fight, or through the rage of Amalaric,

Amalaric who thought to revenge himself of the mischiefs they had done us, and deprive them of the means of invading our Territories for the future, without listening to the clemency, which in their favour Ambiomer perswaded him to. In conclusion, the Saxons and the Frisons were entirely defeated, and except the dead and the Prisoners, there remain'd of neither sort in all Turingia; and even the power of both the King's of those Nations was so weakened by this loss, that the Saxon broken by those others he had received from the Danes, fearing the Arms of his Conquerours, and the name of Ambiomer, notwithstanding the resentments which he had for the loss of his Son, made us of himself propositions of peace: and the King of the Frisons who could not without much inconveniency wage war against us, willingly consented, and shortly after ratified it with the King of the Saxons, through the diligence of the Cauches our common associates, who had continued neuter during the time of the war, and were now become mediators for this peace.

The glorious Ambiomer was returned to Lephane with Amalaric, and as no one could doubt but that this second time as well as the first, all Turingia was obliged to him for their safety, and the King for his Crown, you may judge that he was there received, not as a deliverer, but as the Tutelar Angel of our nation: and looked upon both by the people and the Court as something beyond a man, and raised by a kind of divinity above them. He excused himself for refusing those honours they gave him, with an admirable modesty: And as he was conscious that the grandeur of his renown, and the acclamations of the people made Amalaric not a little ashamed; so he endeavoured to avoid his envy by opposing himself as much as was possible for him, to the effect of the publick acknowledgments. He was even desirous to have the honour of the last battel attributed to Amalaric, although none were ignorant that it was entirely his: and he advanced the Prince's actions like a person who had such a superfluity of glory, that he might well share a part thereof to another. As for myself, I confess that if his former actions had touched me, these last gave me much admiration, and that all his proceedings both in war and in peace, had in such a manner charmed me, that I could not without confusion consider the great repugnancy I had to give myself to such a person. I saw myself in the mean time appointed for him, for besides that the King was but too resolutely bent to keep the word he had given him, and that if he could have spared him a Crown, he would most gladly have given that also and his daughter to boot, even the people themselves proclaimed aloud the necessity of giving Amalazoniba to Ambiomer, and to link for ever by that marriage so great a person to the interests and defence of the Turingiens. The most qualified persons of the Court declared no less, and added thereto, that if Crowns were necessary for Ambiomer to merit their Princess, he might well hope to obtain them: and that with so much valour and such brave friends as he had, there were few that remain'd in assurance to keep them, when he pleased to assail them. These discourses both of the people and of the nobility, exasperated the Spirit of Amalaric: for he could not without an excess of grief hear it said, that the Kingdom which he was to possess, had need of any other defender than himself. He could not so well dissemble the dislike he had taken, but that it came to the cognizance of many persons, and in fine to the King himself, who being therewith beyond patience moved, spoke to him of it with a high resentment, and in such terms reproached his ingratitude, as made him very much ashamed of himself. Amalaric replied to him very smartly, and was not only content to let him understand, that the necessity which the people imposed upon this marriage dishonoured him: but that he could not without an extremity of grief, see his Sister espoused to a person (though never so valiant) which was but a plain Knight. But the King with a great deal of fury interrupting him; Without this Knight, said he to him, you and your Sister had both been in very bad conditions, to have chosen your Alliances; for few Kings would have posted to have married the daughter of a King without a Crown: I know not whether you have forgot that you owe it to Ambiomer, but the people cannot forget that they are bound to him for their safety: and I am ashamed to find in them as much of acknowledgment, as there is of ingratitude in the soul of a Prince. In the mean time be confident, I will keep my word, and although I were not engaged by my word, to the performance of what I design to do, I discern too much of advantage therein not to perform it. These words giving more confusion to Amalaric, augmented the reluctancy he had for this marriage, and that very day being come to my Chamber, and causing me to enter with him alone into my Closet, after he had walked some turns without speaking, with an Aspect which sufficiently denoted the disquiet of his mind, turning suddenly towards me, Well Sister, said he, you are then going to espouse Ambiomer, and I shall have the affliction to see a Sister I have so much loved, the Wife of a Soldier, and of a Soldier of fortune; and the shame to bear it said, that this marriage was made to obtain a prosessor for Turingia. These words augmented the displeasure which perplexed me, and answering the Prince according to my real thoughts, This marriage, said I to him, is not more agreeable to me than your self, for although I infinitely esteem Ambiomer, and am no ways ignorant of what we owe him, you know that I never had a design to espouse him. If you have no such design, replied Amalaric, you will not be his wife, for I am confident they will never constrain you to espouse him. I may reasonably hope, said I to him, that the King will not use any open violence to me in this occasion, for I have found too much sweetness in his spirit, to let me fear these utmost extremities: but you know what my duty is, and may well judge that I shall want confidence to oppose my self to the King's will, when he shall explain it to me by an absolute command. There is no duty, replied the Prince, which obliges you to do a mean action, unworthy of your blood, and of your courage, and happily another than your self would appear more hardy in this occasion: But because I will not expose you to the King's anger, (although it be not impossible for me to shelter you from it) I counsel you to address your self to Ambiomer himself, for I know he hath so much of respect for you, and so great a submission to your will, that if you declare to him your unwillingness to espouse him, and the misfortune you find in that condition for your self, he will never exact the performance of the King's word. What you say, replied I, may be true, and I had entertained this thought before you discovered yours: but I know not in what manner to express such a cruel intention, to a person to whom we are so much bound. A man of Ambiomer's birth, replied Amalaric, might satisfy himself with recompences more proportionable to his fortune, and the King hath many others to offer him, without sacrificing his daughter to the acknowledgments he hath for him. However it succeed dear Sister, attempt this way, if it be true that you will not espouse Ambiomer, or if you refuse it, you must give me leave to believe that you desire the marriage. To these words he added others so urging, that with the assistance they received from the aversion that I sincerely had from a Marriage so little proportionable to the Rank I might justly hope, they made me resolve to execute all that he desired of me: and happily it was rather through my own ill fortune, than that of Ambiomer; that I permitted my self to be vanquished by the influence which Amalaric had upon me. This resolution that he had infused into me, might nevertheless perhaps have been chased from my spirit, either by time or by the sight of the King, and a more absolute explanation of his will; if by misfortune Ambiomer had not entered my Chamber, a moment after Amalaric's departure, and had not found me as yet wholly filled and taken up with those notions which he had left me.

As since the return of Ambiomer from the entire defeat of our Enemies, all the Court had believed that he was to espouse me, and that the King not concealing his intention from any, was willing that he should converse with me, as a man appointed for my Husband might converse; he might have used more liberty towards me than formerly, and have acted with less respect through the advantage he had to be approved by the King. But he treated me after another manner, and in lieu of advancing himself by these advantages, he rather appeared thereby more humbled, so that he never presented himself before me, but as a criminal who had gained the inclinations of the King more than I desired, and had opened to himself the high way to a fortune much greater than I would consent to; so likewise was he more circumpect in his visits than he had formerly been, he never spoke to me but trembling, though elsewhere he always appeared the most hardy of men, and always regulated his words in such a manner, as never gave me occasion to judge that he had conceived any hopes which might displease me, and if he happened to manifest more joy in his eyes than had formerly appear'd there, he chang'd in an instant to a contrary condition; and rather accommodated his countenance to his former fortune, than to that to which the intentions of the King had advanc'd him. He nevertheless hoped the effect of his promise, and he hoped it so much the more, by reason I had not publickly opposed my self to it: and that he might rather attribute the little inclination I testified, to a natural severity than to any particular aversion.

He was not at all ignorant of the repugnancy that Amalaric had for this marriage, for he had discern'd it by too many marks, to permit him to doubt it; but although he found his soul excessively oppress'd with grief, and perhaps with a just resentment, the respect which he had for the King and me, oblig'd him to dissemble it: and he endeavour'd to vanquish the courage of Amalaric, by submission and patience; in lieu of making him remember what he had done for him. That day he brought Cilair and Dunnorix to my Chamber, those two brave friends that had brought us our timely succour, to take their leaves of me, having designed to march back the next morning with their Troops, and retire themselves amongst the Gaules. The King had retained them with him till the peace was signed, and Ambiomer would not they should longer continue in a Country, that had already sufficiently suffer'd by war: so that the King permitted them to return after he had testified his acknowledgments, both to the Officers and Souldiers like a generous Prince, and full of virtue. Ambiomer being entered my Chamber, presented me immediately those two illustrious Gaules, and

and after they had performed their civilities, like persons that understood themselves (and particularly Cilaire, who was a person as considerable for his fair behaviour, and for many excellent qualities as for his valour) and that I had manifested my acknowledgments to them in the handfomest manner that was possible for me; they withdrew themselves: and Ambiomer intending to go out with them, I desired him to stay, and to go with me into my Closet, where I entred first to oblige him to follow me. As he was not accustomed to receive such like favours from me, this was immediately suspicious to him, and he caused those that remarked his visage, to judge that he expected no good. 'Tis true, that he might perceive on mine, a part of what he had to fear, and that notwithstanding the instigations of Amalaric, and the pride which made me act, I had no less repugnancy to perform this action (which I looked upon as very unworthy) than to espouse him: I used nevertheless a violence to my self to accomplish it, fearing I should not have the same means, where affairs were farther advanced, or when I had received more precise orders from the King, than those he had as then given me; and really it was not without some violence, that I rendered my self in a condition to execute the resolutions I had taken: for the Gods sakes dear Sisters, do not hate me for the discourse I am going to make you, rather bewail an unfortunate woman, who acted much less through ingratitude, than through the persuasions of others, or through a destiny which guided her to her Misfortunes.

Ambiomer and I had been very silent for some time, and as their was an ill preface for him in mine, so was there somewhat in his of fatal and sad when I broke it; and in casting a look upon him, which my remorse rendred sufficiently wavering, Ambiomer, said I to him, after all that which you have testified to me, may I not be permitted to believe, that I am really beloved by you: I uttered these first words with much difficulty, and Ambiomer finding it as hard to answer a demand so little expected, and so little conformable to the discourses I was accustomed to make him; "I know not Madam, (said he to me at last) in what manner I ought to answer to what you demand, for I once found my self so unfortunate with having too much spoke upon this subject, that I shall never without trembling incur the same danger." "You had not at that time, replied I to him, the advantages that you now have, although we were then obliged to you for a part of what you have acted for us, and you may easily perceive, that your fortune is not now limited to the sole liberty of discourse, but since you find such difficulty in it; I answer my self for you, that you really love me, for I have received proofs sufficiently great, not to leave me any cause to doubt: But if this be true, ought I not likewise to believe, that the repose and happiness of my life are dear unto you, and that you would not refuse to perform any thing that was possible for you to hinder me from being unhappy." "Yes Madam you ought to believe it, replied Ambiomer, for if I had a thousand lives to lose, I would frankly sacrifice them all to the least occasion which might contribute to your happiness." "If it be so, replied I to him, I hope you will not refuse what I desire of you, and hope from you through the sole confidence I have in your vertue, for that only I shall tell you: And I shall tell you as it is really in my heart, that as you are the man of the world, in whom I have discerned the highest merit; so are you likewise the person of the world, for whom I have conceived the greatest esteem; and that although I had lost the remembrance of what you have acted for us, I find you a person worthy of a better fortune than that you can find in me. But in making you this confession of my thoughts, it is likewise necessary I should declare to you, that all the repugnancy you have discerned in me towards love, is but an inconsiderable part to the great aversion I have for marriage: and that though they gave me a God for a Husband, I should esteem my self unfortunate. I believe Ambiomer, I have said enough, and that although the felicity you propose to your self in marrying me, were a thousand times greater in the reality, than it is in your imagination, you would not purchase it at the price of all my happiness, and of all the future repose of my life. I should doubtless obey the King if you will constrain him to keep his promise, but you can have but very little satisfaction in rendring a person you love extremely miserable: and peradventure you cannot see her unfortunate, without bearing some share in her misfortunes. It is for this reason Ambiomer, that I request of your vertue, and happily of your love it self, that you satisfy your self with those other marks of acknowledgment that the King can give you, without desiring he should sacrifice unto you, the entire felicity of his daughter: and that by an Action so obliging and so generous, you give me the greatest proof that I can ever receive of your affection. I spoke in this manner, and might have spoken yet much longer, without fear of being interrupted, the grief and astonishment of Ambiomer, having so entered his tongue, that of a long time he was not capable to answer me. His eyes nevertheless supplied the office of his tongue, for by the divers changes and alterations of his countenance, it was easie to perceive that his Soul was seiz'd with a mortal grief, and that had he not mainly struggled with himself, he had possibly manifested more than he had a design to shew. At last beginning to speak though with much perplexity, and with a voice interrupted with many sighs; I was conscious, said he, that I was too much unworthy of the fortune they made me hope: But you know Madam that I never demanded it, and since that I could not merit it, they used a kind of cruelty to flatter my hopes. He that nourished them, replied I to him, hath not changed his sentiments for you, and in lieu of approving my proceedings, I doubt not but it would expose me to his anger, should it ever come to his knowledge. I should be extremely sorry to expose you to it, said Ambiomer, for in what manner soever you give me my death, I shall never complain of you. Nor shall I complain of the King, being absolutely perswaded that it is not by his orders that my ruine is decreed; but I shall complain of Amalaric, if you will give me leave: and if he were not your Brother, I should make him remember the condition wherein he was, and the condition he had happily been in at this day, without the succour of that miserable person, he hath precipitated into despair. Madam, I well know that you ought not to espouse any but a great King, and I have not forgot that I am neither King nor Prince, but for my Birth it is sufficiently noble, not to make me blush at the name of my Ancestors: and for the Royal dignity I had possibly had sufficient courage and friends enough, not to permit me to despair the atchieving it, if I had believed that my virtue could permit me to ravish a Crown from a legitimate possessor, or to render myself the master of my Companions; such as I am, I had not envied the fortune of any Prince, if that mere dignity had not been such a charm to you, which no other glory in the world, nor services sufficiently great could undo: and since that your inclinations are so conformable to your Birth, I praise the Gods that I have not been unprofitable to you, in maintaining you in a condition of never espousing any but Kings. "Were it true, replied I, that I had this inclination for the dignity of my Ancestors, I do not believe that it were to be much condemn'd: "But you cannot believe that this quality hath a charm able to make me shut my eyes to your merit, when you shall recal to your memory, that Rambaud and Genselaric who were apparent heirs to Diadems, obtained no great advantages over you, although they had intentions very little different from yours. "I confess, replied Ambiomer, that you have testified but very little inclination for those two Princes: But Madam, you have not happily forgot that you told me, that if the King should command you to espouse them, you would obey him without murmuring. "And I should have done it (replied I to him) and I should obey as much, if he should command me the like for you: But as I have declar'd to you, that I could neither espouse the one nor the other without being unfortunate, so I ought to advertise you, that I cannot be happy with you. "Since it is so, replied he, I will the Gods may rather give me a thousand deaths, than render me guilty of your misfortune in the least thought that might contribute to it: And into what state soever my bad fortune may reduce me, I had rather be unfortunate my whole life, than you should be so one minute. Fear not then that I should abuse the good intentions of the King, nor that I should demand the performance of a promise, which he only gave me through his own bounty. The services that I have done him, never aimed at the possession of Amalazontha, though Amalazontha alone can make me happy, and although they were sufficiently great to merit some remembrance from the Turingiens; I esteem my self too much recompensed by the bounty of a Prince, who hath judged me worthy of the fairest fortune in the world. If the affection with which he hath honoured me, could cause this blindness in him, you may well pardon that which a passion much more violent could operate upon my spirit, and believe that it was very difficult, (if not impossible) for a heart extremely amorous to refuse the entry and entertainment of so sweet and fair hopes. I lose them since you command it, and would to the Gods I had before lost my life, and that the sword of Rambaud had not left me those miserable remains which a feigned pity hath so cruelly preserved. It is only of this pity that I would complain, might I have leave, and I would accuse it of all my misfortunes, if it had not given me the means to have rendred you one service more. Now that you have no more to desire from me, and that Amalaric hath no more need of my Sword, to maintain him in his Throne which he is to ascend, I will go linger out as pleases my destiny, that little life you have left me: and for ever deliver you from a sight, which might bring some trouble to your repose, in reproaching you contrary to my intention. Ambiomer spoke in this manner, and these words from the mouth of a person, much greater in all things than I have represented him to you, and of a man to whom I too well knew that I owed all things; touched me so sensibly, that it was not without using a cruel violence to my self, that I preserved my resolution: and to confess to you the truth, I believe that had I not feared the taunts of Amalaric, (who long before had obtained a great Empire over my heart) I had not preserved it: And looking on him, him with eyes that testified no manner of aversion : No, us Ambiomere, said I to him, you must not quit us, and since that the King hath not given you any subject to accuse him, you cannot without cruelty expose him to that grief which your absence would beget : he may happily find out opportunities to acknowledge your great services, which may comfort you, and make amends for the loss of Amalazontha ; and the misfortune is not so great for you, but that a courage like yours may easily support it. I hope indeed, replied he, that my courage will sufficiently serve me in this misfortune, to hinder me from doing any weak action which you may condemn ; but it will not let me live near you after the loss of my hopes, although I might have lived here without hope, before I was permitted to hope ; and for those recompences which I might expect from the King, (continued he, looking on me with an aspect, which through all his respect shewed something of fierceness in it) as that which he ordained for me, was too much above me, all others which he can give, are too much beneath me ; and death only shall be my comfort for the loss of Amalazontha, if my just resentment afford me no other remedy. Adieu, Madam, (finish'd he, saluting me in order to his departure) the Gods grant that you never repent this action, and that you may be as happy with the Husband Amalaric designs you, as you have believed your self miserable with the unfortunate Ambiomere. After these words he retired himself with a constancy greater than mine, but in effect so disturbed, that he could scarcely find the door to go out of my Chamber. He us'd however his utmost endeavours to dissemble his grief before those persons he met in his way, but in passing through the presence, to go to his own Apartment, he met there Amalaric with divers other persons ; and by reason that the Prince (who, notwithstanding the ill offices he had done him, observ'd still his wonted ceremony to him) quitted his company to accost him ; Ambiomere receiv'd him with a countenance extremely different from that he was accustom'd to have from him, and looking on him with an eye that denoted his indignation : My Lord, said he to him, you have overcome, and you shall not have the shame to have a plain Knight of your Alliance ; but may possibly one day remember, that to this Knight you owe the Crown you are to wear, and that if he were not hindered by a respect much stronger than his just resentment, he might yet make it to totter. He quitted him roughly after these words ; and the Prince, who was not by nature very patient, were it either through the truth that he found therein to his confusion, or through some remorse he might feel for his proceedings, or through a fear that he had to irritate the King, let him depart without replying one word, although there appeared sufficient trouble on his countenance, to give cause to those that were in the Presence, and who had not heard the discourse of Ambiomere, to suspect a part of the truth.

The rest of that day Ambiomere was not seen by any, and they told the King when he enquir'd after him, that he was employ'd in the affairs that the departure of the Troops of the Gauls made him take care to dispatch. The next morning he understood that he had taken Horse very early to accompany them, as was said, half a days journey from the City ; nor did he any way admire, that he shew'd this civility to his warlike Friends, who had performed so much, and so gallantly for his interests : but after that night they saw his Equipage depart, and the next morning we heard no news of him ; but about the evening of the third day, one of his Domesticks who was a Turingien, whom he had taken into his service since his coming to Court, arriv'd at Lephane, and came to inform the King that Ambiomere was embark'd in his Ships with his Gauls, to gain the Sea by the mouth of the Elbe ; and when that the King much astonish'd, would have ask'd him the cause of this sudden departure, he presented him a Letter, whereof the contents were to this effect.

Ambiomere to the King of the Turingiens.

MY Lord, I was too unworthy of the honour you intended me ; and by reason I perceived it as well as Prince Amalaric, I was willing to spare him the displeasure of seeing the reproach, and the Princess the shame of seeing her self so debas'd ; she doubtlesly merits an Emperour of the East, or rather of the whole Universe, and the unfortunate Ambiomere merits nothing but death, either in the Waves, or in Arms, or in all that which his fortune can offer him to terminate his misfortune. He is too much recompens'd for the services which he hath rendered you, through the design you have had both for his glory and happiness ; and although he was not willing to abuse it, he will preserve as long as he shall live a just resentment thereof.

This was the Letter of Ambiomer, in which you see, my fair Princesses, that notwithstanding his grief and just resentment, he did not complain of me, for fear of irritating the King against me; and but little of Amalaric, although he knew the great cause he had to do it. This so modest, and so generous proceeding, augmented the remorse that I already felt in my heart, for the ingratitude I had testified to him; and it became so great, that I saw my self within few days exposed to a sensible grief and real repentance: Amalaric was less touched, and he supported patiently enough the absence of a person whose glory obscured his, and to whom the Turingiens, together with their King, rendered more honour than he desired. But for the King, he was sensible of such an extremity of grief, as could admit of no consolation in that little time which remained to him of life after this misfortune; and although that Ambiomer had not accused me, mistrusting a part of the truth, he had so great a resentment against me, that after he had cast upon me a thousand reproaches upon all occasions that presented themselves, he still looked on me as a person that had cruelly offended him; and for Amalaric, he was in such sort exasperated against him, that after he had accused him a thousand times of ingratitude and baseness, he banish'd him his presence, not being able to endure him, and without doubt he had not (of a long time) pardoned him the unkindness he had done him, if he had not been (some few days after) seized with a desperate sickness, (to which, according to the common opinion, his grief had much contributed) which in fifteen days deprived him of his life. In this condition he could not refuse to see me, and he likewise saw Amalaric, to whom, having anew reproach'd his ingratitude, he foretold that he would not long keep the Crown he should leave him; and that he would be more mercifully chastised than he hoped for, if the Gods should only punish him with the loss of his Crown: and addressing himself afterwards to me with the same spirit of divination, which the Gods had infused into him at his death, he declared to me, that Heaven would revenge Ambiomer by some strange misfortune that would befall me; and that if I did not repair the fault I had committed, by recalling him, and giving my self yet to him, if it were possible, I should be the most unfortunate person in the world. Some few moments after he had uttered to us these too true predictions, he departed this life; and left me by his death plunged in a grief, from which all that hath since happened unto me, hath not released my Soul. Amalaric received the Crown, and in the beginning of his Reign he shewed such a vigour, and greatness of courage, as obliged our reconciled enemies to ratifie the peace they had made with us; and he endeavoured by all manner of kind usage, and testimonies of an entire friendship, to make me forget my grief and resentments, both for the death of the King, and for the loss of Ambiomer, which a too late repentance, and a remembrance of his love, and of his admirable qualities made me incessantly bewail.

By his proceedings he really linked me to him in the chain of a tender affection; but I only entertained it in my heart for him to augment my misfortunes; for he had scarce commenced his Reign, when by the solicitation of the King of the Cimbrians, and the sight of one of the Portraits of the Princess Rosamond, which he sent to Princes he meant to engage in his quarrel, made him embrace it through the love he easily conceived for you, my Sister, much more than through any other consideration. You know that he departed Turingia with thirty thousand men, that he joyned himself with the King your Father's Army, that he saw you, that he adored you, and that through a destiny which rendered his death glorious, since he suffered it for you, he lost his life in the Battel by the cruel Sword of Pharamond. The Crown which I received by his death was not capable to console me; for I resented so lively a sorrow, that the Letters, that with this news, and the body of Amalaric I received from the King of the Cimbrians, and from the King of the Sueves, by which they exhorted me to the revenge of a Brother's death, by entreating me to let them have the Troops that he had conducted to their relief, did not only find in me all that disposition they could desire, to make me agree to their demands: but having learn'd some few days after, that the King of the Cimbrians was dead, and that their fair Queen, and the Princesses of the Sueves were at the head of an Army to seek revenge for their Brothers death, who had lost their lives by the same hand that had taken it from mine, I thought that I could not better testify to the memory of Amalaric the affection I had for him, than by joyning my self to these fair Princesses, with a design semblable to theirs: And thus, as well for this reason, as because, that maugre the change of my condition, I could not find my repose in a place where every object reconducted to my spirit, the memory of the King my Father, whom I had tenderly loved, and unfortunately irritated; that of Amalaric, who had been very dear to me, and to avow to you the truth, that of Ambiomer, which did not less torment me, I departed Lephane, and march'd out of Turingia gia with a thousand Horse, to render my self near you, traversed the Cherufques Country, and not being able to pass the Vifirgue, whose passages were guarded by our Enemies, I did not only render my self here somewhat later than I had determined, but by reason of the circuit I was to take, and the error of our Guides, who conducted me to pass nearer the Camp of the Franks than they ought, I saw my self exposed to the misfortune which befel me, in falling into the hands of a party of our Enemies, commanded by a Brother of Pharamond, by which (if I were exempt from other evils that I might have feared, through the civility of our Enemies, who respected my Sex and Dignity) through a new and fatal apparition which my ill fortune presented me, I found my self precipitated in this horrible misfortune, which I have with so much difficulty to recount unto you, for which I employ your compassion; and must in fine declare it to you, since I am arrived to this fatal place, which covers my life with shame and confusion.

The Sixth Part.

BOOK I.

T these words Amalazomba stopped, moved by the pressing consideration of a thought that rendred her too sensible of the future event. Her countenance changed in such a manner, that though her grief were unknown to the Princesses that heard her, yet it commanded their compassion before she begged it. Till then they had observed in her discourse a fairer subject of accusation than of pity; and if the Queen of the Cimbrians were too just, in not approving her ingratitude, yet the Soul, so sweet and tender, of Albifinda, was so far touch'd to the quick, that she began to doubt, whether she should not now rather cover the misfortune, which it griev'd her so much to make known. But by the lively demonstration of her grief, pity so defaced whatever they had of ill opinion towards her, that they really resolv'd rather to compassionate than condemn her. It was a long time ere she could compose her self to finish a relation that gave her so much trouble to conclude it: and shame oftentimes stopp'd her mouth, before she could come to a confession, which she so much feared. But at length she determin'd to venture upon an act of meer constraint. And having related to the two Princesses the rencounter which she had in the Valley, where some mischance that happened to her Equipage, causing a stop of the Troops which she thought to have been commanded by Prince Sunnon, were the occasions of her meeting with this admirable unknown person, who had caused so great a change in her mind; she rehearsed to them the converse which they had had together, she made a full description of whatever appeared to her in his person, But this was performed in terms so passionate, and with an action so conformable to her words, that the very thing which she so much feared, seem'd to the Princesses no way necessary to make known the effect of this fatal encounter. Her love was sufficiently discovered as well by her eyes, as by her discourse. And after she had disengaged her self from this first difficulty, still she found a greater to oppose that which this imperious passion had made her subject to, upon this cruel adventure; all the stratagems she had made use of to dislodge it, all her courage, all her reason prov'd in vain for her relief. Nor did she forget at the same time, to relate to Rosamond the particulars of a dream that had troubled her the night before, and which had given place to the sad impression which the complaint that she had made to her before, had left in her heart. She hung so long upon her discourse, that from thence the fair Queen made an easie conjecture how deeply her heart was engaged. Having finish'd her relation, after some few moments of silence, wherein the two Princesses had not time to interrupt her, resuming her discourse with some sighs, Behold, said she, what is now my fortune, and what a condition I am in, whether from the effect of that cruel Star that commands my Destiny, or from the punishment which revenging love and the irritated Gods are about to lay upon my ingratitude, I cannot tell. I confess, dear Sisters, that Ambiomer has more than well deserv'd my afflictions, affections; and that no consideration, either of dignity, or of complacence to my Brother, ought to hinder me from rendering what I owe to his merit, and to my Father's will, I may also tell ye, and that sincerely, that I have not only acknowledged my fault; but that I have often been sorry for it, under other pretences that gave free liberty to my tears; and that all the changes that have happened to my condition, both by the death of my Father, and of Amalaric cannot root from my heart, neither the remembrance of Ambiomer, nor the stings that continually pierce my heart: and I will add with a reality most entire and cordial, that when I received the Crown, I was fully resolved to make a satisfaction for my crime, by obeying the last will of the King, and by making him the most pleasing reparation I could possibly give him; and that finding my self in such a condition, that I could espouse Ambiomer without the least dishonour to my Dignity, I had no other intention but to have given to him with Amalazontha, the Crown of the Turingiens. The Gods are my witnesses, that these were the thoughts that wholly possess'd my Breast, and that I studied all means to recal Ambiomer, at which time the sight of this miraculous man encountered me, whether descended from Heaven, or ascended from Hell to be my ruine, is the question: rather at what time the view of this Deity, this Demon, or Ghost, upon whom, through the strange effect of seeing him, I cannot look, as any thing of humane or natural, in an instant rais'd from my memory the Image of Ambiomer; and with those good thoughts which I had for him, all those which I can possibly have for my self. In a word, since this fatal moment I hardly know my self; and this change has been so great in me, that of the first original of Amalazontha there is hardly any thing left to shew. This pride, or rather this unjust fury that has fix'd my eyes upon so bright a piece of virtue, not accompanied with a Crown, would vanish like smoke, were it true that he were a man; who in all appearance seems to have nothing of more elevated worth than Ambiomer. Certain it is, my heart continually tells me, that he has nothing more of great or sublime within him, than Ambiomer, yet this heart, this miserable heart of mine, may perhaps betray me upon this occasion; but since it has thus betrayed me, I will have no more confidence in it. You see however, it is not through inclination, or any natural softness, that I have abandoned my self to a passion contrary to all the rules of reason: rather may I be thought a very indifferent Lover: for besides that Rambaud and Genselaric both born to wear a Crown, both renowned for their most high and noble qualities, could only tax me of too unjust a disdain; Ambiomer himself, whose virtue, though without a Crown, transcends the height of Thrones, could never raise a Battery sufficient to weaken my ambitions: This pride of mine that made me look upon all men that were not to be Kings, with a kind of scorn, had given place to love, had I been truly touch'd therewith. And it was for this reason only that I had not that love for Ambiomer, which I preserved for my own State and Dignity. By this misfortune I find my self justly expos'd to that reproach which you may throw upon me, not to love where I ought, and to love where I had no ground. But this strange irregularity, or rather behaviour so opposite to reason, in a person that perhaps upon another occasion may not appear so void of sense, gives you to understand, that my misery proceeds from a higher and more hidden cause; that in this last misfortune, my miserable will has neither action nor liberty; and that I am not less to bewail the violence which I suffer from a power that I am not able to resist, than I am to blame my former faults, which for having been voluntary, are perhaps the less excusable.

These last words of Amalazontha were accompanied with some tears that dropp'd from her fair eyes upon her more lovely cheeks, and mov'd the two fair Princesses that heard her; in such a manner, that they could no longer retain their indignation against her, for her ingratitude to Ambiomer; and so far they took her into their pity, that pity was the only thought with which any other of their passions could partake. The fair Queen of the Cimbrians was the first that testified how sensible she was of her misfortune. And although her mind was not a little troubled, by reason of some suspicious words which she gathered from the end of her discourse: yet could she not make use of any umbrage, to hide what her most excellent natural disposition presented to her thoughts, for the misfortune of her friend. She rose from her place to seat her self in a chair that was next Amalazontha; and laying her lovely face to her fair cheeks that were all bedewed with tears, with a behaviour so full of sweetness and tenderness, Sister, said she, cheer up, and believe that there be other persons as unfortunate as your self, who endure their misfortune with patience: I confess, that in yours there is something particularly strange, and I believe with you, that the just anger of Heaven revenges the complaints of a person, that without doubt deserved a more favourable entertainment at your hands; in regard of whose love, in respect of whose merit, and for whose great services you ought to lay by the consideration of a Dignity, the preservation

whereof you owe to him alone. But be it as it will, your misfortune is certainly great, and yet perhaps not altogether past cure: for in this unknown person whom fortune has presented to your eyes, and made you to love him contrary to your design, if she have not offered you a subject worthy your affections, you have so much resolution still remaining, which by the assistance of time and reason may expel from your heart all impressions which he has left there; and return you into a condition to pass your days with more agreeable content. However, dear Sister, we will endeavour your comfort as much as in us lies; and if we accuse you for any thing, it shall be less for what you are so apprehensive of blame, than for that severity which you your self have so adventurously confess'd, and for which I am assured, that Albisinda will be as much dissatisfied with your self, as she is now discontented to bear the misfortune which you have had so much trouble to relate to us. Believe me, if you please, (said the fair Princess of Suevia) that I have been as truly troubled for the misfortune of Ambiomer, as I am now for yours; and that I should not easily pardon the injustice which you have done to so great a person, did I not now see you more severely punish'd than I could have willingly expected. I am very well pleas'd, said the Queen of the Turingiens, that you throw all your displeasure upon an ingratitude for which I blame my self; and that you have either for my weaknes, or my misfortune, all the favour that I could have begged at your hands; seeing it was this misfortune, rather than my former crimes, that I feared would have rendred me incapable of your friendship. You need not fear either the one, or the other, said the Queen of the Cimbrians, and as you are not guilty of a misfortune to which your will never gave consent, so as to the fault which you confess, you want not reasons sufficient to justifie others in doing the same. But, Sister, said the Princess Albisinda, is it not possible for us to imagine who this admirable person should be? May it not be Marcomire? It cannot be Marcomire, (said Rosamond, observing the others disturbance when she spoke;) besides, we understand that Marcomire was wounded, and was not at the Combat that day: you well know, had he been there, Sunnon, who is his younger Brother, had not commanded that party. That which you say is very true, (replied Albisinda, with a more serene and calm countenance) but let us consider, for although in the Court of Pharamond there be Princes renowned for their merit and their noble carriage, and that both for the one and the other, I have heard Iberc, Meroveus and Genebaud above all the rest commended, yet do I not find that any of them all excel either Sunnon or Ambiomer, whom we have mention'd. Sunnon himself, replied Amalazontha, has not so graceful a carriage as Ambiomer, though perhaps he may have more of Beauty. But the person of whom we speak, is such an one, that I can hardly believe him to be a mortal; both in his eyes, in his discourse, in every action, in the whole frame of his person, there is something above humane; and were he not more than man, he could not in a thousand years have wrought that alteration in my heart, which he has brought to pass in a moment. But so insensible am I, proceeding with a sigh, that I have forgot, said she, not only whether he discours'd like a man, that spake to me, but whether he spake as a subject, or one that was a friend to Pharamond: merciless fortune would not leave me so much consolation as I might find in a favourable and advantageous opinion of him. And in the beginning of my love, I meet a danger, lest I should not only love a subject, but the subject of my Enemy. However, let him be who he will, he is a person that no person can equal; and what ever I can make you apprehend by my discourse, comes short of the truth. With that she made a more particular description of him, than she had done in the rehearsal of the first meeting, and she made it in such a manner, that the jealousy which formerly began to enter into the breast of Rosamond, from that time took a deeper root, and from thence glided also into the Soul of Albisinda. They communicated their thoughts aside, but would not discover any knowledge thereof before Amalazontha; and making reflections at the same time upon the dream which the Queen had told them, not a little advantageous to explain her fate, they began to be confident that it must be Pharamond himself that so had wounded her heart. At the same time Rosamond felt something of alteration, which she was not accustomed to feel, which though it resembled compassion more than jealousy, yet it troubled her mind in such a manner, that she changed her colour, Amalazontha, who by accident cast her eyes upon her, was the first that perceiv'd it, and beginning to have some mistrust upon that action of Rosamond, Dear Sister, said she, can it be possible, that you should know the author of my misery, and that my dream should have so truly signified the truth. "I do not believe, (replied the fair Queen, hiding with one hand the "blushes of her Rosie Cheeks) that you ought to lay any foundation of certainty upon "Dreams; and I am sure yours is not true, if it tell you, that I should do you any harm: "but to know the person for whose sake you so bewail your self, will prove a thing difficult "enough; for if you have not flattered him in the description which you have made of "him, there are few in the world that resemble him. It is too true, replied the Queen, that I have not flattered him, nor is it less true that there are few humane shapes that ever appeared, as he appeared to me. Nor have I heard less always said of Pharamond, although he be our most mortal Enemy, and I might bear a heart not without cause suspicious, did not his proceeding together with that of Prince Sunnon, clearly take away whatever I am able to conceive of any such thing. "And should you believe your self the more unfortunate, said Albisinda, should it prove to be Pharamond himself that has given you this wound, and not a subject of his? "It would be a less disgrace to me, replied Amalazontha, but a greater misery: And although this ingratitude of mine which has contracted your displeasure, may have drawn upon me heavens indignation also: yet will I not believe that I have any way offended in yielding to so strange a misfortune.

Thus they discoursed, when one of Amalazontha's women came to tell her something in her ear, from him that commanded her forces, which caused her to retire to her Chamber: And she was no sooner departed out of Albisinda's presence, but the Queen of the Cimbrians causing Albisinda to sit by her upon the bed; "Well then dear Sister, said she, do you then believe Prince Marcomire to be this unknown person, with whom the Queen is so passionately in love? "I find well that it is not Marcomire, replied the Princess, rather should I believe as you would doubtlessly do, that it is King Pharamond, were there not so many evidences to take away all persuasions to such a belief. The Evidences which as you conjecture, gain say this persuasion; work no such effect upon my belief: For whereas this unknown person spake to the Queen of the Turingiens, on the behalf of Sunnon, though he met her but with a few in company, whereas Sunnon always attended her with a great Train, yet his deportment seems altogether Pharamond's, to which also the description that Amalazontha gave of his person, does no less persuade me; he had the discretion no doubt, not to make himself known, who had so little a while before put her Brother to death. And although a passion contrary to reason, does not always reserve such a consideration in ones thoughts; yet at Marobuda he had the same for you, when he sent to visit you, but durst not appear in person, though I could not then tax him for the death of my Brother, of which in a few days after he was found guilty. All that he said, all that he did, seems to me altogether conformable to the sweet disposition and wisdom of Pharamond: And if he accosted Amalazontha with so small a Train, it was perhaps because it was not her whom he sought when he met her Chariot. At another time, since you guess right that it cannot be Marcomire, I shall tell you, that no other man but Pharamond could have produced such effects in a person not naturally inclined to love: And since I must tell you more than perhaps I ought, by the proof that I have made, Pharamond is worthy of her. The first time I saw him, the whole composition of his person seemed to have something supernatural, a charm that deluded my hatred, and seduced my reason: A secret power that would not permit me from the first moment that I beheld him, to look upon him with an indifferent eye, while I entertained him as an Enemy. "I must acknowledge, said Albisinda, that the sight of him enchanted me: and seeing that Pharamond was not born for me, I have thanked the Gods a thousand times, that it was not my sad chance to meet Amalazontha's misfortune. But my dear Sister, if it be true that she is in love with Pharamond, in what a condition will she be, or how can we hope that she will be other than miserable. "It is not impossible, replied the Queen, but that having whatever else he can expect, with so much affection to boot, she may pierce the heart of Pharamond which cannot be insensible: and although I can never enjoy Pharamond my self, I shall behold Amalazontha's happiness without giving any obstruction to it. "Amalazontha, replied Albisinda, can no more enjoy Pharamond than your self: For you know he hath been no less guilty of the death of Amalaric than of Theobald. Amalazontha, said the fair Queen, is not engaged to ruine Pharamond as I am, by the Command of a Father, by oaths solemnly taken, by an Alliance contracted with the King your father, and many other Kings, who have taken Arms in our quarrel; she has only to revenge the death of a Brother slain in battle, whose death was neither accompanied nor preceded by any other injury. And seeing her affection is so great, she may perhaps forego that consideration: and if she do so, she is far less to blame than I should be, should I be guilty of doing the same. Supposing then that this should come to pass (replied fair Albisinda) think you that you shall be able calmly and quietly to behold so great a change? shall you be able to suffer so great a loss without giving one sigh, when you shall find Pharamond that could not be yours, to have yielded up himself to Amalazontha? "I shall endure all this without doubt, replied the Queen, but I know not whether I shall suffer it without some torment, perhaps not without my death. But my dear Sister, let us discourse no more upon this subject you see how open I have been to discover my thoughts.

When the Queen could not by those words, oblige the Princess of Suevia to change her discourse, she was about to do it her self: and therefore Albifinda seeing that night approach'd, at what time she expected the Prince Viridomar, and for that she would not let her visits be a secret to the Queen from whom she kept nothing concealed; she thought it was time to give her notice of her intention. Other reasons oblig'd her to give her a sight of Prince Viridomar, for besides that she was satisfied that she owed this confidence to her friendship, and that she did not fear that it could be any way prejudicial to her brother, to let the Queen know of his arrival, she believed it would be a difficult matter to see him often without her knowledge, or giving her occasion of other suspicions, which would be less advantageous to her. And on the other hand she had a great desire to let the Queen know, that it was not without good ground that she had so often spoken well of Viridomar, and that there were few Princes in the world, more worthy than himself of the good fortune to which he was designed. Here pondering a little, and then breaking silence which had lasted a few moments, resuming her discourse with a countenance less serious than before; You made your boasts to day, said she, that you knew all my very thoughts, but I know not what you would think, nor what opinion you would have of me, should you understand from any other mouth than my own, what I saw in my Closet last night: and that I am this evening to see a Noble Knight, and a Knight whom I love most entirely. These words surpris'd the Queen, and because she understood that the Princess had a real kindness for Marcomire, she thought it might be him, though she could hardly imagine that Albifinda would consent to so dangerous an interview. While she was thus in doubt what to think, with a behaviour little different from Albifinda's, I cannot apprehend any thing by your discourse, said she, but whatever you tell me, I know you are too wise for me to suspect the management of your concerns. I have told you nothing but the truth, replied Albifinda, I have not only seen this Knight of whom I have spoken, and hope this evening also to see him again, but I intend that you shall see him your self if I may obtain so great a favour. There is nothing, said the fair Queen, which you may not command from my friendship, but by this friendship it self, give me leave to tell you, if it be true that you have seen Marcomire, as you may perhaps have done against your will, I advise you not to continue such interviews, that may cost him his life, and expose you to prejudices that may prove your perpetual vexation. I see now (replied the Princess smiling) that notwithstanding what you have said to me, you do not believe me guilty of too much discretion: However, if I have not seen Marcomire, I have seen another in whom there is as much hazard, yet for his personage nothing inferiour to him, though the other be accounted equal to Erideus. It is not without exposing himself to danger that he pays me his visits, and for that he comes so late and a good way off, I fear I shall not rise to morrow sooner than I did this morning. "You talk so in the dark, said the Queen, that I protest dear Sister "I understand nothing that you say, but I hope when you think it convenient, you will let "me understand who this Knight is that you have seen, and into whose company you "would bring me. The Princess of Suevia not willing to keep her in a suspense so displeasing to her, discovered to her the truth: and gave her to understand the meeting which she had the night before with Prince Viridomar. She also made a brief relation of the adventures of this Prince, and of what had fallen out most considerable in the pursuit of his love, for the Princess Polixena. She also let her know by her discourse, that it was not one slight moments view that had engaged his heart, nor found he any reason to abandon those fair hopes which cherish'd his love. Rosmond listned with much delight to the discourse of Albifinda, and the Queen her self testified how much she was concerned in the adventures of her Brother, wherein she took an interest far different from that which any disposition but hers could take, or a disposition like that of Viridomar, capable of rebuking it self for the least error committed. She deliver'd her thoughts upon this occasion, with that calmness of speech; that Albifinda might easily gather from thence, that the Queen took no offence at the proceeding of her brother, besides that his merit had obtained a fair esteem in her thoughts, she assur'd her withal that she would be most joyful to see him, not only for her sake, but for the desire his own Reputation had created in her. And because he could not come to her without being in danger to be seen by more persons than he desired to be known to, she made a promise to the Princess, that she would come to her at any time which she should appoint or give her notice of. After this she advis'd her to feign her self indispos'd for that evening, that she might have a fair pretext for not rising early the next morning, if she should happen to sit up as late that night as the night before: and thus every thing being order'd, the Queen return'd to her apartment to shew her self to such persons whom she admitted, either for view, entertainment, or other matters not easie to be endur'd by a person of her temper, wherein she was rather subject to the necessities of affairs, the condition of her high estate, than to her own inclination. She always differently consider'd both, nor did she constrain her self to hide the difference which she put between them. She looked upon the King of the Suedes as her Tyrant, as a person that cruelly made use of the advantage which her oaths and the last will of her Father had given him over her, to make war upon an enemy whose ruine she did no ways desire, or seek as he did. Among her admirers she considered the Prince of Persia as a great Prince, not only by birth, and for the rank which he held in the world, but for his valour and his extraordinary desert. However she observed in him a presumption that displeas'd her, so that her affection for him was little or none: for Gondioch she hated him, as well for what he had committed first against her, and afterwards against Pharamond, which created in her to great a dislike of him, that her eyes were shut to all the high and noble qualities that he possess'd. She looked on Ardaric as a Prince highly to be esteem'd, both for his valour and his virtue: but she was never importun'd by his Love, or rather she was never touch'd with any affection for him. And for Godegesile, though she knew him to be both valiant and Amorous, yet neither his Courtship nor his person pleas'd her: She perceiv'd a certain harshness in his disposition, and a haughtiness not less than that of Varanez, which was that she could not brook. Balamir was indeed the only person among all those that openly and most vehemently desired her affection; in whom she found whatever might be sought for to pierce her heart, and there is no question but he might have gain'd her favour, had he made an attempt more reasonable, before her heart had been assaulted by an affection greater perhaps than his, and by a merit no way inferior to his, or that of any other person in the world. However, though she had no affection for him, yet had she an esteem for his person, and as much as he could desire: She acknowledg'd the value of his love, if it be possible that love can pay in any other coin than love again. And as she judg'd him most deserving, and that his merits might have had success, had not fortune contradict'd; she afford'd him all sort of publick testimonies of her favour, and gave the world to know that if at any time she should be reduced to receive a Husband at the hand of fortune, the want of a Crown would not hinder Balamir from being advanced above the rest of his Rivals: Because he had no forces and at that time could serve her no otherwise than in his own person; after the death of her Father, she order'd him to command the Cimbrians. At what time they who for their birth or for their eminent services kept the chiefest ranks of dignity in that Country, and who would not so easily have brook'd subjection to another, without any resistance submitted to so great a person, and took it for an honour to have him their head: But if they had this value for his fair Reputation, his carriage attract'd their love more powerfully. And in his high and noble course of proceeding, they found such a charm that gain'd all their hearts. So that we may truly say that in the description that Telanor made of his person and his disposition, he did no way flatter him, and that in all things Pharamond stood in need of all his merit to gain any advantage upon his Rival. Because he kept his Bed this day, the Queen sent to enquire of his health, from whom she understood that he was in such a condition that he might be able to walk abroad the next day. This she also understood from the King of Suedes, who came to visit her and enter'd the Chamber in a short while after her return: He was accompanied with the Prince of Persia, the King of the Alzins, the King of the Herules, and the Generous Martian. As in Age, unity of interests and other advantages, he excelled all others the lovers of Rosamond, so had he greatest liberty with her, which made him make a gentle complaint in behalf of the rest of her cruelty in concealing her self all the day long. When the Queen receiving it with a smile full of tenderness; It is not me, said she, that you ought to complain of, for it was the indisposition of my Sister that caus'd me to spend the day with her: For Albilinda (reply'd the King of the Suedes) at the sight of her was less important and less desired, she might keep her Chamber were she indispos'd: but it was not for her to purchase the satisfaction of your Company with the content of so many great Princes. And I am assur'd that she has created several discontented persons this day, by drawing a blame upon her self. She has less reason, reply'd the Queen, to stand in awe of those that earnestly covet'd her company, than of theirs that desire Amalazontha's or mine. But it is my hope that neither the one nor the other shall have any cause to complain, for we our selves see so much every day (concluding her speech with a kind of pentiveness) that I may easily be pardon'd this short retirement. It behoves them to be patient, reply'd the Prince of Persia, whom such misfortune seizes: But if an accusation were permitted, you would be in danger Madam of seeing your self expos'd to one: For it is a difficult thing for those persons whom your Company renders now so happy, to bear the loss thereof patiently. You have heretofore, smilingly reply'd the Queen, endur'd without falling into despair, a longer absence of a person for whom you had as great a kindness. I never brook'd it, reply'd the Prince, but with that trouble which confirms what I am about to say, such a torment of which I had never known the end, if I had not found it in others which are not less cruel, yet more dear to me than my life. From these, replied the Queen, you may still remove to others by an adventure of the like nature, and your heart shall find no more trouble in losing this second impression, if it be true that ever it received any, than it had to deface the former. As Athenais was not Rosamond, replied the Prince, and seeing there is not another Rosamond in the world, there is little hope that I should find for this latter passion, the remedy that cured the first. And I must add farther, Madam, that for the other I both desired and sought relief, but in this I cannot endure to admit any such thought. I will easily believe (said the King of the Alains) that your meeting with another beauty can never put away from your heart the lustre of the Queens. And you are right in your judgment, that there is none other in the world from whom you can expect redress, though if by the will of Heaven you could find one out, I should not undertake for your constancy: and if Balamir and your self had been guilty of inconstancy for any other beauty but that of the Queen, it would very much trouble me to understand it. "I find, said the King Godegefile, the inconstancy of Balamir far more excusable than that of the Prince of Persia, who after he had shed so many tears for the loss of Hunnimonda, and spent many years in immoderate mourning, I am of opinion, that he was no longer obliged to be faithful to the ashes of a person, that had before her death been taken from him, and married to his Brother, and that he had neither force nor reason to defend himself against the charms of Rosamond. "This, replied Martian, may be more truly urg'd on the behalf of the Prince of Persia, than of Balamir, since it is certain that Balamir had been entirely beloved by Hunnimonda, and that it was only by force and constraint that she was given to Mundisc, whereas Athenais of her own free will had preferred Theodosius before the Prince of Persia; and by bestowing her self wholly upon the Emperour of the East, had left Varanez neither liberty nor hope to see her again as long as he lived. "I confess, replied Ardaric, that reasons are not wanting as well for the one as the other, to excuse their inconstancy, but I wonder, that with their reasons they had the power; or at least, (said he, giving himself the check) I should wonder, if the power that caused it, were less known to me. "It satisfies me, said the Prince of Persia, that ye have found out this excuse; and I am apt to think, I stand in need of no better to shun a reproach which I so little fear. They had discoursed longer upon this subject, but they were interrupted by the Queen of the Turingiens, who enter'd the Chamber. A little after the two Queens supped together; for Albisinda kept her Chamber, as she had determined with Rosamond.

After Supper the Kings returned to communicate to them the design which they had for the convoys of provisions, which they fetch'd out of Countries where the terrour of their Arms drew contribution from the Inhabitants, for the sustenance of the Army, and to consult of other affairs, seeing the truce afforded them leisure; for which purpose, they held a council that lasted till it was time for the Queens to withdraw to their rest, and when they were retired, and that Amalazontha was gone to seek that repose in her Bed, which she had no hope to find, Rosamond remained some while behind in her Closet, expecting to hear some news of Albisinda; presently Imbergida enters, who came from the Princess to know of her in her ear, whether it were seasonable for Prince Viridomar to come and kiss her hand. The Queen courteously received the errand of Imbergida, and answering with a voice as low as the other had delivered it withal, This resolution of the Prince of Suevia, said she, is too far obliging, and he need not doubt, but that for his own merit, and the affection which I have for my Sister, I have a particular desire to see him; but 'tis at my Sister's Apartment where I intend to bear him company, and not here, whither he cannot come without being seen of too many persons, and put himself in danger of being discovered. With these words she sent Imbergida away to Albisinda, and a while after followed her self, and leaving her Attendants in the Princesses Chamber, she went into the Closet where Albisinda was with her Brother. At her entrance she appeared to the Prince, as if in the middle of the night the glorious lustre of day had darted its brightest Beams into the Room. No other brightness could have blasted his eyes with a lustre so surprising, hardly could they endure it; all the preparation which he had fortified himself withal, by having heard the wonders of this celestial Beauty related to him, could not defend him against that astonishment wherewith the eyes of Rosamond strook him, and which during some few moments, that his Faith was upon the point of shipwreck, seemed too great for him to believe, so that against a force so irresistible, it was not an easie thing for Polixena to keep her place in a heart that such a one had robbed her of. So that we may truly say, the Prince put his love upon the greatest tryal that temptation could ever have proved it by; and that he could never know the real worth and grandeur thereof, but by seeing it make so handsome a retreat out of so much danger. In brief, amidst all his astonishment and admiration, and something also more great than this astonishment or admiration could produce, duce, the heart of Viridomar remained fast in the fetters of Polixena; his affection continued faithful, though his eyes were dazzled, and his very Soul enchanted: he protested however, notwithstanding his first engagement, that he never saw any thing under Heaven that could parallel what he then beheld; and perhaps he made no question (if love may permit a liberty to this opinion) that if his heart had been attacked by these two powerful Assailants at the same time, but that she who at that time appeared before him, might have had the advantage over her that already triumph'd over his affection. If the heart of Viridomar were charmed at the sight of Rosamond, the Soul of the fair Queen found in it self that which never appeared there before, but for the sake of Balamir and Pharamond. By such an advantageous knowledge of his person, and that high character which his Renown gave of his merit, any other Soul but that of Rosamond, would in a short time have beheld with an inward feeling, and perhaps with grief enough lamented the robbery, which the charms of Polixena had committed, of a Prince so worthy her esteem; but the Soul of the fair Queen was of a more elevated order, and whether it were through the greatness of her resolution, or her just pre-engagement, she looked upon Viridomar with all his merit, without bearing the least envy to the Sister of Pharamond for having obtained so fair a conquest, and without being concerned with any other thoughts for him, than what she owed to his worth, and her affection for Albisinda, which she easily let the Princess understand, by that serenity she shewed in her countenance when she saluted the Prince; and all the while she assisted him in that disorder of his mind when astonishment tied his tongue, caressing him with a welcome the most favourable, and expressions the most obliging that might be; I know not, said she unto him, whether I am most obliged to you, or to my Sister, for that confidence you have in me in a place where you cannot appear to many persons; but to whomsoever I owe the debt, I do acknowledge the obligation as a favour, which I had many reasons to desire. And believe me, Sir, though you were not the Brother of my dear Sister, yet the reputation of Prince Viridomar's virtue, had been enough to make me covet the knowledge of so great a person. She accompanied these words with such a sweetness, as seemed to qualifie the glittering lustre of her Majesty, when the Prince quelling the passion that such a surprizing light had rais'd in his mind, though she her self were never to be taken unawares: Suffer me, Madam, said he, to make use of my first expressions, only to excuse the confusion of my thoughts, and to tell you, that my capacity will never serve me to observe the wonders that appear before my eyes, though they gave me full liberty to explain my self. I believe, (said the fair Queen, smiling withal) that you have your liberty entire, and without all controul, if you brought it so hither. But as we cannot blame you for having left it in a safe place, so you must not accuse us for making any attempt upon it. She pronounc'd these words with an aspect less serious than she was ordinarily accustomed to do, to remove all suspicion from the Prince, that she intended to give him the least cause of exception, who while he was studying for words to reply upon so pleasing a subject, the Princess his Sister preventing him with a behaviour more reserv'd than the Queens, You see Brother, said she, to what a height of honour you might have arrived, had fortune been more favourable. I know well, replied the Prince, that I was no way worthy of it, and if the Gods did not reserve her for themselves, they would be too unjust to appoint her unto any other than King Pharamond. I perceive, (replied the Queen blushing withal) that you speak like one in love with Polixena, and that passion without question shuts your eyes, that you cannot behold that which reason would present you, contrary to your opinion. I adore the Princess Polixena, replied the Prince of Suevia, and the respect which I bear to you will not suffer me to deny a truth, which I have declared to all the world: but it is not the love which I have for the Sister, that causes me to do this justice to the Brother; for although I am an enemy to Pharamond, yet I declare, that there is no person in the world that is more worthy of Rosamond. It will not be by such discourse as this, replied the Queen, that you will make your peace with your Father; you must change your opinion, if you ere intend to return into his favour. If I cannot recover it, replied the Prince, but at so high a price, I fear I shall remain eternally in disgrace; and I shall more readily endure it all my life, than suffer any change of an opinion so conformable to reason. This discourse causing some disorder in the Queens mind, she was willing to put an end to it, and therefore to change the subject of their converse, she testified to the Prince with an incomparable civility, the share which she took in Albisinda's joy for his return, her true content in the glory of his actions, and the desire she had to use her utmost endeavour to procure a peace with the King of Suevia. Viridomar received this testimony of her good will with all due respect, and made his answer in such words, as more and more confirm'd in the breast of the Queen the good opinion which she had of him.

After they had spent some time in such returns as these, the Queen finding it to be late, and that Albifinda had a long discourse to make with Viridomar: “I believe, said she, it is your intention to be gone before day; and therefore seeing you have but a small time to enjoy the company of my Sister, 'tis now time for me to retire, with this assurance, that you shall always find me ready to return into your company, and to endeavour with my Sister your quiet and satisfaction to the utmost. “As my satisfaction and good fortune, replied the Prince, depend for the most part upon persons to whom you are an enemy, I have no reason, Madam, to hope that you will contribute in kindness to me, or that you should put a force upon inclinations so contrary to my good fortune. “'Tis true, replied the Queen, that rationally our inclinations cannot be conformable to yours; but, (continuing her discourse, and with a smile beholding the Prince) my Sister knows, said she, that for her sake I can some times act beyond reason; and you need not doubt, but the esteem which I have for you will powerfully second the affection which I bear to my Sister. “It were a crime, replied the Prince, either for my Sister, or my self to abuse your goodness, but without requiring any signal proofs thereof from you, we may presume to tell you, there is a difference advances Pharamond above all his other Rivals. “That I may have taken notice of, replied the Cimbrian Queen, as well as you; however it is not greater in their merit, than it is in their fortune: and if it be difficult for me to love his Rivals with a merit less than his, it is no less forbidden me to love Pharamond with all the advantages he has above them. Concluding these expressions, she retired, giving them the liberty of entertaining one another according to their design.

When she was departed, the Prince, whom she would no more permit to attend her, than she did to visit her, remaining behind with the Princess his Sister, and sitting down by her in the same place where they had pass'd some part of the night before, he listened to the discourse that she had promised to make of her adventures, which she began from her first meeting with Marcomire, and the fight which he had in his own defence with Gondemar and the Burgundians, pursuing her discourse with a recital of the same things which Marcomire some days before had related to Pharamond, all which she knew, having been inform'd by Imbergida, after the departure of Marcomire and Gondemar, of every particular passage that she was ignorant of before. And though in this discourse she was willing to conceal some of those favourable thoughts which she had for the Brother of Pharamond, however, she let fall so much to make Viridomar understand, that they were far different from those which she had for Gondemar, or any of the rest. When she drew near to the end of her relation (in which she had spent the most part of the remaining night) laying her hand upon her cheek to cover the vermilion blushes, which the conclusion of her discourse had rais'd, and casting her eyes downward with some other marks of inward trouble, “I know not, my dear Brother, (said she to the Prince, who would not suffer her to call him by any other name) what opinion you have of that which has happened to me, in relation to the Brother of the King of the Franks, and of the frankness which I have used in declaring to you, what perhaps I ought not to have acknowledged concerning the passages of my life: on the one hand I have some reason to fear, that you have not so much mildness as to approve it, on the other side I feel my self somewhat assured, when I remember what you told me yesterday, being confident withal of the friendship which you have always had for me. Happen what will, I have told you the truth sincerely; and I hope (concluding her discourse with a smile) that you will be a Judge less rigorous to me, than the King would doubtless be, should he come to the knowledge of as much as I have related to you. “It may be, replied the Prince, that the hatred which the King bears to all the Family of Pharamond, might hinder him from being so favourable to you as we could desire; but if the immoderate passion which incessantly animates him to revenge, would but leave him reason enough to judge of things with justice, I do not believe you would have any cause to fear his severity, seeing you only suffered the presence of Marcomire while he was unknown, and would no longer endure his stay when you knew who he was. The most severe person in the world could have done no more, and seeing you did little less, (continuing his discourse with a smile) the merit of the French Prince, and the kindness you have for him, would easily excuse him before a Judge far more pitiless than Viridomar. I my self should have made that discourse, dear Sister, if I had not been in love with Polixena; but now joyning my interest with so many other considerations in your favour, you may believe, that instead of being an enemy to Marcomire, I shall be ready, next your self, to do him all the offices of kindness, which I may desire from him in my own behalf to his Sister, and that I look upon this opportunity to serve him, as occasioned by my good fortune. The hopes that he has thereof, which you have discovered to me, cannot but be very acceptable to me.

“And

“ And in performing those things which may assure him that his hopes were rational, I que“ stion not but in such a soul as his, my performance will find acknowledgment, and that “ he will plead for me with a reciprocal satisfaction both to his Sister and King Pharamond, “ I conjure you then, my most dear Sister, to make your interest so with Marcomire, that he may “ undertake for me with his Sister, as I shall endeavour for him with mine, and at the same “ time to lay a sure foundation of whatever you can desire, for the satisfaction of Marcomire
 “ and your self from a Brother whose intentions are real, and who is to reign King of Sue- “ via. I do not find that the present Conjunction affords us means to do that which is in “ our wishes: But we must wait for a season and favourable changes, which may probably “ happen to our conditions: In the mean time we will leave to the Gods and Love the ma“ nagement of our good fortune, and let us do one for another as opportunities offer them“ selves. In this manner spake Viridomar, and to these he added other words, which removed all doubt from the Princess of his good intention to favour the love of Marcomire, and that he resolved to desire his assistance in the pursuit of his own: Albifinda listened to him with a joy which she had no small trouble to dissemble, but yet concealed it as much as possibly she could: and when he had made an end of speaking; I will obey you, my most dear Brother, said she, in whatever you shall be pleased to command me, for beside that my inclination carries me to satisfy your just expectations, where I am not engaged by duty, I will never be afraid to execute the orders of a Brother who ought to be my King, if my condition change not sooner than his. After these words they had some others, yet without being able to come to any particular or determinate resolution, and therefore seeing the night was almost spent, and that it was high time for the Princess to repair to her rest, and for the Prince to retire, for fear of being surpris'd by the light, he took leave of the Princess, and went down the back Stairs as he had done the night before.

Going without a light, and groping his way in a place through which he had been conducted the night before by Imbergida, he met upon the Stairs not far from the Princess's Closet, a certain person, who having given him way at first to let him pass by, immediately followed him down stairs, and crossing along with him through a little Court which he was to pass to avoid the Guard, in a most fierce and valiant manner, he caught hold of Vi- ridomar's Arm. Ericlea, said he, What make you here in our Camp, and in the Closet of Al- bifinda? Viridomar who was afraid of being discovered, was strangely surpris'd at this accident, and his surpris'e not permitting him to make answer, the person that spake to him, resuming his parley; *Ab—*said he, this is too much, and that respect which has made me suffer hitherto without breaking into a flame, considering those advantages thou hast over me, must not always have the same predominancy. While he uttered his mind in this manner, the Prince of Suevia having some few minutes to reflect upon the suddenness of the accident, and withal having his memory full fraughted with the rehearsal which Albifinda had made of the adventures of Marcomire and Gondemar, of which he had not forgot the least important particular, he made no doubt but that the person who had put this force upon him, was Gon- demar himself: and not being able to withstand the conjecture wherewith the novelty of the rencounter had possessed him, with a low voice not to discover himself by his tongue;
I am certain, said he, thou art not Theodore, and it may be that I am not Ericleus, and there- fore whoever I am, do me the kindness to let me pass free. Without doubt, replied Gondemar, thou art Ericlea because thou knowest Theodora: Nor thou must not think of parting hence, without defending by thy valour that advantage which thy fortune has over me. With those words he laid his hand upon his Sword, and although the night were dark enough to hinder them from observing one anothers faces, yet was it not so dark to hinder the Prince of Suevia from observing his behaviour, nor from seeing him put himself in a posture before him, ready for an encounter. He was not naturally over-patient, and therefore being provoked by the sight of an Enemy prepared to attack him, though the reasons were very prevalent that made him fear a discovery; and though perhaps he was not sorry to act that for one of the Brothers of Polixena against Gondemar, which he had for another done already against Balmir, he would not stand to reason the wrong which he might do the reputation of Albifinda, by leaving the Prince of the Burgundians to his mistake, but disdain'g to counterfeit, he chose rather to open a passage with his Sword than by any other means, either prejudicial to his design, or less becoming his Courage. When Gondemar saw him in a posture to defend himself, he encountred him with an absolute Bravery: and as the passion that emboldned him made him more desirous of victory, than he would have been upon any other occasion, he had certainly carried away the conquest, had he not been to dispute with a person, whose courage as it is not inferior to his, hardly gave way to the most transcendent valour in the world. They made some blows at one another, which deser'd the light of day rather than a darkness that concealed the knowledge of their Bravery : And being they had no other weapons but their Swords, without Arms to stop the entrance of their points whereever they were directed, they drew blood one of another almost at the beginning of the Combat. No doubt the encounter had ended in some fatal event, if the clattering of their Swords had not caused some of the Souldiers that heard it, to make to that side followed immediately by a greater number : whereupon they thought it not convenient either for the one or the other, longer to continue their bloody heat. Viridomar found himself sufficiently perplexed what resolution to take, in case his Enemy should be obstinate : But Gondemar who was truly generous, and who for his virtue deserved perhaps a better destiny than he had in Albisinda's affection, prevented his thoughts so much the sooner, because he thought the danger would be greater for Marcomire than for any other of the Enemies : Marcomire, said he, we cannot finish our dispute, without exposing thy life and my honour to too great a hazard, we'll put an end to it another time with less inequality. And having said those words which strongly confirmed the good opinion that the Prince had of him, he hastned to the souldiers that were coming up to them, and commanding them to stop he gave Viridomar liberty to retire, and seek out Timanthus who stayed for him at some distance off with his horses. As soon as he was on horseback, he related to Timanthus with whom he entrusted all his concerns what had happened. And being naturally enclined to be just to merit, he forgot not to speak all he could to Gondemar's advantage, and testified his sorrow to see him engaged in a passion for which he ought to have been favourable to his Rival. But he put Timanthus into a strange affright, who soon perceived that he had received a wound upon his Thigh, from whence there issued an exceeding great quantity of blood. However, Haldan's quarters not being far off, they were not long ere they got thither : and by the care of Haldan the Prince was put to bed, where he had the opportunity to have his wound dressed, with all secrecy : which did not a little trouble him to see himself obliged to keep his bed for some days.

The next morning the news was spread through all the Camp, that Prince Gondemar had received a very great wound in the shoulder with a sword, and another slight hurt in his left hand, but no man knew by whose hand he had received them : only King Gondioch his Brother, from whom he kept nothing hid, and to whom he had related the adventure ; who thereupon believed that it was from Marcomire's hand that he had received his hurts : Yet was it not without great precaution, and the deep engagement of his promise that Gondemar discovered to him this secret. And although his soul was more cruelly wounded than his body, being pierced thorow with a disgust against Albisinda which did in some measure lessen the value which he had for her ; yet would he not expose her to any injuries which she might justly fear, either from the publick report of the world, or the severity of the King her Father. Gondioch had much ado to contain himself within the bounds of moderation upon this accident, and for that the violent hatred which his cruel jealousy had breathed into him against the King of the Franks, passed through the whole family, all the consideration he had for the prayers of a Brother most worthy his affection, was all little enough to keep him from breaking out, and publishing to the King of Sueden the small conformity there was between him and his Children. So soon as both the Queens were stirring, they heard the news : but they were only told that Gondemar had been wounded by an unknown person, whom he would have stopped as taking him for a Spy, whereupon in regard of his quality and merit which obliged all the world to honour him, they resolved to visit him so soon as they were dressed. Albisinda who besides the knowledge she had of Gondemar's love, was not so free as the Queens to make such visits, was not so easily perswaded : but the King her Father commanded her to accompany the Queens, telling them withal that he was resolved to attend them himself, together with the Prince of Persia and Prince Balamir, who began that very day to go abroad again, and was the more willing so to do, that he might visit Gondemar, though his friends and his Physicians press'd him all they could to the contrary. The fair Queen who admired him, though she testified an incredible joy for his recovery, yet blamed him for his rashness in venturing abroad. And with those words which she spake to him upon that subject with such a divine grace, she charmed both his eyes and soul. "You know, so she went on, that a life such a one as yours, is of that high price not to be neglected, and that many persons are concerned in its preservation, who are not to leave you at your liberty to make light of it as you do. Balamir blushed at those words either out of modesty or by reason of some particular thoughts, which such expressions flowing from such lips as those might inspire him withal : and taking hold of her words with a most respectful behaviour, If my life, said he, had so much worth for you to be but one moment concerned for it, I should then perhaps become more careful of it, than my honour permits me. But (concluding with a sigh) hitherto it has been so unfortunate, as not to dare to hope for so glorious a change. You need not doubt, replied the Queen, but that it is most dear and considerable to all those who know how to pay justice to merit. And I do not believe, (said she, beholding him with a most obliging smile) that hitherto you have found that I was ever deficient in the acknowledgment of yours. It is so high and so renowned through the world, added the fair Amalazontha, that no person can be ignorant thereof without doing an injury to themselves. And it has this advantage, concluded the charming Albifinda, that envy it self is forced to regard it. The modesty of Balamir had much ado to undergo the praises of the fairest lips in the world. And while he was studying for words, with a submission conformable to the respect he owed to the admirable Princesses, Varanez preventing him with a behaviour that shewed something of discontent, I confess, said he, the merit of Balamir well deserves all the praises you can heap upon him; but in my opinion, the honour which he receives this day, is above the desert of any man in the world. I easily accord with you in that, replied Balamir, and if there were no other dispute in the world but this, we should never have occasion to quarrel and fight one against another, as we do. We have other subjects of discourse enough, replied the Prince of Persia, to revive; and indeed it is a difficult thing for two persons as you and I, pretending to the same fortune, to continue long friends. I very much fear, replied the Prince of the Huns, that you and I pretend to no purpose; and though you are a Competitor justly to be feared, yet I would not desire to run the venture against any other person sooner than against your self. I do not know, (said Varanez, looking fiercely upon him) whether you would have so little to do as you imagine; and I hardly believe that there is any other person in the world that can put you to more trouble. I am apt to believe, replied Amalazontha, to hinder the further progress of that dispute, that you would find it a hard matter, both the one and the other; but since your quarrel is the same, methinks the effects of your valour ought not to prove fatal, but only to the common Enemy. Ah my dear Sister, (then said Albifinda to Amalazontha with a low voice, fearing to be over-heard by Rosamond that stood near her) methinks you abide far better than I, the common quarrel between us; but I do not so well know, whether you would preserve all your ill will for your Enemies, had you seen them as I have done. Since the misfortune which last happened to me, replied the Queen of the Turingiens, I dare not answer for my heart, as I was wont to do; and seeing it is only destiny, and not reason, that rules my fortune and my thoughts, I know not well, whether I could protect all my hatred against the greatness of merit; for I doubt not, but there is that merit in the world sufficient to vanquish the most just resentment I might have, and upon that occasion, Sister, you should find in my heart a more steadfast constancy perhaps than you imagine. Yes, dear Sister, (replied the Queen of the Cimbrians, beholding her with a languishing glance, which she turned immediately upon Albifinda) *you would remain constant, no doubt, in the just anger which you have towards your Enemies, nor would you know how to hate them too much, though perhaps Albifinda and I hate them not enough.*

After these words, and some other discourse which held for some time, this illustrious company repaired to King Gondioch's Quarters, (who with other Kings and great Princes were lodged in the Burrough) and presently enter'd the Chamber of Gondemar. The wounded Prince received so fair a visit with a deep respect; and he had look'd upon his wound as the greatest effect of his happiness, which was the cause that he then beheld in his Chamber the beautiful Princess whom he adored, if his mind had not been fill'd with imaginations, the absolute enemies of his repose, which representing to him the happiness of his Rival greater than indeed it was, spread through all his Soul the poison of a cruel jealousy, and furnish'd it with a resentment so great, that it durst dispute against his love. This vexation that possessed his mind, debarring him the liberty of discourse, hardly permitted him to find words to return thanks to the two Queens and the Princess, for the honour which they did him, and he acquitted himself with so much disturbance, as easily shewed the sedition of his mind, though he made not the cause apparent. The Princesses sat in the space between the Bed and the Wall, where they were informed of the condition of his health, though they understood more from Gondioch than from him; and when he spoke to them of his wounds, those looks, now more than usually enflamed, which he fix'd upon Albifinda, sufficiently manifested that his body was not so cruelly wounded as his Soul. However, at length he told them his adventure, not as in truth it was, but so as he would have them believe it, he also spoke in few words, as a person with whom it was not usual to tell an untruth. There might also possibly be persons in the company, to whom the truth was not necessary to be known: nor did they examine over strictly a personage of that quality, as Gondemar was, and one that bore the marks about him of what he said. Gondioch, who could not curb his impatience, nor dissemble the trouble which he had to conceal the truth, was retired to another part of the chamber with Martian, by whose removal Gondemar finding himself at more liberty to repeat the whole story, otherwise than he had already related it, perswaded the Queens and the rest of the company, as he had lately caused it to be spread abroad, that it was done by a person unknown, and that he would have apprehended him for a spie, that he was wounded, and that he could not hinder him from making his escape, though he designed it; all the company concluded the unknown person to have done a very bold act, and by all the circumstances they judged, that he could be none of the vulgar sort, when the Prince of Persia, in whose soul courageous actions found always a noble reception, undertaking the discourse, This unknown person, said he, whoever he be, wants not courage, and I am very much deceived, if he be not rather a Lover than a Spie, and that it was rather some amorous design, than to spie our Camp, that caused him to walk in the dark. Gondemar made no reply to the words of Varanez, which went to the very bottom of his heart; but he sigh'd and changed colour, and by that demeanour of his, had it been well observed, the company might well have judged, that his thoughts were agreeable to those of Varanez. But the beautiful Queen of the Cimbrians laying hold of the words; As there are not in the Camp, (said she to the Prince of Persia smiling) other Ladies than our selves and our Attendants, we are obliged to perswade you from this opinion, nor can you perhaps defend it without doing us an injury. And do you then believe, Madam, replied Varanez, that it is impossible for some of these Ladies to have certain Lovers in the Camp, and that among those there may not be one, that does not give himself to sleep all the night. There is most certainly, replied the famous Balamir, and I question not my self, but that there are more than one whose love affords them but little familiarity with slumber. But of those there are very few that could not know Prince Gondemar, and who would not have sooner made themselves known to him, than have ventured a combat with him. I have heard say, straight replied the fair Princess Albifinda, that they who are in love, are not wise at all times, and I am apt to believe, that the prejudice of being discovered, or hindered from his design, might make him lose some part of that consideration which at another time he might not want. I believe as you do, Madam, (replied Gondemar, beholding her with a sudden alteration, which might easily be observed) and perhaps some one in particular might have greater reasons for the prejudice of being discovered, than another. But if it be a Lover, (continuing his argument with a sigh) he is without doubt a happy Lover; and I envy him for that happiness more than for his success in the encounter. At these words Albifinda blush'd, though she could not precisely conjecture the meaning of Gondemar; for indeed she suspected, that the opinion which he had of Marcomire's good fortune, had made him utter these expressions, though she did not mistrust that Gondemar was possess'd that he had fought Marcomire; she did not therefore well know what answer to make, but the Queen of the Cimbrians who was privy to all her concerns, seeing her at a stand, was willing to help her out, and preventing what she was about to reply to Gondemar; I do not know, said she to the Prince, by what signs and tokens you judge this unknown person to be a happy Lover; if it be because you met him at such an hour, when it is very probable none but Lovers are admitted to see their Mistresses, the same conjecture may be made of your good fortune, seeing it was at the same hour that he met with you. And we know well, (so she concluded with a smile) that it is not to spie that you take your walks about the Camp. Gondemar blush'd at this discourse of the Queen, and after he had made a stop for some few minutes, to study out words rather conformable to the respect and value which he always had for Albifinda, than to the passion which then disturb'd him: As for me, said he to the Queen, it may be truly said, that I awake to my mischief, when others awake for their advantage; but since this was not the first day that I have met misfortunes, I confess, (said he, sighing forth the last words) that I never believ'd it to have been so great as I find it at this time. Speaking these words, he cast his eyes upon Albifinda in so passionate a manner, that notwithstanding the force which he put upon himself not to discover his thoughts, he was in danger to have disclosed a very great share of what was in his breast, if Gondioch, before whom he was unwilling to proceed in his discourse, had not presented himself to the company, together with Martian and Briomer, in whom the King had a very great confidence, and for whom the implacable hatred he bore the King of France, rather than any other reason cherisht a very high esteem. In a short while after, this illustrious company retired to the Castle, all but Eriomer, whom the King of the Burgundians detained to dine with him.

The heart of Gondioch was swelled with anger and discontent, but though for nearness of blood, and the consideration of his merit, he dearly loved his Brother, yet was he not so much griev'd for his being wounded, as out of despite for the advantage which the House of Pharamond had over his. And as he laboured without intermission under that cruel jealousie, lousie, that had kindled so much hatred in his mind against the King of France, so he could not endure without a violent disgust, that the Brother of Pharamond should be preferr'd before his, in the breast of Albifinda, the Sister of Vindimir, and once appointed to have been espoused to Theobald, which gave him that freedom, that he was permitted to visit her by night in the Enemies Camp; the passion, that for this reason enraged him, possibly appeared in his countenance, and in his discourse: and though he curbed it before the Queens, the Princess of Suevia, and the Princes who had born them company; after their departure, finding himself at liberty with Briomer, whose thoughts and inclinations he knew to be conformable to his own, he the less cared to dissemble his displeasure. And in conclusion, walking with him alone in a chamber distant from Gondemar's, he discovered to Briomer so much of his discontent, that the Cimbrian could not forbear, not without an eager vehemency; to demand the cause of his heat, and that in so passionate a manner, that the Burgundian King forgetting the promises that he had made to Gondemar, whether it were to pacifie his anger, by committing it to the breast of a person in whom he had so great an interest, or which was more true, out of a design to revenge himself upon Albifinda, against whom he was strangely exasperated, he discovered to him not only what thoughts Gondemar and he had had of the last encounter, but whatever else he knew of the concerns of Albifinda with Marcomire and Gondemar, just as he had been told them by his Brother, who concealed nothing from him. The provoked Briomer found the hatred which implacably incensed him against the House of France, augmented by this discourse; and reflecting upon all the actions of Albifinda that could increase any suspicion in his thoughts as well what happened at Egitina, where he seized and detained Marcomire, as what she had afterwards done at Marobinda, as also at other times, when she lost no opportunity to witness her disrespect towards him: he did not only not doubt of the truth of what Gondioch perswaded him to her disadvantage, but he became so violently enraged against her, that the was very near as hateful to him as the worst of those Enemies against whom he was so cruelly provoked; and as that immoderate passion which had blinded him, had benumm'd in his Soul all the motions of virtue, and shut his eyes against all other thoughts, but those of revenge, he took an immediate resolution to wreck his malice upon Albifinda, by whom he conceived himself injured, and not to lose so fair an occasion to plague the Brother of Pharamond. He would not tell Gondioch what design he had, for fear he should perswade him from it (though he could not forbear to express his madness in words full of fury) but a little while after he had taken his leave of King Gondioch, he went to seek out the King of Suevia, to tell him what crimes his Daughter had committed, of which the greatest was, that she cherish'd that affection which the Sister of Vindimir ought not to have for the Brother of Pharamond.

After the two Queens and the Princess had dined in Amalazontba's Apartment, and after some few hours of discourse together, Rosamond for the dispatch of business retired to her Closet, and Albifinda returned to her Chamber, where she found Haldan attending her coming. As he was the person amongst all the Suevians most considerable for his Birth, and for his merit, she always received him courteously, but then looking upon him as the confident of Viridomar, and as one that exposed himself to all the anger of the King for the service of the Prince, she treated him after a more liberal manner than she was accustomed to do, and in most obliging terms signified to him what thoughts of acknowledgment the Prince had for him. Haldan hearkened to her discourse with a very great respect, and when she had done speaking, he informed her of the occasion that brought him thither, telling her that he was sent by the Prince her Brother, to let her know of his wound, and of the encounter which he had with Gondemar. Albifinda was troubled at first to hear of the Prince's being wounded, but was soon pacified, upon the assurance which she received, that the wound was but slight, and consequently not dangerous; but other particulars gave her suspicion enough of the Alarm, at the news of this encounter; and therefore causing Haldan to repeat what the two Princes said one to the other, whence Gondemar gathered his reasons to take Viridomar for Marcomire, she foresaw a great part of those miseries which this mistake might draw upon her; nor could she forbear to tell Haldan with her wonted sweetness, that the Prince ought not, but upon a very urgent necessity, to have exposed himself to so great a danger: and that (besides that she stood in fear of the King's severity) her reputation was mainly concern'd in this encounter, and committed to the discretion of a person, that upon any distaste, how apparently soever unjust, might hazard the greatest part thereof. After that, she reflected upon the words that Gondemar had spoken the same day, which she found agreeable to the opinion he had of Marcomire's good fortune, and weighing the whole proceeding with that justice which it behoved her to pay him, she could not choose but have an infinite respect for Gondemar, and esteem him a Prince worthy of a better fortune than he could expect in serving a person whose heart was already engaged. These thoughts ran in her mind just as she saw the King her Father entering into her Chamber; but she no sooner cast her eyes upon his countenance, when she beheld the cruel symptoms of those evils which she feared. In brief, his countenance was entirely chang'd, and his eyes sparkled with anger in such a terrible manner, that the Princess naturally timorous, at first sight lost all her courage, and with a fear that made her grow pale, expected the storm that was about to pour it self down upon her head. But if the Lightning astonish'd her, the Thunder which followed strook her into a mortal terrour; for the enraged King, after he had pronounc'd part of what she feared, I come hither, said he, expecting news answerable to my repose, to the honour of my House, and to the grief which I endure through the weakness and remissness of a Brother, but for my sweet consolation I understand the infamy of the Sister. It was not enough for the treacherous Viridomar to forsake my interest, and his own duty, in loving the Sister of Pharamond, but the miserable Albisinda too, through the displeasure of Heaven, must love the Brother of him that murdered Vindimir, love him so too, as to forget what she owed to her honour; keeping him by her disguised in a woman's dress, and giving him entrance by night into her Chamber within our Camp. The poor Princess was so far troubled, or rather amazed at these words, that she seem'd in the eyes of the King as one half dead: and although she knew her self accused of a crime which she had in no wise committed, and that in truth her innocence ought to have embolden'd her; yet she had so far lost her resolution, that she could not so much as open her lips to justify her self, or lift up her eyes to look upon the countenance of the outrageous King. The tears which soon after dropp'd from her eyes might have touch'd, and perhaps have mollified any other heart but that of the King of Suevia; but those tears, and the silence of the comfortless Princess condemn'd her, instead of doing her justice; for the King taking the crime for confessed, which she had not power to deny, grew more furious than before, scarcely containing himself from those aggravations of anger that are wont to hurry men into extremities of violence: How, said he, poor spirited and dishonourable Princess, thinkest thou with a few tears to wash away the ignominy of a crime which all thy blood cannot wash off? Or that these marks of confusion can suffice to repair thy offence? Let not those proofs of my paternal affection which thou hast hitherto received, abuse thee, I will find a way to combat nature, rather than be unjust to my honour. And since the Gods, in taking from me Vindimir, have left me none but children unworthy of their parentage, I will overcome whatever their blood or birth can plead in their behalf; and instead of an indulgent Father, they shall find me an angered King, that knows how to punish their perfidiousness. To these he added other words, which his passion caused him to utter disorderly; or rather such reproaches, such bloody injuries, that the afflicted Princess trembled to hear, having reason to fear all that might possibly be expected from a severity which she was never acquainted with before. At length she endeavoured to unlock a silence which rendred her guilty of offences which she had never committed; and while the King walking to and fro in the chamber, cast his eyes upon her every foot in a pelting fury, she recovering her speech with a boldness more than natural, Sir, said she, I confess that I am very unfortunate, but assuredly I am not so guilty as you are persuaded to believe, and they that have incensed you against me, telling you that the Brother of Pharamond, and the Brother of Gondioch were concealed in a disguise at Lisurgis among our women, might have better inform'd you, that I was altogether ignorant of their folly; and that I suffered neither the one nor the other to tarry one minute after I came to the knowledge of it. Sir, this is a truth which shall be justified by the Queen of the Cimbrians, and by my accusers themselves; and whereas you tax me for having seen the Brother of Pharamond since that, in my chamber; Sir, I do affirm that I have deserv'd no such scandal; and that neither by night, nor by day, neither here, nor in any other place of the world has Marcomire appeared in my sight, since the day that Gondemar brought him to my knowledge. How! wretched creature! (replied the King, casting a terrible frown upon her) did not you see Marcomire last night in your Chamber? And did he not come out of your Chamber when Gondemar met and fought him? I know not, replied the Princess, with whom Gondemar fought; but certain it is, that Marcomire neither came to me, nor do I know of any such intention he had. I would lose half my blood, replied the King, that what thou sayest were true; but thou knowest too well the contrary, and thy crime is too apparent for my honour and thy repose: do not believe that I will let it pass unpunished, nor ever look upon me as a Father, since thou hast unworthily forgot that thou wert my Daughter, and that thou wert the Sister of Vindimir. Perhaps I may give an example to let the world know how little I connive at the lewdness of my children, when I once take up my resolution: And then looking with a severe countenance upon her at the conclu- sion of his speech) Wait here, said he, in your Chamber my further orders, which will be for your confinement. Having spoke those words, he was just going out when the Queen of the Cimbrians advertised of what had fallen out, entred the Chamber, and presently after her the fair Queen of the Turingiens. At the sight of the two Queens, the King of Suevia endeavoured to conceal some part of his fury, but it was impossible to hide what appeared so evidently in his eyes, and in every part of his countenance. Nor had he any great intention to make a secret of the affair, and therefore addressling himself to Queen Rosalinda, as the most interested person in the misfortune of Albifinda; "You come Madam, said he, in a very good time to reproach a Princess, who has made her self unworthy of your friendship, and of the name of Sister which you have always been pleased to allow her. Possibly ere this you have understood her crimes, and surely you have a fence thereof answerable to your birth, not to go about to excuse her: "True it is, (replied the charming Queen, beholding him with a Majesty to which all his Anger durst not forbid him to give a deep respect) I do not willingly nor easily allow of crimes, but it is withal more true that I do not at all suspect my Sister, at least from the time that we have had a mutual affection ore for another, she not having done any Action, and as I believe not having thought a thought, to which I was not private, and therefore she has committed no crime of which I must not be equally guilty. How Madam (replied the King, casting a furious look upon her?) You know that in the disguise of a woman, she kept concealed in her Company the Brother of Pharamond. I knew it without doubt, replied the Queen, the same day that she had knowledge of it: But I know withal, that neither the Brother of Pharamond nor the Brother of Gondioch were known to her, till that very minute that they were forced to depart: And if Pharamond or Gondioch by a wile like that of their Brothers, should have remained with me as their Brothers stayed with my Sister Albifinda, yet should I not think my innocency ere the more wronged for that. Madam (said the King of Suevia) I know not whether the King your Father would have been of the same judgment as you are, in a case of the same nature: But though you excuse Albifinda, as to the disguise of Marcomire. I verily believe Madam you cannot approve the visit which she condescended to receive, last night in her Chamber. I spent the greatest part of the night with my Sister, replied Rosalinda, nor did she entertain any visit in which I had not a share: but this I am well assured of, that neither she nor I saw any Marcomire there. Gondemar, replied the King, saw him go forth of her Chamber, and besides that he is a Prince that may be believed, he carries sufficient marks of the encounter, that leaves us no reason to doubt of the truth. Without doubt Gondemar was deceived, replied the Queen, and when occasion serves I shall make it so manifestly appear, as not to leave you the least imagination of a suspicion, injurious to the discretion of Albifinda. I desire it were so but I have little reason to hope it, answered he with fury enough, However Madam, you must give me leave to let them who fight on our side know, that I do not at all approve the lewdness of my Children, and that blood and natural affection prevail less over me than duty. And concluding these words, he left the Chamber with a countenance that might give Albifinda to understand, how little he was convinc'd of her innocence.

But the two Queens tarryed with her, unwilling to forsake her at such a time, when there could be nothing more dear to her than their Company, and the consolation which they were able to afford her. To this purpose they drew near to her, and ere they began to speak by their endearments they let her know, how apprehensive they were of her grief: But for that Amalazontha was ignorant of what had happened, nor knew any thing of Marcomire's love or the Adventure of Viridomar, the most charming Queen and the fair Princess, though they would not discover any thing, of what opinion they had either for Pharamond or Marcomire, did not however think there was the same necessity to conceal from her Marcomire's disguise, or the visits which Viridomar had paid to Albifinda. And therefore after the Queen of the Cimbrians had briefly related that which had happened between the Princess and the two Princes in disguise, without making known however her particular thoughts for Marcomire; she was not curious at all, but told her the whole truth of the private coming of the Prince of the Suedes into their Camp, of his visits to Albifinda, and of his encounter which Gondemar, according to the account which Haldan had been sent to give by order of the Prince, not doubting but she would faithfully preserve all secret. And when they had fully instructed her in what was convenient for her to know, to the end she might the better understand Albifinda's condition, they fell into discourse upon the particulars of her misfortune, and the best resolution they had to take in order to her justification.

As to what appeared most criminal in her carriage, she questioned not but that it might be done, by letting the King understand the truth of the last adventure: to which Amalazontha added, that the Prince her brother could not for shame desire that to preserve him from a danger, which did no way threaten his life, she should expose her own to the fury of the King's

King's indignation, and her reputation to the publick discourse of men. And therefore she advised her to let the King know the truth, having first ordered the Prince to go farther off. Rosamond thought Amalazontha's counsel to be very sound, so that the Prince had timely notice to remove himself from their Camp, before the King understood of his being there. And she made no question but all the reasons which he could give for his stay, unlets his wound detained him, would be less considerable to him than the honour and safety of Albifinda. But the Princess believed her self obliged to proceed the most cautiously that might be for the interest of her brother: And though she feared her Father's displeasure beyond death, and the disgrace that a report so scandalous might bring upon her Reputation, she could not yield to any other resolution, than that of acting according to the orders of the Prince, who it was most probable would soon ridd her of the trouble which she endured, when he had once the knowledge of it, which she doubted not but he would quickly learn from Haldan, who went away with the King after he had been an ear-witness of all that pass'd. Then it was that Albifinda began to repent of the good opinion which she had had for Gondemar, not questioning but he was the cause of all her misfortune. And if till that time, she had had a value for him as he truly merited, she found his succeeding actions so far from being answerable to his plausible beginnings, that notwithstanding the mildness of her disposition, she found her self very much displeas'd with him: She conceal'd it however more than any ill will that ever she had: And instead of shewing her self outrageous, she mildly complain'd thereof to Rosamond: and gave her to understand that the injury which she had received from Gondemar, should serve to cure her of that sorrow which she had, to think she should be the cause of making him unhappy, at a time when she believed his merit deserved a better fortune.

Yet was it not without some injustice that she was provok'd against him; for that poor Prince, who was no otherwise guilty than by the confidence which he had in the King his Brother's secrecy, to which he had oblig'd him by all the protestations imaginable, no sooner understood this unfortunate accident, by the report which the anger of the King and the indiscretion or rather malice of Briomer had nois'd abroad through the whole Camp, but he was seiz'd with a grief the most violent that his heart was capable to receive; so that all the force of his courage and his reason, could not keep him in his bed, nor in the bounds of a passion that might have well enough justify'd him. As he knew it was only to Gondioch that he had discover'd the truth of his adventure, and the thoughts which he had of the happiness of Marcomire, it was only him that he accus'd, and he complain'd thereof to him with all the dissatisfaction, that it was convenient for him to testify toward his elder Brother and his King. He resolv'd to rise notwithstanding his wounds, to prostrate his Innocence at Albifinda's feet: nor had his friends that oppos'd his intention, dissuad'd him with all the reasons which they alledged, if King Gondioch whom they had acquainted with his design, had not enter'd the Chamber. Upon the sight of him the dissatisfaction of the Prince increas'd and beginning to speak with a behaviour that sufficiently testified his grief; Ab Sir, said he, by what action or fault of mine have I thus disobliged you, that you should so cruelly hasten my death, or if my life were a burthen to you, why did you not deprive me of it by so many ways as you have to execute your will, without involving in my misfortune a Princess whom I adore, and one who never yet offended you. To these words he added many more which the disturbance of his mind made him utter abruptly, and without any Coherence: whereby he gave Gondioch to understand, that by the ill offices which he had done him, he had plung'd him into a danger far greater than that, to which any wounds had they been far more dangerous than those which made him keep his bed, could have expos'd him. Gondioch who entirely lov'd him, and who infinitely esteem'd him for his great services, saw with no small sorrow what he himself had been the cause of, and hearkn'd to his complaints with much patience, not being willing to oppose such a torrent of words that he was not able to stop, and which a violent passion mov'd him to utter. But when he had done speaking, and at the conclusion of his complaints had let fall some tears, that more express'd his grief than all his words; Wherefore Brother, said he, appear you so afflicted, or rather so overwhelmed with despair for a person that so ungratefully prefers before you the Brother of Pharamond, and who gives your Rival admission into her Chamber by night, while you unprofitably languish for her? Marcomire, reply'd the Prince, might possibly come to visit Albifinda without being invited, or that the Princess ever consented thereto: And though my Rival may be more happy or more in her favour than my self, it is not for me therefore to ruine the peace and reputation of a Princess whom I adore, by committing a treachery so abominable. "Neither you nor I (reply'd the King of the Burgundians) have done any thing so unworthy: And though I have little reason to have any kindness for one that is contented to see the murderer of her Brother triumph over her Family : Yet the value I have for you and the respect I bear to her Sex, have withheld me from revenging my self upon her, by exposing her reputation to the censure of men, and her repose to the indignation of a Father. But Brother I have mistaken as you your self have been mistaken, for if you committed a fault in trusting me with a secret, I committed another in discovering it to one whom I thought worthy of the trust, as well for the interest he has in our party, as for the implacable hatred which he bears to our Rivals and our Enemies. At another time perhaps I should have been less sensible of the grief which you express, and I should have advised you to make use of your Courage to forget a person that despises you. But by the proof which I find in my self of a weakness equal to yours, I can neither blame in you that which I feel too well in my self, nor give you counsel in your passion, who am not able to follow any in relation to my own. I shall therefore only content my self to tell you, that as I was the cause of all this mischief, through the confidence which I reposed in Briomer, so I am resolved to suffer all the punishment, and to justify you by accusing my self before Albisinda. Having spoken these words and many others which he added, with an intent to try if he could settle the mind of the Prince, he departed out of the Chamber, and immediately hastening to the Castle he went directly to Albisinda's Apartment, and entered in while the two Queens were with her. Rosamond and Albisinda received him faintly enough : for besides that the Princess began to be of the Queens opinion never to love Gondemar more, she made no scruple to let Gondiob know how much she was offended at his Brother for his folly, nor could she frame her self to give him any thing of a kind reception. Gondiob perceived it, and easily divining the reason, " I see well Madam, (said he addressing himself particularly to the Princess of Suevia) that you look upon me as the Brother of an offender, whom you judge to have deserved your anger, but you will be more just when you shall find me my self to be the criminal; and indeed for the respect I owe to truth, I am obliged to let you understand that I am the person guilty, and that Gondemar is altogether innocent : And therefore be pleased not to suspect him in the least, for having told your Father the smallest tittle of what has incensed his anger against you. Whatever cause he might probably have to complain of your disdain, he would have suffered death sooner than have exposed himself to the least hazard of your displeasure, and that if he has committed any fault, it was only in trusting a Brother that loves him dearly, and from whom it was impossible for him to keep himself reserved, as one that expected from my assistance one part of his good fortune. I confess I have made an ill use of the secret which he entrusted me with, though he recommended it to me with a passion that ought to have instructed me, how much dearer it was to him than his life. And though with a good intention, I did ill to discover it to Briomer, whom I looked upon as the most zealous for the interests of those that fight on our behalfs, and who possibly transported with this heat, and a zeal altogether as imprudent discovered it to the King your Father. He neither did it by my advice nor by my persuasion, and beside the real sorrow which I bring for my fault, I come Madam to make this protestation, that Gondemar's affliction is no less, rather so tormenting that he can hope for nothing but death, if you continue to doubt his innocency. Thus spake Gondiob, when the fair Princess (whose displeasure had encreas'd her courage, and whose resolution gather'd strength during his discourse, looking fiercely upon him after he had done speaking ; " As I have not been accustomed, said she, to receive any kindnesses either from you or from Gondemar, so do I neither admire at that you come now to offer. But as ye are Princes born, and that among personages of such high quality, honour and virtue rarely suffer under untruth and calumny, I was apt to believe that you might have been content to have told my Father only the real truth, how far I was concerned in Gondemar's adventures, without assailing my reputation with a scandal, and accusing me to have entertained Marcomire in my Chamber. " I have told you already, replied the Burgundian King, that if Briomer had followed my directions, he had not spoken to the King either of Gondemar or Marcomire : But there was more of imprudence in his acting, than there was either of deceit or slander. Nor had Gondemar taken the person whom he encountered for Marcomire, if the marks and tokens which he gave him, had not seem'd so clear, that he could not doubt the truth thereof. " I shall acquit my self of that accusation when I see my time, resolutely replied the Princess. But as it is not before you that I am to make this justification, so I look upon it as time enough for you to find your error, when it shall be publickly known, especially since it so little concerns you : " If Briomer, said the Queen of the Cimbrians, were not more considerable by the recommendation of the King my Father, and for the fidelity which he hath preserved for his memory, and the memory of the Prince my Brother, than for his own merit and services; I would make him suffer a punishment

“proportionable to the greatness of his offence, for it is not for my Subjects to wrong my Sister; and as high as he is, I shall let him understand the provocation he has given me, in such a manner, that perhaps he may not forget it as long as he lives. “Most dear Sister, “replied Albisinda, be not offended against a person whose intentions were good, however the effects thereof were not answerable; and give me leave only to think for my own consolation, that Gondioch knew not where to find a better Confident than Briomer, nor more suitable to his disposition. “You may judge of Briomer and me what you please, “replied Gondioch, and I am willing that we should both be exposed to the punishment of your displeasure, provided that Gondemar were exempted from bearing any share. I verily believe, dear Sister, said the Queen of the Turingiens, that Gondemar is altogether innocent of the trouble which you suffer. And indeed there is little likelihood, that a person who adores you, and in whom we know there is a great deal of virtue, would have any way contributed to such an injury as this which they have done you. “I am of your opinion, answered “Queen Rosamond, and since that King Gondioch will have it so, I will sooner accuse him and Briomer than Prince Gondemar. “I know well, said Gondioch, that you are not at all prepossessed for my advantage, and that to day is not the first time that I have found my self unhappy for that reason; at another time I might desire you not to condemn me so readily; but now I am content to be accused of the fault which I have committed, and which I come on purpose to confess.

They were at these disputes, when one of the Princess's Attendants coming into the Chamber, brought news that there was an Officer come to seize Imbergida, by order from the King, and that she was guarded so strictly, that no person could be permitted to see her: Albisinda grew pale when she heard the news, though she knew her innocent of the accusation which they had laid upon her, of having introduced Marcomire into her Chamber, fearing least it should be for what had happened at Lisurgis, upon the Prince's remaining there in disguise. The two Queens were very much troubled, especially the Queen of the Cimbrians, and the so much the more, because she was not at liberty to follow her own inclinations, and to declare her self so resolutely for her Friend, as she could have done upon another occasion, where there was no mention to be made of the Brother of Pharamond. However, she resolved to defend her to the utmost of her power, observing all necessary moderation; nay, rather than to quit her to the severity of her Father, if it came to the push, to lay aside all other considerations. Amalazontha took the same resolution. And Gondioch quite ashamed to see himself the cause of so much mischief, offered himself to seek out all the remedy he could, and departing from the Princess's Chamber, went to seek the King of Suevia, with an intention to trye if he could appease him.

While these things happened in the Castle, and that the King of Suevia had left it, Haldan returned to Prince Viridomar, and had acquainted him with the evil effect which his visit by night, and his encounter with Gondemar had produced to his Sister. Viridomar was much troubled at the news, and to shew that he took no small part of his Sister's sorrow upon him, he sorely repented himself, that he had taken no care to avoid the Combat. As he knew the humour of his Father, so he feared his severity towards Albisinda, well knowing it was no small portion of his rigour which she was to undergo, if he remained still in that persuasion, that she had been visited in the night by Marcomire: nor did he less consider the reputation than the repose of his Sister; and withal, that the report which was spread through the whole Camp, and which was likely to flie a great deal farther, was sufficiently important to require a clear and publick justification. He was a long time silent, pondering upon some better way to disentangle himself out of this perplexity, than at present he had in his thoughts, when at the very same instant Timanthus entering his Chamber, brought him word that Imbergida was seized, and that the King sought out with great diligence for all those persons whom he understood had kept any correspondence with the Princess. This news causing him to hasten his resolution, he turn'd himself towards Haldan, and beholding him with a brow that denoted his intentions, I confess, Cousin, said he, I have done an action becoming a young man, not in fighting with Gondemar, for that was a difficult thing for me to avoid, but in speaking such words to him as might cause him to suspect me for Marcomire; this accident disorders all my thoughts. But it behoves me to endure this bad event of my evil fortune, and to repair the error which I committed, by that one only way that is left me, which is to present my self before the King, and let him, the Camp, and all the world know, that it was only I that gave her a visit by night. O Sir, said Haldan, what a strange resolution is that? 'Tis the only resolution I can take, replied the Prince, and it is fitting that I should suffer the punishment of my ill management. “Know you not the humour of the King better? (replied Haldan.) And have you forgot how terrible he is, when “he

“ he is angry ? “ The King will not put me to death, replied the Prince, yet though my life was in danger, I would sooner expose it, than leave my Sister under that necessity, where my imprudence has thrown her. “ But Sir, replied Haldan, the King will no more put the Princess to death, than your self; and perhaps he may not use her so severely as you have reason to fear. “ He may do injuries, replied Viridomar, less supportable than death, seeing therefore that she is certain of the King’s displeasure, you need not question but the loss of her Honour will be more considerable than that of her life. “ But, Sir, replied Prince Haldan, you may acquaint the King with the truth, without going your self in person to tell it him; you may write to him, and then withdraw your self; or you may send me on your behalf, and I shall tell him the whole truth, if you please to appoint me. “ I may in so doing, replied the Prince, expose you to a greater danger, than you are well aware of, besides the hazard, that your relation may not work the effect which we desire, should the King, (who is easily prepossessed, but not so easily convinced, as you well know) not give credit to your words: and as for a Letter, it may probably, ’tis true, satisfy the King, through the knowledge that he has of my hand, and so in part justify her as to his satisfaction; but that will not serve to justify her before all the world, which is absolutely necessary; and the King, whom my private concealing my self in the Camp, will but the more incense against me, will sooner make use of my Letter to find out the secret correspondence which is between my Sister and my self, and pick from thence new matter of jealousy, which will but the more enflame his anger against us rather than to understand the truth to her advantage: it remains then that I declare it my self to all the world. And it is of so great moment to the reputation of a Princess, of whom the world speaks at present suspiciously, that there shall not be the least doubt of a truth, which I am able to clear, and wherein I ought by no means to shew my self wavering and uncertain. “ But, Sir, said Haldan, you are wounded, and though your wound be not very dangerous, yet it is not so slight, as to be altogether neglected. “ My wound, replied the Prince, can do me no injury, though I were to undertake a longer journey. Much less can it hinder me from paying my duty to the King; besides, that it may serve to justify the truth of the encounter, if the King and Gondemar themselves should question it. The Prince laid down some other arguments, by which he let Haldan and Timanthus understand, that they laboured in vain to dissuade him from his resolution. And though the necessity which constrain’d him, made him sigh, and though he foresaw the mischiefs that would follow, he called for his cloaths, and making himself ready in haste, he presently took Horse, with only Timanthus and another Esquire to attend him; not being willing by any means to let Haldan follow him, for fear of the King’s displeasure; and forbidding him expressly to let any person living know, that he was gone from his Quarters. To which purpose he disguised himself when he went forth, but as soon as he was gone out of sight he took no farther care; and for that he had only his Sword by his side, having no Arms on to hide his face, he was no sooner come into the Quarters of the Suevians, which he was forced to pass through, but the Shouts of the Soldiers and Officers began to pierce the Sky. And though he rode on without making any stop, excusing himself to them that met him in few words, by reason of his urgent affairs with the King, yet the very noise of his return running from one to another, caused the Suevians to flock together in great numbers, which encreasing every moment, they followed him to the King’s Pavilion, causing his name to resound from every part, though he endeavoured all he could to hinder them.

When he came into the presence of the King of the Suevians, he found with him Balamir, Gondioch and Ardaric, who all endeavoured to appease his wrath towards the Princess. The provoked King, though he strove with himself to pay all that was due to their Dignity, yet was he nothing moved with all their discourse. But breathing out grief and rage both at the same time, he walked about the Room, taking large steps, in a most outrageous passion, when on a sudden he heard the name of Viridomar upon the Stairs, from the mouths of several persons that made way for him; upon which, turning his head towards the door, he saw him enter, with such a grace, as attracted the eyes of all that beheld him. He began to doubt the truth of what he saw at first, and retreating back some few steps, as it were to satisfy himself, being troubled, not that he could not so suddenly recall to his memory the face of a feature, which a longer absence could not have made him forget, but to find out the reason that should bring him thither, at a time when he had more cause to flee from his anger to the very end of the world. While these thoughts busied his mind, and his astonishment kept him silent, the Prince made his obeisance, with a submission due to him, both as his Father, and as his Sovereign; and taking his time to speak, while his Father's silence gave him liberty; Sir, said he, the fear of your displeasure made me conceal my self till now: and although I am not faulty otherwise than by the constraint of a power which I am not able to controul, yet I durst not appear before my King, and my incens'd Father. I have sought all ways to appease your wrath, and I had some hopes the prayers of my Sister might have prevailed in my behalf; Sir, I have given her some visits, and fearing to be known, I never visited her but by night; these visits, though innocent, have produced a mischievous effect; and by the encounter which I had with a person the last night, who would have laid hands upon me, and thereby forced me either to defend my self, or make my self known, I am taken for Marcomire; and Albitinda is accus'd to have entertained him in her Chamber by night. Sir, this misfortune has fallen too heavy upon the reputation of Albitinda and your Family, for me to continue any longer the design which I had to conceal my self, till your anger were appeas'd: and this mistake is of so great importance, to give advantage to any persons about you, to have an ill opinion of Albitinda's virtue. I have understood from her own lips the cheat which the Brothers of Pharamond and Gondioch put upon her; and I have found too much innocency in her proceedings, that she should confess any thing more to your self, than she has done to me. The knowledge which I had of that adventure caus'd me to speak these words to Gondermar, which made him take me for Marcomire. And if the wound which he has given me, be not a sufficient mark of our Encounter, I am able to tell him other particulars enough that shall convince him, beyond all doubt, of the truth. Thus spake Viridomar, and more he had said, if the King, who till then had hearkened with patience enough, out of hopes that he should have found him ere this, repenting of what had been past, and submitting to a promise of amendment, had not interrupted him in a very choleric posture, which he could by no means refrain: How, (said he, looking upon him with an eye enflam'd with anger) dost thou then return to me upon no other account than to justify Albitinda? And because that she loves the Brother, as thou lovest the Sister of Pharamond, does this conformity of your inclinations bind you to an interest opposite to that of your King, your Birth and Honour? You approve, you support the same, and you perhaps have infused this treachery into her, of which thou thy self hast shew'd her the shameful precedent. And whether it be that thou tellest me the truth, in perswading me that thou wert the person that gave her a visit by night; or whether that to justify a Sister, guilty of a crime equal to thy own, thou comest here to add an imposture to those other vile acts, by which thou hast dishonour'd thy Illustrious Blood, thinkest thou that I will patiently endure the injuries which thou hast done me, and that I will receive thee as a Son, after thou hast engag'd thy self with my Enemies? Sir, (replied Viridomar, with a becoming mildness and constancy) neither have I engag'd my self in the interests of your Enemies, neither did I ever understand that my Sister's affection was criminal; and as I can assure you, that I never had a thought that could offend you, so will I undertake for my Sister, that she has no other will but what is wholly at your disposal. We shall find out the truth, (said the King;) in the meantime you shall stay in a place, where, though I cannot undertake for your thoughts, I will at least answer for your actions. At these words, turning to the Officers of his Guards, he commanded them to carry him to a certain Chamber which he appointed them, and to look to him upon the peril of their lives. The Officers much troubled at this command, look'd upon one another with no small amazement, not daring to do their Duty against a Prince for whom they had a respect full of love, and an awful veneration. The King perceiving their thoughts by their behaviour, begun with great fury to threaten them, when the Kings and Princes that were with him, particularly Balamir and the Prince of Persia oppos'd his design, and earnestly besought him to deal more kindly by a Son so worthy his affection, and the esteem of all the world. Balamir well knew him to be that very Knight, who had fought him in the defence of Pharamond, which knowledge of his person, instead of incensing him to any act of prejudice against him, rather increased the esteem which the great reputation of his person had gain'd in his heart; but because he knew that that occasion, should it come to the knowledge of the King, would provoke him more violently against him, he would not pretend to have seen him in any other place before; and only contented himself to intercede for him out of the consideration of his merit, and upon the report of his noble actions, which were sufficient to oblige all virtuous men to take his part: Maranez, who knew him also, but had not had so much experience of him, led by the same considerations, seconded Balamir's entreaties, using all the reputation which he had with the King of Suezia. Neither did Gondioch or Arduric forget any thing that could be spoke in his favour. The King of Suezia, who by reason of their merit, their Dignity, their interest in the common quarrel, had a very high respect for every one, hearkened to them with very much patience; and when they had said all they could in the Prince's behalf, unblocking a silence which he had a long time kept very close; You are not to doubt, said he, my my readinesſ to ſubmit to your requeſts : But do you conſider well what it is that you require from me, or do you look upon Viridomar as my Son or as my Enemy, if not the common Enemy of our League ? I confeſs the Gods have endowed him with very ſplendent qualities, and that he hath performed many actions, ſufficiently renowned to give him a great name among men : But do you your ſelves conſider what uſe he makes of thoſe advantages, and whether his inclinations be agreeable to the good opinion which you have of him ? And with theſe words turning himſelf toward the Prince, Tell me, ſaid he, your deſign, and let me know what is the next thing you are reſolved upon after the juſtification of Albiſinda, I am contented to believe what you ſay in her behalf : and for my own ſatisfaction rather than for yours, I am glad to find that it was you that ſhe ſaw in the night, and not the Brother of Pharamond. But what is it that you come to ſpy in our Camp, and what reaſon could bring you hither, having forſaken our party ? If you come to me and ſubmit your ſelf to your duty, and blot out the ſhame and diſgrace of your laſt actions by others more worthy your deſcent, and the fame which you have got in the world, come and fight at the head of your Father's Army againſt the murderer of your Brother : come and diſpute at the price of his life the enjoyment of Roſamond, in the behalf of ſo many brave Princes, as have in hopes of ſuch a renowned prize, embroyled themſelves in the Quarrel. " I came Sir into this Camp, ſaid Viridomar, to joyn with Albiſinda, to ſeek out means to appeaſe your anger, and I appeared before you out of the opinion that I had, that I my ſelf had credit ſufficient to juſtify my Siſter, in a miſfortune which I my ſelf had occaſioned. But to make answer to what you demand of me, I will tell you Sir that no paſſion in the world ſhall ever make me forget my duty : But if you will have it conſiſt in the execution of thoſe things which you propound to me, it will be a hard thing for me to diſcharge it. Certainly I ſhould commit no act of infidelity neither againſt you nor your party, in fighting at the head of your Troops, but perhaps I ſhould not fight there ſo vigorously as to answer your fury : And as for the Conqueſt of Roſamond, as I am not in a condition to diſpute her againſt ſo many brave Princes, who merit her far before me, I leave them to undertake with a better event what I have ill ſucceeded in, and to you Sir as to my King, I ſubmit the diſpoſal of my liberty and my deſtiny. " Yes yes, replied the King, I will have that power as your Sovereign ; for in that quality I will remain having loſt the title of Father. Obey then my orders, (ſaid he turning to the Officers, to whom he had given his laſt commands) and force me not (cried he laying his hand upon the hilt of his Sword) to make ye obey me, by ſuch means as will not prove hard for me to execute. Sir, ſaid the Prince, it is their duty to obey, and I my ſelf will be the firſt to ſhew a good example : Let us go then my friends (continued he, ſpeaking to the Officers) and ſince it is the King's will, that you ſhould diſpenſe with that reſpect which you ought to bear me ; provoke him no longer in deſerring the execution of his commands. Concluding theſe words he laid his Sword at the King's Feet, and went of his own accord into a Chamber adjoining, whither he was followed by the Officers and a Company of Souldiers appointed for his Guard.

Immediately the noiſe of Viridomar's confinement was ſpread through the Camp, and as he was infinitely adored by the Suedes, they could not but teſtifie how impatiently they brook'd his diſgrace : And aſſembling in great bodies together, their murmurings grew ſo loud, that the King might well perceive that he had ſome need of all his Authority, to keep them in obedience. Haldan though pierced with grief at the news of an accident which he well foreſaw, yet uſed all his endeavours to appeaſe them, repreſenting to the Souldiers that by theſe teſtimonies of their good will toward the Prince, they did but the more incenſe the King againſt him, and by making the power of the Prince ſuſpected to him, they might force him to take ſtrange reſolutions to the hazard of his life. The King of the Suedes reflecting upon his condition, found it better than it was ſome hours before : for beſides the content which he had to find Albiſinda innocent, in the moſt criminal part of the accusation laid againſt her, the diſpleaſure he took to ſee his Son perſevere in intentions ſo oppoſite to his, could not divert him from being pleaſed to ſee him in a place where he hop'd more eaſily to reduce him to his duty, than when he converſed among ſtrangers, and perhaps among his Enemies. When the Queens were advertiſed thereof, they went to viſit the King, who received them with all ſort of reſpect and good will : But when they were about to ſpeak in favour of Viridomar, " Content your ſelves (ſaid he with a brisk behaviour) to reign over all the world, only permit me to rule my own ſubjects and govern my own houſe ; ſince you deſire it, I will not forget that I am the Father of Viridomar as well as his King, but ſince he thinks himſelf more worthy of the imprifonment to which I have confined him, than of the glorious fetters of the Queen of the Cimbrians, I ſhall let him ſtand in ſuch a manner, the injury which he hath done himſelf in renouncing them, that perhaps I may not be able to find a greater puniſhment to impoſe upon him. But though he continued obstinate as to the confinement of Viridemar, he released Albifinda, giving the two Queens liberty to fetch her from the Chamber where he had commanded her to be guarded, to keep them company as she was wont to do. The Queen of the Cimbrians also obtained liberty for Imbergida, but it was only to admit her into her own service if she pleas'd: and though the Queen endeavoured to excuse what she had done for Marcomire, to whom her Son owed his life; yet the King would not consent that a woman should be near his Daughter, who held intelligence with the Brother of Pharamond.

The End of the First Book of the Sixth Part.

PHARAMOND.

BOOK II.

THE Queens were hardly departed out of the Chamber of the King of Suevia, when he saw two persons enter, who addressed themselves to make their obeysance before him: Immediately he knew one of them to be Giferic, whom at his departure out of Suevia, he had sent to the King of the Saxons, to require that assistance from him of which he had put him in hopes, and to interest him in his quarrel as he had engaged many other Princes. The King having a great kindness for Giferic received him courteously, leading him by the hand to a window to know the issue of his negotiation: "And well Giferic, said he, have you sped in our affairs? And shall we have that assistance from the Saxons which we had hopes of?" "Sir, replied Giferic, there is that befall'n the King of the Saxons, which may perhaps make him forget some part of your concerns, and they are of too great importance to come by halves to your knowledge. "I understand, replied the King, all the most important accidents, that beset the King of the Saxons in his wars against the Danes, the Turingiens and the Cimbrian Chersonese. He knows also that I was not concerned in the war of the Danes, though their King was my Brother in law; that Viridomar served him in person only, that I manifested my sorrow for his ill success in the last war against the Turingiens, though their King also was my confederate, and that it was but a little before that we entered into a league: But after the much lamented death of Vindimir, I was wholly oppressed with such a load of sadness and important affairs, that I hardly knew unless it were confusedly, what passed among my next neighbours and Allies. "I have brought one along with me, (replied Giferic shewing him the person that came with him) who will inform you from the beginning, and will make you a relation thereof, when you shall be pleased to afford him the hearing. "He shall have liberty when he will, replied the King of the Suedes, making a sign to the same person to come near him) You (said he addressing himself to the stranger) shall be heard by no other person but my self, if the particulars require privacy, otherwise if what you have to say to me, may be related before the Queen of the Cimbrians and some other Princes, I know they will be glad to hear news from the King of the Saxons. As I have nothing secret, replied the Stranger, I am at liberty to speak before whom your Majesty pleases: But as the rehearsal which I have to make is long, if your Majesty desires to know all the particulars of those rare accidents which I have to recount, it will require a seasonable time, which I beg your Majesty to favour me withal the soonest
"that

“ that may be for some important reasons. If you are not weary with your journey, replied the King, we will set apart the rest of this day, wherein we have more leisure at present than we may perhaps have for the time to come. And because I have confusedly heard of some things, of which you are to give me a clearer knowledge, I am perswaded that both the Queens will hearken to you with a great deal of delight and attention. Sir, replied the Saxon, I have not travelled so far to day, as to hinder my self from giving your Majesty full satisfaction at this time, nor is the day so near at an end, but that I may be able to finish one part before your Majesty and the two Queens go to Supper, and the rest after in the evening. The King of Suevia approved the proposal of the Saxon, though he were unwilling to engage him in a long discourse, before he had taken some repose, but that being excused he took the Saxon with him, and carried him to the Apartment of the Cimbrian Queen, where he found together in company with Anzalazontha the charming Albifinda, who could not look upon him without trembling for fear. He uttered not a word to her of what had passed that day, and before the Queen shewed a great deal of moderation, whereby they judged that his Choler was abated by the confinement of Viridomar. The fair Princess of Suevia who had already felt the effect thereof, and saw her self cleared from a cruel accusation, with as much joy as she suffered grief for the confinement of her Brother, was of the same opinion, not without hope, but that the King would in the end be mollified in favour of Viridomar also. Immediately after entred the Prince of Persia, Prince Falamir, Martian, the King of the Alains, Herules and Basternes: and the King of Suevia judging that so fair a Company, could not better spend the latter part of the day, than in hearkning to the discourse of Gismond, (for so was the Saxon call'd) he told the Queens who the person was whom he had brought with him, and the reason of his coming: and found them inclined to give all the attention he could desire, not so much for any curiosity that obliged them, as for the pleasure they took to see themselves divertis'd for some hours in such a Company, at a time wherein considering their present condition, they found disturbance enough. So placing themselves they made the Princes also take their Seats, and because that Gismond by the report of Giferic, was a person of quality considerable, and for that he had a long time to speak, they commanded him likewise to sit. He obeyed, well knowing what submission to pay great personages at such times as those: And having by a short silence prepared the Company to attention; he thus began his discourse, which he address'd to the two Queens.

The History of Melisuntha.

I Will not abuse your patience most illustrious Queens, in employing any part of my time in explaining to you those doubts which perplex many Nations at this day, touching the Original of the Saxons. Some there are who believe them descended from the Saqui, a people of Asia under the dominion of the Persians. But from whence soever they took their beginning, certain it is that for some Ages since, they have been formidable both by Sea and Land: And that after they had fought several great Battels against the Romans, the Vandals, the Danes and the Inhabitants of great Britain, they settled themselves at last in that wide extent of ground, that lyes between the Danes, the Futlanders, the Cauchoes, the Turingiens and the Sea of Suevia, and by force of Arms there established their Kingdom. Since that time they have been in continual wars with their Neighbours, and particularly with the Danes and the inhabitants of the Cimbrian Chersonese, a Province famous for being the seat of the ancient Cimbrians: who in the time of Marius made war upon the Romans; and after that forsaking the Country from whence they drew their original, made themselves Masters of Bohemia, and there founded that famous Monarchy, over which, Madam, said Gismond to Queen Rosamond, your Majesty rules at this present. By the departure of the Cimbrians, that Province by little and little lost its ancient name, so that at this day it is called Julia or Jutland. This Country has for a long time, been the Theatre of war, for the Saxons invaded it under the government of their lawful Prince, who to obtain the protection of the King of the Danes more powerful than himself, became his tributarie, as history reports, and engaged him for the reason that obliges all Princes to hinder the growing greatness of their Neighbours, to take Arms in his defence, and to expel the Saxons out of his Territories. It fell out as he expected, however though that King recovered his Country from the Saxons, his posterity lost it again to the same Saxons, who once more got possession of it: But afterwards through the uncertain events of war, losing and regaining it several times, being always in war with the

Jutlander's

Jutlanders and Danes. At length King Ebald, who at present wears the Saxon Crown, after several great Battels became absolute Master thereof, having reduced the King of Jutland to live with his Family, as a private person in the Court of the King of the Danes, who was contented to let him abide there, not being able to do any more for him. But some years since resolving to take Arms for his restoration, our King not content to defend Jutland against him, entred into Denmark, and by the victorious progress of his Arms, so shook the Danish Throne, that it was in no small danger of being overturn'd, had not Prince Viridomar, by the assistance of his own single person, of greater force than the power of an Army, re-established it by many great Victories, and chased the Saxons into Jutland with so much loss, that had not the King of the Danes been weary of the War, and desired peace for considerations best known to himself, he might through the valour of the same Prince Viridomar, have freed Jutland from the Saxons, and restored it to its lawful Prince, or else have kept it himself.

Gisulphus (for that was the name of the Prince of Jutland) having no way to recover his Kingdom, remained in Denmark, where he contrived plots, and held correspondences with his own people, to disturb the Usurper, upon any opportunity that should offer it self. And still maintaining an implacable hatred against him, as irreconcilable, as it was just, he bred up his children in the same detestation of him from their Cradles, continually exhorting them not to lose the thoughts of recovering their right, but with their lives.

Almost about the same time, Genselaric, the eldest Son of our King, had assaulted Turingia, and in a great Battel had taken prisoner Prince Amalaric, and forced the King of the Turingiens to shut himself up with a small number of men within his Capital City. You well know this to be true, said Gismond to Queen Amalazontha, and you have the entire knowledge of one part of our most important affairs, which is the reason that I shall but slightly mention them, being assured that they are unknown to very few persons: therefore it shall suffice to tell you in few words, that the issue of the Turingien war was such, as we had small reason to expect: for by the arrival of the famous Gaul, Ambiomer, fortune changed her countenance, our Forces were totally defeated, and Genselaric running the same fate with Amalaric, lost his liberty in the Battel, and remained doubly a Captive in Turingia. It is well known what his love made him suffer for the fair Princess of the Turingiens, having the Prince of Frisia for his Rival, and considering the ill success which he had, through the opposition of Ambiomer, in his enterprize to carry away the Princess, wherein he saved himself with the loss of much blood, and receiving many wounds. All the world also knows, how that upon his second invasion of Turingia, at what time he sought to gain by force, that which neither his love nor his service could obtain, he miserably perished under the victorious Arms of Ambiomer. I pass over these things which you know so well, to enlarge my self upon those things of which you have only heard a confused and uncertain report, believing them to be of too great importance to be concealed from people farther distant from us, but more especially from them who inhabit Germany.

Besides Prince Genselaric, our King had two Sons, of no less hopes than their eldest Brother: he that became the eldest after the death of Genselaric, was named Gondemond, the youngest Aldemar. They were both of a noble aspect, and full of courage, but there was a great deal of difference in their dispositions: and indeed the people and the Court were wholly inclin'd to Aldemar, in whose tender years they saw most noble qualities blooming forth. Gondemond had followed his Father in the war against the Danes, nor did he stir from him all the Turingien Expedition, But for the young Aldemar, whether it were to learn the customs and manners of strangers, or for other reasons best known to himself, he sent him abroad to see the Courts of several Princes his Allies, by which he was obliged to travel all over Europe, and a good part of Asia. So that when he received the news of the death of Genselaric, he had only Gondemond remaining with him; so that it was in him only that he sought the comfort of his declining age, after the loss of his eldest Son. He always loved him with a passion more than ordinary; and it is thought, that the advantageous change of his fortune did drown a great part of that sorrow, which otherwise he had felt for the loss of Genselaric. But while he was bewailing his death, and that notwithstanding his hatred against the Turingiens, he was forced to make a peace with them. He understood that the Prince of Jutland, taking the advantage of his misfortunes, and by means of the correspondence which he always held in Jutland, perceiving himself strong enough to execute his designs, was entred into his Country, had put several of our Garrisons to the Sword, was become Master of the most considerable considerable places, as also of a great part of the Country, and was in hopes to drive the Saxons utterly out of his Dominions. Though the King was not ignorant of what designs Gisulphus had, he did not think he had been in a condition to execute them, well knowing that the estate of the King of the Danes's affairs did not permit him to give him any assistance. And therefore at this news, causing his grief to give way to his anger, and growing the more enraged against his Enemy, the more he perceived that he had taken advantage of his misfortune (though he were not ignorant of the justice of his cause, and perhaps did not condemn him in his thoughts) after he had concluded a peace with the Turingians, he turn'd all his power against the Prince of Jutland. And notwithstanding the lowness of the condition wherein men thought him, through the many losses which he had received, he set an Army on foot, sufficient, not only to encounter; but to ruine his Enemies: Gondemond having obtained the command thereof, through the continual impportunity which he used to the King his Father, entred Jutland, where to fulfill the command of the King, he destroyed all places that stuck to their lawful Prince, with Fire and Sword: Gisulphus had two Sons, brave and valiant Princes, whom he loved better than himself; and of whom there were great expectation. By their valour and his own, Fortune shewed her self indifferent in the first Conflicts, though there were not the same equality in their Forces. But their great courage hastened their ruine; for instead of keeping themselves within such strong places, where they might have prolonged the war, and have stayed till the King of Dania, deeply interested in their quarrel, had been in a condition to help them; they ventured into the open Field with a Force weak enough; and through the confidence they had in the justice of their cause, and their own valour, they resolved to hazard a general Battel: It was cruel and bloody, and for some time sufficiently doubtful; but at length victory declared her self for Gondemond, and that so entirely, that the Army of Gisulphus was defeated, and ruined to the last man; his two Sons slain before his face, wounded in a hundred places, himself, all bemangled and besmeared with blood, taken prisoner, while he endeavoured all he could to run the same fortune with his Sons. Though there be, who believe that the mortal hatred which he bare his Enemy, and the hopes he had to torment him in the possession of what he usurped, was the reason that he rather sought to fall alive into the hands of his Enemy, and chose captivity before death.

Of all his Family, there remained now but one Daughter, whom he had left in a strong Hold, not far off when he went to the Battel, but she within a few days after, by the taking of that place, which with all the rest were soon forced to submit, became a prey to the Conquerour, and was led a prisoner with her Father. The victorious Gondemond was received and welcomed with a joy that made him altogether forget his losses in Turingia; and the unfortunate Gisulphus deprived of his children, of the Kingdom of his Ancestors, and of all hope whatsoever, was shut up in a close prison together with his Daughter, who would not leave him, though she was offered a confinement less severe, and a Guard less strict: she was the only comfort that remained to her unfortunate Father, who seeing that in the person of such a Daughter, the Gods had left him a sufficient treasure, he endeavoured with all his persuasions, and all the power he had over her, to frame her to a magnanimous support of her evil fortune, and to maintain even to death, the hatred which he exhorted her to bear towards the Murderers of his Children, the Usurpers of his Dominions, and the Persecutors of her Life. It fell out, that she fulfilled his desires to the height of his expectation; for the fair Melisantha, that was the name of the Princess, in whom the misfortune of her Father had increased the affection which she had for him; and who had loved her Brothers with as entire and perfect a reality, as natural relation and reason could inspire her withal; and who, through the greatness of her courage, supported with no small grief the overthrow of her illustrious Family, and the Dignity of her Ancestors, complied more agreeably with his resolutions, than he could have expected, and so fortified her hatred against the House of the Saxon Kings, that it appeared nothing less than his own. She would not stir from the Bolster of his Bed, while his wounds detained him there; and when he was perfectly cured, she would not be absent from him, nor would admit of any other company but his, though she received many civilities, and many kindnesses from several persons at Court, whom her misfortunes moved to compassion. However, she was the sole and lawful Inheritrix of a fair and large Kingdom, for the defence whereof so much blood had been spilt; and as there was none but her Father and her self that remained of all the progeny of the ancient Princes of Jutland; so that the King of the Saxons might have easily freed himself from the trouble and disturbance which they were able to give him hereafter, in the possession of a Kingdom which he endeavoured to establish under his own Dominion; yet he wavered very much in his thoughts what to do, as to the taking away

their lives, nor could he by any means determine what to resolve upon.

Neither the King, nor Gondemond had as yet seen Melifintha, for the Prince was so modest, as not to appear before her besmeared with the blood of her Brothers, nor so long as he carried her a Captive with her Father. She was also seen by very few other persons; and when she was constrain'd to appear, she hid her face as much as it was possible for her to do. But in the end it was impossible for her so long to conceal it, but that such persons as came to the prison by the King's order, had a sight thereof sometimes, and made such a description thereof to the King and Prince, that her beauty seem'd a kind of prodigy. Gondemond at first believed nothing of what they reported; but at length, they spoke so often to him of her, and related things so extraordinary, that with a passion common enough to persons of his age, he coveted to see her, and that with an excess of eagerness. He oppos'd some days this desire, through a kind of inward presage that seem'd to persuade him to decline the sight of her. But at length, importun'd by the multitude of miracles which they reported of her beauty, which he was not able to withstand, he went to the prison, which was an old Castle at the farther end of all the City, where persons of quality were wont to be confin'd, and hudling in among the Officers that guarded Gisulphus, whom he had forbid to discover him, he saw her, he heard her speak, and he remain'd in her company for some time without being known. But at this view, and in this observation which he had of her, he found things so far beyond report, that he departed from her with a heart full of astonishment and admiration. He returned not only once, but many times in the same disguise, and he returned so often, that at length he left his heart there, and became the most desperate lover of this Princess in the world. They who saw Melifintha, did not at all wonder at this effect of her beauty, nor at many others which it had wrought; for it is such, that I durst have affirm'd an hour since, there was nothing in the world could parallel it. But now, illustrious Queen, since by the sight of what appears before my eyes so divinely glorious, I cannot say, as I thought I might have done before, I shall therefore content my self in saying only this, that I believe nothing can come near what I here behold, but only the celestial beauties of Melifintha. In another place I could make a description thereof, but here it shall suffice to tell you, that her eyes and hair are black, with such a complexion as may well seem to shame whatever nature designed for white; that the lineaments of her face, her lips, her neck, her hands are to be admired, her stature the fairest, and the straightest, her gate and deportment the freest and least affected in the world. In her person, and in all her actions, there appears such a charming air, that gains all hearts, by offering violence to reason. In short, by this beauty, probably greater than I can make you apprehend by my discourse, Gondemond was inflamed after such a manner, that he could no longer stifle his passion, which began to appear by so many signs, that all that he could do at first to conceal it, proved altogether in vain. The King had ever loved him above any thing in the world, and for that reason, as he observed him more than any others, so was he the first that perceiv'd it; so that the Prince having been pressingly urged for some few days, at length confessed the truth, and declared that he was not only passionately in love with the Princess of Jutland, but that he should be the most unfortunate person in the world, if he might not hope to enjoy her. The King was surpris'd at this confession, in a short time after he perceived it to be nothing strange, when he heard the report which they made him of the beauty of Melifintha; and therefore he was content only to ask the Prince what way he could propose to obtain her. Gondemond was a good while pausing what answer to make to this question: at length with a behaviour resolute enough, I know not well by what means to gain the affection of this Princess, said he, but I know on the other side, that I am not able to deny my self the hopes of obtaining it, without being the most miserable among men. And though Melifintha knows me not, yet I think I know her so well, as to believe that I have no other ways to trust to, but what are just and honourable. Sir, this language may surprise you, and the present fortune of Melifintha will no question not let you give ear to my proposal. But besides, that this Princess is descended from Ancestors not inferior to ours, and that the merits of her person shew her worthy to espouse a King; I have heard you often say, that so long as Gisulphus and his Daughter liv'd, you could not assure your self of the Kingdom of Jutland; and that the fear of rendring your self odious to your own people, and Neighbours, was the only reason that hindered you from putting them to death. Now methinks you may better secure to your self those Territories by the marriage of your Son to the lawful Heiress, than by the death of an innocent Prince and his Daughter. And perhaps by doing an action which may render me the happiest person in the world, and whereby you will testify the continuance of that affection with which you have always honoured me, and preserve your self from the hatred of the people, and the reproach of so much cruelty, you will be thought to have acted with prudence, and accord- ing to all the safest rules of Policy. If you consider it well, Sir, you will perhaps find there is as much reason as policy in my discourse: and that in affording me the greatest favour that I can possibly hope from your goodness, you do nothing disadvantageous or prejudicial to the welfare of your Crown. Gondemond thus pleaded to a Father, who had naturally nothing in his heart that did not comply with his desires, and who finding them at this time no way repugnant to the rules of policy, not only approved his proceedings, but wished a happy event thereof as well as himself. He saw in effect that it would be a means to remove from his house the original ground of a war that continually threaten'd his Dominions, and that by this marriage establishing a lawful right to a Country, which he only possess'd by violence and usurpation, he should take away all pretence of claim from any others, and no longer give the Danish King an opportunity, to maintain a cause not supported by justice. That the other way of establishing himself by the death of Gisulphus and his Daughter, was too cruel and too abominable: and that lastly by this means he should be able to gratify the content and repose of a Son, whom he loved beyond himself, while he only did that wherein he found no disadvantage. For these reasons he consented to the affection of Gondemond, but because he knew the disposition of Gisulphus, whose courage was nothing abated by his ill success, and whose heart was filled with a violent and doleful resentment of the loss of his Children, fresh in memory: Children whom he had lost under the fatal conduct of Gondemond himself, who commanded the Army in person; he foresaw that greater difficulties would from thence arise in his way, than he was aware of: and that it would be no small trouble to appease their enraged minds, notwithstanding the advantages of such a marriage. However, as he had over naked persons and Captives an absolute Authority, and that he knew himself likely enough to make use thereof, when the repose of his Son and the welfare of his own affairs required; he made no question but easily to vanquish this consideration. And thus promising to Gondemond the entire accomplishment of all his wishes, he gave him leave by all endeavours of his own to make the progress of his love successful.

From this day forward the confinement of Gisulphus, was far less rigorous than what it used to be, and though they gave him not his absolute liberty, yet they guarded him with less strictness than before, and there was moreover a great alteration in the manner of his attendance: But the change in Melisinda's confinement was much greater, for besides that she began to be visited by the most noble Ladies of the Court, she was so little looked after, that her Guards seem'd rather to attend her as the Guard of Majesty, than Captivity. Both Father and Daughter were astonish'd at this sudden change, of which they knew not the cause: But they seem'd not to take much notice of it, and as they had supported their evil fortune with an admirable constancy, they look'd upon this appearance of a more happy alteration, with a perfect calmness of mind, patiently attending the issue without so much as vouchsafing to demand the reason. But they perfectly apprehended it some few days after, for Gondemond having the sole disposal of the King's will, gave Melisinda a visit in another garb than he had done before. For besides that he set off his graceful aspect with the ornaments and riches of his Apparel, he appear'd with a train suitable to his dignity: And these Officers who at other times by his order, to conceal him from the knowledge of Melisinda, had treated him as their Companion, now observing him as their Prince, shew'd the splendour of his quality. The fair Princess who had already observ'd his countenance, and who had before spoken to him, as she did to others when necessity constrain'd her, could not behold him in that gallantry without admiration. But when she understood that the person who had visited her before in disguise, and who then appear'd publickly and in his proper person, was the Prince of the Saxons, looking upon him at the same time as the cruel Enemy, that came now to give the last blow of ruine to her Family, who had deprived her Brothers of life and her Father and her self of liberty; she felt an inward horrour at the sight of him that made her tremble first, then grow pale, and lastly fall into a swoon in the Arms of certain persons that came to assist her, and who plac'd her in a Chair using all their endeavours to bring her again to her self.

Most certain it is that this accident ought to have oblig'd Gondemond to have retir'd, but whether it were that he might be ignorant of the cause, or that he thought that was only the effect of the first view of him, and that in a short time she would be better accus'tom'd to the sight of him, he stay'd by her all the while, and was one of those that were most forward to help her, insomuch that when she open'd her eyes, she saw her self almost in his very Arms. It was a hundred to one that this second view, had not caus'd the same effect as the former: But though the Princess overcame it with the assistance of some thoughts, that afford'd her strength in that condition, the power which they had over her grief could not vanquish the reluctancy she had to see her Enemy: and therefore in speaking the first words which she had to say to him, fixing her eyes upon his countenance; Ab cruel Enemy, said she, what inhumanity is this of yours, and with what new kind of torment do you assault my misfortune, by forcing her to see the Author of all her misery? Gondemond stood as it were tongue-tyed at these words, and as he was really enamoured, so was he seized with a violent sorrow to see the behaviour of Melisintha toward him: However believing that he might so carry himself as to make her alter her opinion, he lost no courage, but after a short silence; “If I have been the cause, said he, of any part of your misfortunes, it was by the command of my Father and my King, and before I had ever seen or ever knew the person whom I offended: But now I have seen you, now that I know you for the Sovereign Mistress of my heart and of my life, I offer to you all the satisfaction that is within my power to give, and I offer you if you please to accept it, with the Liberty and Crown of Gisulphus the Controll of Gondemod, and the Crown of the Saxons. We would do much more were it in our power, and if you please not to disdain the Prince of the Saxons for your Spouse, you shall command a Kingdom far larger in extent than that of your Ancestors, and you shall reign over the heart of your Prince with the same sovereign Authority as over your subjects. Very probably Melisintha might be moved with this language, nor was it without some appearance of likelihood, that the Prince had hopes thereof. But he soon perceived that he had not wrought the effect which he expected: For the Princess hardly turning her eyes to take notice of him, with an aspect partly languishing, partly incensed; They, said she, who are not easily bowed down by their evil fortune, are not suddenly dazzled with the glistering of a better: And you do not well understand your prisoners, if you think that the Crown of the Saxons can shake the Constancy of Melisintha, or that Gisulphus can command his Daughter to espouse the murderer of her Brothers. Though it be impossible, replied the Prince, to restore your Brothers to life, yet we can offer you our Crown: and I hope, Madam, when time and our repentance hath asswaged your anger, that you will consider, that we repair the injuries we have done, as far as lies within our power, and that in making me the most happy among men, you will have no cause to believe your self the most unfortunate. I hope, replied Melisintha, that I shall cease to be so in a short time, but it will come to pass by the kindness of death rather than by yours: And death shall be always more welcome to me, than all the happiness I can receive at your hands. Melisintha uttered these words in the verity of her thoughts, and whether it were through the evil fortune of Gondemond, or from the reason which she had to hate him: at the very instant that she understood his affection, she conceived a hatred against him, the greatest that any soul could be imagined capable of, and such a hatred, that she would as soon have accepted from him the Empire of the world, as the Crown of Saxony. The Prince was in good hopes, that time and the consideration of her condition would mollify her, and therefore then finding with how much impatience she endured his company, he took leave of her and departed out of the Chamber. But because he was willing to give a visit to the Prince of Jutland, yet feared by the bad entertainment that Melisintha gave him, that he should find no better from him, he sent one of his servants before, to know whether he might have the liberty to wait upon him. Gisulphus started at the sound of a name so odious to him, and hardly finding words in the midst of his sighs to express himself; Tell, said he to the Messenger, the Prince of the Saxons, that if he come to give me my death's wound I shall joyfully receive it, but if that be not his design beseech him to let me alone, to bewail the loss of those children which he hath deprived me of. Upon this answer which the Prince himself heard, in the place where he stayed near the Chamber of Gisulphus, he quitted his purpose of visiting him that day: and being returned to the King, he related to him the ill success of his visit, and that in very passionate language, to the end he might understand how sorely it afflicted him. The King who expected nothing more than the greatest part of what had happen'd, was confirmed in the opinion he had, of the dispositions of Gisulphus and his daughter: and gathered from thence, that his Son would meet with greater difficulties in the design of his love than he was aware of, though he was not altogether out of hope, but that the advantages which Melisintha and her Father would find thereby, and the happy alteration which it would make in their condition, would at length shake their resolutions.

Some days after, the Prince had a mind to give another visit to Melisintha, but because he could not perform it but in the presence of her Father, whose sight he avoided, by reason of the report which he heard every day of the hatred he had against him, he thought it a better way to try if he could qualify their fury by the mediation of other persons, seeing that his presence did but provoke them the more. And to this purpose, the King some while after, at the request of his Son, sent such persons as he thought most able for the employment, to speak with the Prince of Jutland, and ordered them to propose a match between the Prince his Son and Melisintha, with promise to restore him to his liberty, and to put him in the possession of his Kingdom, upon condition he would give his consent. Though the hatred of Gisulphus sprang from a just and lawful ground, yet many persons blamed him for nourishing it to such an excess; and believed, that upon such advantageous conditions as were offered him, it had better become him to have vanquish'd his indignation, and so have hearkened to a proposition that made his fortune better than ever it was. Others found out more prevalent reasons to excuse him. But however it were, he respected the offers of the King with disdain, and openly declared, that he would willingly surrender his life to his Enemies, if they were not satisfied with the losses he had suffered. But that he would never yield to give his Daughter to the Destroyers of his Family, and the Murtherers of his Children; and that he would be the death of her himself, if he thought she had any inclination to such a marriage, that he would endure his chains patiently till death; and that he did no ways counsel the King of the Saxons to give him his liberty, nor to joy'n himself in an alliance with those, whom he had no reason to trust. An answer so fierce, and which testified a hatred so obstinate, provoked the King of the Saxons in such a manner, that all his love, all the intercessions of Gondemond were little enough to keep him from returning Gisulphus to his former restraint, if not from dealing more cruelly by him. Gondemond besought his Father to use the fair means of entreaty, and let nothing be forgot, which he could imagine powerful enough to appease the anger of Melisintha, but all his endeavours prov'd in vain one after another. Gisulphus continued immovable in his resolution; and Melisintha, though her moderation kept her hatred within the bounds of discretion, and permitted not her expressions to be extravagant; yet she shewed those evident proofs of her constancy; whereby it might be perceived, that she would rather espouse death than Gondemond.

Seeing that the prayers of the Prince so little prevailed, the King made use of threats; and after he had endeavoured to strike a terrour into the Prince of Fuland, by underhand messages, at length he publickly declared, that the Prince must suddenly resolve either to die, or consent to the marriage of Melisintha; but he was as little mov'd by these publick menaces, as by his private threats: and whether it were, that he believ'd the affection of Gondemond would not permit the King to use extremity, or that really his hatred was more prevalent than the fear of death, he still testified, that he was ready to suffer it, and that he would never change his resolution. It was in the King's mind more than once, to rid himself of so obstinate an enemy by that death which he so much contemn'd: but Gondemond still diverted him from it; and the fear he had of driving his Son to despair, hindered him from executing what he had in his thoughts. But at length seeing that neither threats nor prayers availed, and that Gondemond's love continued as violent as ever, he advis'd him not to use entreaty and fair means any longer, but to obtain that by force which he could not gain by his love and submission; that when he had obtained what he desired by his power, Melisintha would be mollified by time, and the advantages which she found in her condition. That in short he could not be blamed for making use of force, to make a person happy against her will, seeing that it was only in marriage that he desired to enjoy Melisintha, and that it was his own desire also, for the reasons which I have made known. Gondemond for some time opposed his Father's design, not knowing how to use violence towards a Princess whom he adored. However, at length overcome by his passion, more powerful than his reason, and despairing ever to be happy by any other means, he consented to the Kings advice: yet still it was in the King's name, and not his own, that he sent word to Melisintha to send her determinate answer to those offers which he had made her, and that if she did not resolve in those few days which he gave her to consider of it, he should no more consult her will. This message made Gisulphus and Melisintha tremble, but mov'd them not at all; and therefore not doubting but that the Prince would put in execution what he threatened, they consulted together, and made it their whole contrivance what course to take in case of utmost extremity. One part of the Court regarding interest and fortune, more than the effects which a just grief might produce, blamed their obstinacy. Others, compassionating their misfortune, ceased their accusations, when they considered that there were no persons more concerned than they, that Melisintha should be Queen of the Saxons. In short, instead of detesting that violence which might have been offered to a person of that Extraction as Melisintha, had Gondemond endeavoured to have enjoyed her without marriage, when they understood that his design was only to force her to a marriage in despite of all her obstinacy, they excused it, affirming that that misfortune which she so strongly opposed, did but advance her higher, than she could have expected at the best of her former prosperity. Yet all were not of this opinion; and there were some among the Saxons, who, notwithstanding that compliance which they owed to the will of the King, infinitely commended the resolution of Meliffintha, and maintained that she had a great deal of reason to comply with her Father's judgment, and not to espouse a person that had imbrewed his hands in her Brothers Blood. However it were, neither Father nor Daughter staggered in their resolution; and the time given for Meliffintha to give her positive answer being expired, without any likelyhood of changing her intentions, the King caused her to be brought from the Castle where she was confin'd with her Father to his Palace, where she had a magnificent Apartment prepared for her, with an intention to celebrate the Nuptials the next day. Thus you see Ladies, that hitherto I have used all the brevity that might be, not being willing to enlarge my self in matters less worthy your attention; as I shall continue to do in what follows, though perhaps the subject may be more pleasing. For this reason I have omitted the particulars of a Negotiation, which without doubt caused many conferences between the King, the Prince, Meliffintha, Gisulphus, and those persons that sollicited him on the behalf of the King and Gondemond. And therefore I shall come to tell you what happened after Meliffintha and Gisulphus were separated.

So soon as Meliffintha was come to the Palace, she was visited by all the Saxon Court. And for that the Queen had been dead some years before, and the King had no Daughter, the King had appointed such Ladies as he knew fittest for the employment, to be near her, and had instructed them what they had to do. As for Meliffintha, as she was constant without extravagancy, whatever sorrows she felt for the violence that was done her, she bore it with moderation, though with sufficient courage, and went along wherefoever they conducted her, without any reluctancy, unwilling to suffer any thing of rudeness to be offered to her person, and boldly uttered her thoughts without any impertinent cries or invectives. She spoke not a word to the King, whenever she saw him, ill becoming her modesty, or the respect which she owed his Dignity. And when the Prince, who attended her several times that day, spake to her before company of the happiness which he expected to enjoy in her society, and of the pleasure that he promised to himself in their marriage, she contented her self only to tell him, that he should never be her Husband, without flying into reproach or ill language. As it was then that she came to be seen by all the world, then it was that her admirable beauty was taken notice of, together with those powerful charms that appeared in all her features. Those that discourst her, did not find less in her mind. And while she concealed all her disdain for her Enemies, but received the civilities of other persons with all imaginable courtesie and meekness, all people beheld her with admiration; nor was there any one that wondered at the violent and obstinate love of Gondemond. She also concealed the greatest part of her grief before persons that were not concerned, and made answer to such obliging questions as they demanded of her, in expressions altogether as obliging. But when the Ladies, as all for the most part did, testified their joy and their happiness to have her for their Queen, she answered them with a noble confidence, free from passion, that she would never be their Queen, unless it fell out some other way than by espousing Gondemond. Most persons seeing her deport her self so mildly, believ'd that she was well near appeas'd, and thought she would not long continue in her resolution. But others foresaw the contrary, and found by this cold beginning, that she was one that had the command of her self, and was less to be mov'd than if she had appeared more outrageously obstinate. Though she was attended as a Princess that was to rule over the Saxons, and that she seemed to be at liberty in her chamber, she was for all that no less a prisoner in the Palace, than if she had continued in the Castle from whence she came: for Gondemond fearing least she should escape, and that he could not secure her, till he was in the absolute possession of her, caused her to be strictly guarded, under the pretence of an Honourable Attendance, by persons who were very exact in their duty.

In this manner she passed the rest of that day and the night following; the next day the King sent her Apparel for the Solemnity, so magnificent, and enriched with Jewels of inestimable value, that the like are hardly to be seen. And because they feared that she would refuse them, Gondemond had caused her own to be removed out of her Chamber; so that either out of necessity, or for some other reason which the condition of her fortune mov'd her to, she dress'd her self without any more to do. And with this new lustre, which the richness of her habit added to her beauty, she dazzled the eyes of all that beheld her, to whom she seem'd to be something more than humane. She made no resistance to the women, who by the orders of the King were employed to attire her, yet by her often sighing, and by her looks full of languishment, she testified her grief, and the apprehension she had of the violence which they offered her, but without the least immoderate expression. But when

when the Prince came to give her the good morrow, and that after he had satisfied his admiration at the sight of a beauty, such as he had never seen before, he told her, that now that great and glorious day was come, wherein he was to be the happiest person in the world. I am very much deceived, said she, if this day prove so happy to you as others have done, and I hope, by the assistance of the Gods, that you shall never be my Husband. Gondemond seemed as it were stupified at these words, which she uttered with such a mature confidence. But as he had taken up his resolution, and did not doubt but in time the rigour of the Princess's would yield to his Careless, and the advantages she should reap from her high condition; and for that he also believed that so obstinate a reticence proceeded rather from her compliance to the will of her Father, than from her own inclination; these last marks of her reticence, did not at all divert him from what he had resolv'd; which made him hasten the accomplishment of his intended Nuptials, with all the violence that his love could press him to. But when all things were ready at the Temple where the Nuptials were to be performed, and that the Princess was constrained to go where the Chariot stood prepared for her, turning towards Gondemond with a look full of courage and Majesty: Prince, said she, let me tell you for once, that you ought not to put a force upon me, nor constrain me to do a thing contrary to the will which only depends upon the will. Consider that I am born free, and a Princess, and that you have none to accuse but yourself, if the Gods inflict some strange punishment upon you for the violence you offer to me. Thank you, Madam, replied Gondemond, that violence and force are not always alike criminal, and that we are permitted to put a constraint upon free persons, when it is for their advantage. And who told you, (replied Melisimba with a stern countenance) that I find any advantage in espousing our most cruel Enemy? He has'st absolutely lost that name, replied the Prince, that you ought not to remember, that ever he deserved it, and it lies on your part altogether to obliterate that Title in him, by giving your consent to him, that comes to bind himself to you this day with the eternal bonds of wedlock. Melisimba would not vouchsafe any reply to these words, and so going without any constraint wherever they led her, she went toward the Chariot, while all the people that were gathered together in the Streets to behold her as she passed along, admired her Beauty. Her grief perhaps then clouded something of its lustre, for although, through the greatness of her courage, she endeavoured to dissimble it as much as she could, it was no difficult thing to observe it in her eyes, and in her careless behaviour. At the people admired her in the Streets, the whole Court was no less charm'd at the sight of her in the Temple, nor was there any person that did not believe, but that Gondemond would be the happiest person in the world, if he could gain her heart, as he had the possession of her Body. Part of the Ceremony was performed, and yet Melisimba spoke not one word, nor so much as turn'd her eyes either upon the King, the Prince or people. But when the great Priest of Irimensul, the chiefest of our Gods, rather to perform the formality, than to understand her will, demanded of her whether she would accept the Prince of the Saxons for her Husband or no: No, (cried she with a haughty resolution) I neither do, nor will accept him as long as I live; and I employ the justice of those Gods whom you adore, upon those who have done this violence to a Princess. These words were heard by such as stood near; but by the orders of Gondemond, who had sufficiently provided before hand, as to the answer of the Princess; there was such a noise made, during all the time she spoke, that she was not understood by those that were any thing at a distance. However it came to pass, there was little notice taken of it; for the Priests, who were at the King's and Prince's beck, fearing their displeasure, concluded the ceremony after the same manner, as if Melisimba had given her full consent.

After this, she was conducted back to the Palace, and all that day she was serv'd and attended in every respect as the Prince's Bride, though the obstinacy which she testified against the marriage, put a stop to those publick expressions of joy, and those splendid triumphs usual at such Solemnities. In the evening she sat at Supper with the King and Prince, but she eat nothing at all, nor made any answer to whatever either the King or Gondemond said to her; by her silence and behaviour causing a discontent in the amorous Prince sufficient to allay his joy, and to let him understand that his happiness was not yet fully assured to him. At length the hour appointed came, and the night being far spent, they led the Princess to her Apartment, and thence to the Chamber where she was to be sacrificed to the passion of Gondemond.

The Court was then at Cynestia, a fair City seated just upon the Sea, on that side which is toward the Caucher, the King's Palace being at the farther end: so that Melisimba's Apartment had not only a prospect over the Sea, but there was also a fair Closet adjoining to the Chamber, which opened into a stone walk adorned with Balusters, that survey'd all the
there

More being raised high, for that part was the lowest part of all the Palace. When Melissintha was in the Chamber, she desired all the Ladies that had accompanied her to leave her, and although they made their excuses, knowing it was not proper for them to leave her till they had put her to bed, she told them that for what she had to do, she had need of no more than one maid that she had with her, and continued so positive in her desire, that though they had orders to the contrary, the fear of displeasing her prevailed over their obedience to the Prince, so that at length they left her alone, save only with one young Virgin in whom she put an entire confidence, as having been bred up with her, and one that had accompanied her in her imprisonment, and in all her afflictions. So soon as the Ladies were retired, Gondemond entred the Chamber; and whether it were to please the Princess, or to have the more liberty in his privacy with her, he presently dismissed all those that came along with him, and suffered only those to tarry in an Anti-chamber, who were to lie near him. So soon as Melissintha saw her self alone with Gondemond, she rose from the Chair where she had sat for some time, and moving some few steps towards him, with a nobler confidence than himself durst shew at that time; Gondemond, said she, do not think that the violence which you have offered me to day, gives you any lawful right over my person; for since it is only the will that consummates a marriage, there is no such thing between you and I; and though to outward appearance I am in your power, yet perhaps I am not yet so forsaken of Heaven, but that my prayers may thence compel an unexpected assistance, if you go about to use any farther extremity towards me. The thunder of Heaven, replied the Prince, to me is less terrible, than that of your indignation; but since I hope to appease your anger by my love, I fear not the thunder of the Gods whom I have not offended. Fear all things, replied she, not only the Gods, the enemies of oppression and tyranny, but a person whom despair may provoke to attempt any thing. Whatever you can attempt, replied the Prince, can never be so strong as the love which I have for you; and I question not, but that will vanquish your unjust resolutions, and whatever you can oppose against it. I tell you once again, (replied Melissintha, beholding him with a frown) you shall never be my Husband; and that if you attempt to be so by force, you will lose your life in the enterprise. The hatred which it behoves me to have for you, dissuades me not from giving you this good advice; and as the resolutions to which you force me, are more agreeable to my fortune, than my inclinations, I counsel you not to drive me to the necessity of putting them in execution. These words pronounced with a confidence so remarkable, strook a kind of terrour into the Prince; but his passion overcame it in a short time; and well perceiving that he should difficultly obtain what he desired, by his love and prayers, he resolv'd to put himself into a posture to obtain satisfaction by such ways as he had already determined; and beholding the Princess with an eye that prognosticated the suddenness of his design; I am sorry, said he, that you your self compel me thus to a necessity which I am forced to make use of so much against my will; and that you force me to engage my strength, at such a time when I owe all obedience to my love; but since you will have it so, I am resolv'd to try those ways which are only left me, and to seek my happiness, though at the peril of a hundred deaths, with which you menace me. Concluding these words, he advanced towards her without any farther deliberation; but before he could come near her, she threw her self within the door of the Closet from which she was not far off, and bar'd it after her with so much speed, that he could not suddenly follow her. However, he did not think this obstacle of any great moment to hinder his design, the door of the Closet being but weak, and easily to be forced open; yet he resolv'd to make use of entreaty, before he offered that violence, mildly representing to Melissintha the small advantage she would gain by such an unprofitable resistance. But instead of receiving an answer to his words, he heard the rattling noise of a great fire, which flamed out in the Closet, and by and by he perceived a thick smoke that vented it self through the chinks of the door, against which he leancd. Upon this he tarried no longer, but breaking open the door with his foot, he soon beheld the flames that began to devour every thing that stood in their way. He made no question but this fire was designed that Melissintha might escape in the confusion, as she might over the Terrass-walk, if she had any correspondence; and for fear of this, after he had called the Attendants that were in the Anti-chamber, he threw himself into the Closet, but he had scarce made his first step when he received two mortal stabs in his Breast; so that after he had staggered but a little way, he fell down in a River of his own blood. All this while the fire taking hold of combustible matter, increased with so much vehemency, that in a moment it seized upon all the Closet; and those who came running upon the call of the Prince, no sooner approached, but by the clear light of the fire, they saw the weltring Prince giving up his last breath, so that the most affectionate of his Attendants had much ado to recover his dead body out of the flames, which followed them into the Chamber whither they were forced to drag him, and

I cannot tell which was carried first to the King, the news of his Sons death, or of the fire: But I am apt to believe that the first alarm that he received, was of the fire, the noise and fury whercof increasing, at length the flames became the wonder of the whole City; and as he was going toward Melifintha's apartment, where the fire began, while he thought that all the cries and lamentations that he heard, all the grief that he saw in the peoples faces had been only for that; he understood the sad and fatal destiny of the unfortunate Gondemond, and by and by he beheld his body half burnt; which some persons, who had recovered it out of the flames, were carrying to some more secure place. At the sight thereof, O ye Gods! what a deplorable object of pity was there to have been seen? there appear'd no more life in him, than in his Son; and having for some time fix'd his eyes upon that miserable spectacle of Mortality, with a loud cry he flung himself upon the body of the Prince without sense or motion. They laboured a long time to bring him to himself, but for several hours they laboured in vain; and when he opened his eyes, he appear'd to those that stood about him, in such a condition, as made them fear all those things which despair and grief could urge him to. And indeed they had much ado to hinder him from executing the fatal effects thereof. So that if they had not with-held him, and diligently look'd after him, there was no question but he had followed Gondemond by the means of some violent resolution or other. He had loved him with the most tender, yet most strong affection that a Father could bear to a Child; and it was this affection, too much complying with his desires, that had unfortunately lost him. Nay, we may well affirm it for a truth, that never did grief so exorbitantly shew it self, as in the person of this miserable Parent; in-somuch, that whatsoever eloquence could utter to make you apprehend it, would all come short of the truth. He embrac'd the cold and bloody Corps of the miserable Prince, using expressions sometimes as if his reason and his senses had been lost.

Of three Sons which he had, worthy all to have ruled over the Saxons, he lost the first in the Turingien War; he saw the second, he that without question was the dearest to him, dead before his eyes, by a most unhappy accident. And it was so long since he had heard of the third, who had left his Court some years before, that he durst hardly hope his being alive. The consideration of so dire a Misfortune wrought such an effect upon his Mind, that it wanted but little of ending his Days, without the help of Weapons, or any violent resolution: And I am perswaded that they who were concern'd for his preservation, were beholding for his life, only to those considerations that kindled in his soul desires of revenge equal to those of his grief. True it is, that for a long time his Mind was only employed in the exercise of his grief, which at this time was favourable to his enemies, giving them liberty to escape, whilst it hindered him from minding their pursuit.

This grief of his occasioned also almost the entire destruction of the Palace. For besides that, because of the King lying in a Trance for some hours; and by reason that during some hours he was not capable of any reason or consideration, there was no care taken to quench it; the strange accident of the Sons death, and the Father's lamentation did so perplex and busie the King's whole Houshold, that there was nothing done but with disorder, and without success, and they were forced to carry off the King with the Body of his Son, which he would not forsake, to a house in the City, there being no safety for him any longer in the Palace, the greatest part whereof already lay in Ashes: Then it was that his fury awoke, and that he turn'd his thoughts against the Murderers of Gondemond with hopes of a revenge, which for a while afforded him some comfort. But when he began to think with pleasure upon the Victims, that by their long and cruel torments were to satisfy his vengeance. He understood, that that very fatal Night, Cisulphus upon whom so strict a Guard had not been kept of late, either by corrupting his Guards, or by other means not known, had broke prison, and getting up into Melifintha's Apartment, by the help of a Ladder, which by some contrivance was convey'd to the foot of the Terrass, had taken her away in the disorder which the fire had caus'd, and that he was certainly the person that gave Gondemond his deadly wounds. This news increased the King's grief, seeing the comfort which he hoped from his revenge snatch'd out of his hands, and either quite lost, or at least for some time out of his reach. And for that he did not doubt, but that both Father and Daughter had been the ruine of his Son: He could not see them escap'd from his wrath without flying out into a rage, that made him act those things, that neither became his age nor dignity. At the same time he gave express order to pursue them with all diligence, both by Sea and Land; though he rather believ'd that they had made their escape by Sea, which afforded them the safest and most easie retreat: And because he made no doubt, but that they had withdrawn themselves either to some part of Jutland; which remained under their jurisdiction, or that else they had taken Sanctuary in the Court of the King of Denmark, which was always their undoubted place of refuge; he bent all his thoughts to War, resolving to solemnize the Funerals of Gondemond, with the death of many thousands of Men. In the mean while he expressed both his grief, and his anger in words that gave occasion both of fear and pity: And in those Intervals that his grief reign'd in his soul superiour to his anger, and that his fury gave way to his more soft temper, letting fall a stream of tears from his eyes: O Love, said he, how fatal hast thou been to my unfortunate Off-spring: By thy means Amalazontha depriv'd me of Gentelarie; but it was no offence in her: By thy means the implacable Melisinthia has depriv'd me of Gondemond, but with a cruelty to be abominated. Spare, O fatal Passion, spare the heart of Aldemar, and take not from me the last of my Children, if he be yet in the number of the living.

While the disconsolate King thus tormented himself, Melisinthia and Gisulphus were labouring for their safety upon the waves, to which the necessity of their condition had oblig'd them to commit their trust. True it is, that Gisulphus had corrupted some part of his Guard, who out of the hopes they had to run the same fortune with him, the issue whereof they doubted not from the charms of the Princess, which few the stoutest courages could resist, gave him the opportunity, while the Marriage of the Princess took away all distrust, and busied the whole Court to escape out of Prison, and to get to the bottom of the Terrass with a Ladder, by which he got into Melisinthia's Apartment, who was advertis'd thereof, and prepar'd to receive him: And that it was he that slew Gondemond, and had carried away the Princess by Sea in a Vessel, which the same Guards had provided for him, and kept ready near the shore: And that while the Palace was in flames, in tears, and in disorder, and the miserable City in an uproar, both Father and Daughter accompanied with their Domestick Servants that attended them in the Prison, and those of the Guard to whom they ow'd their Liberty, made all the sail they could from the Enemies Country, leaving the Coast inhabited by the Saxons, to make that either of Jutland, or of the Danes. As it was the shortest and most easie passage, Gisulphus conjectur'd right that it was the most dangerous, and that the pursuit would be taken that way: And therefore to avoid that danger he kept the open Sea, with a design not to make to the shore till he were far enough off from the Territories of the Saxons. He had always kept a correspondence in Jutland, and knew that the inclinations of the people were favourable to him: But he could make little advantage thereof, unless the King of the Danes, who had forsaken him in the last War, would assist him with an Army to enter his own Country: However, though his affairs would not permit him to afford him any assistance of men, yet he doubted not to find a secure refuge in his Court, though he were in danger thereby to draw a War upon himself. As anger bare the chief sway in his soul, and that he did not think himself sufficiently satiated with the blood of Gondemond which he had shed; so he beheld with delight the flames of the burning Palace, that mounted up to heaven, and in the darkness of the night presented themselves every foot before his eyes, though at a very great distance. Nor did he behold this fire, as once Aeneas in his flight beheld the flames of Carthage: for this same sight, was a spectacle of joy, for which he had neither trouble nor remorse, and a joy so much the more perfect in regard the fire had been kindled by the hands of Melisinthia, as the death of Gondemond was his own Act. The fair Princess though she were no less provoked than he, both against Gondemond, and the King of the Saxons, had a heart more tender; and though she had set the Palace on fire, as had been agreed between them, to the end they might the better escape in the disorder; yet did she not desire the death of a Prince who lov'd her, though she perfectly hated him: And Gisulphus, though he did not repent that he had slain him, had often declar'd to Melisinthia, on purpose to comply with her humour, that it was rather necessity than any premeditated design that had provok'd him to be the Author of his death, and that if he had not been rid out of the way by that mortal stroke, they could not have saved themselves. They made sail all the night long, with all the speed imaginable, having no want of experienc'd Mariners, whom the hopes of a great reward had engaged in so dangerous an enterprize. And by morning they conjectur'd themselves so far from the shore which they had left, as not to fear the pursuit of their Enemies.

But when they thought they had escaped that danger, they fell into another which they never dreamed of: For the Sun did but just begin to cast his Beams upon the waves, when they discovered a Brigantine of Pyrates that pursued them, which having given them chase for some part of the day, at length came close up with them; so that they had no other way but either to yield or fight. Gisulphus had but few Souldiers in the Vessel, and therefore thought it altogether in vain to make any resistance: But he knew the humour of Pyrates, and particularly of those that haunted those Seas, who above all others were wont to make themselves formidable by their cruelty : and therefore considering that neither his own nor Melismtha's condition, for whom he was more perplexed than for himself, would be at all the better by his surrender than by being overcome, he resolv'd to make a courageous resistance : and the better to encourage those few men that he had with him, and to make Melismtha approve his resolution, whom he beheld trembling and weeping for fear ; he told them in few words, That it was only from their valour that they could hope for safety, and that though the Pyrates should give them their lives in hopes of a great ransom, yet when they came to know who they were, as it was impossible but that they should, if they were kept prisoners but a few days, in hope of a reward greater than their ransom, they should be delivered up into the hands of the Saxon King, to be tormented to death. The likelihood which the Seamen and Souldiers found in his discourse, made them resolve to fight, though they despair'd of victory : Immediately they were attack'd by the Pyrates, with a fury which they were hardly able to resist. They fought however for some time with sufficient courage : And Gisulphus being a very valiant Person, so enlivened them by his example, and did such great Actions himself ; that they might have easily aspir'd to the victory, had they been seconded and relieved by a force inferiour to that of the Pyrates. But the Pyrates being better Armed, and far exceeding them in number ; they overcame the resistance that Gisulphus made, and entering the Vessel though not without some difficulty and the loss of several of their men ; in a short time they covered the deck with blood and dead bodies, so that Gisulphus and Melismtha saw nothing but death before their eyes. Gisulphus valued it not, disputing his life with a great deal of courage, and Melismtha unwilling to survive after her Father, and hoping for no other conditions, but what would be more cruel than death it self, was resolv'd to throw her self into the Sea, to avoid falling into the Pyrates hands ; at which time fortune directed another Vessel that way, near enough to see that the Combat was unequal, and that the vanquishers were Pyrates. The Master no sooner judg'd of the certainty of the Truth by Circumstances ; but he resolv'd to succour the weakest, and those that were overcome ; and though he had but few men with him, and run a great hazard in taking part with the weaker side, at length he resolv'd no longer to waver, but arming himself and his men with such arms as he had, he came up with Gisulphus's Vessel, and fought the Pyrates with so much courage, that in a short time they were forced to quit the Vessel wherein Gisulphus was, to encounter their new Enemies. Considering their number, and their experience in Sea fights, they might have apparently hop'd for Victory : but they soon were made to understand that in the person of the Captain, they had another kind of Enemy to deal with than had held them play before : For when they saw him strike down as many men as he strook blows, they began to doubt the success of the Engagement. Gisulphus, who in all the fight had receiv'd no wound considerable, plucking up a good heart upon this assistance, encouraged those few that remain'd, by his words, and by his Example to second their Defender ; and Melismtha taking courage her self, rearing her eyes toward heaven, and giving thanks to the gods, for their assistance in a time of so much extremity, exhorted them not to abandon their own safety ; with that they fell on afresh with all their vigour, and their generous Defender hewing out the way to a difficult Victory, by many and worthy brave acts becoming his valour ; at length they forced the Pyrates to lose their footing, and chas'd them out of their Vessel to seek their safety in their own Brigantine. The number of those that they found upon the deck were not many, one part perished in the Sea, the other in Gisulphus's Vessel : The vanquishers were not very eager in the pursuit of them that remain'd : And for Gisulphus and Melismtha, they no sooner found themselves out of danger, but they enquir'd for their valiant Defender, to return him thanks, and to offer him the service of those lives, for which they were engaged to his preservation ; he took off his Helmet when they came near him, and shewing his face, they beheld the Noblest Aspect of a man that they had ever seen before in their lives ; his age had not been above two and twenty years, the air of his face bold and magnanimous ; his gate the comeliest in the World, and the whole frame of his Person formed to the height of perfection. Both the Father and the Daughter beheld him with admiration, and by so fair a resemblance, they found themselves bound to have a greater esteem and value for his Person, than was due to the obligation of their deliverance : But if the sight of his Person produced that effect in them, the sight of Melismtha on the other side no less surpris'd him also, dazling his eyes after such a manner, that he seem'd to be in an amaze if not rather enchanted. The Princess had the same Apparel on, in which she was led to the Temple to espouse Condemond, having neither time nor opportunity to furnish her self with any other : But she had taken off the jewels that enriched it, as well to distribute to those that had assist'd her in her misfortune, to whom she was not in a condition at present to be more liberal; as also to be the less taken notice of by those that she might meet as she went along: But though she had taken off that glittering lustre from her garments, she could not Eclipse the Glory of her Eyes, which, full of penitiveness as they were for her evil fortune, yet preserved a fire sufficient to enflame a heart, perhaps less sensible than that of the unknown Knight. He beheld her likewise with such Symptoms of Astonishment, and with some Alterations so extraordinary, that the fair Princess, who had as little recovered her self as he, from the Surprise which his lofty aspect had occasioned, might perceive some marks of a disturbance easily to be observed: And as it is natural to be concerned for the trouble of others, to which they themselves have contributed, by the undiscernable agitation of her spirits, she felt the blushes that in an instant vermilion'd all her face, and which restoring whatever sadness had clouded her eyes, gave a new lustre to her beauty. Though Gisulphus was loth to make himself known, at a time when it behoved him to suspect all things, and that to take away all suspicion of the truth; he was not willing that Melisimtha should pass for his Daughter, however he still acknowledged the Title that she gave him, but it was that of an Uncle to whose charge she was committed, and not that of her Father: and speaking to his valiant defender in the Roman tongue, of which both Melisimtha and himself had perfect knowledge, with a submission not so agreeable to his dignity, as to the condition of his fortune, and the greatness of the Benefit which he had received; What Sir, said he, what can we miserable persons offer to your worth, whom fortune has left no more than what you have preserved? Or how can they otherwise testify their acknowledgement, than by presenting to you that very life which they owe to your valour, and to implore the Gods to bless you with that reward which is due to your Goodness. I am, (replied the brave unknown, in the same Language, which he spake so well as if it had been his Native speech) more than sufficiently recompensed, for that little which I have done in your behalf, by that content which I enjoy to have served persons of your merit: for opportunities do not every day offer themselves, to be serviceable in necessity to a person so valiant and generous as your self, nor to a Lady fairer than the fairest that ever the Sun beheld. He uttered these last words with such a behaviour, that made them easily judge that he spake what he really thought: Melisimtha could not contain from making her acknowledgment, and therefore seeing that by the conjecture she had of her Father's mind, she thought she might be permitted to speak in his presence, I question not Sir, (said she to the valiant Knight) but that you will receive the recompense of your noble Actions, from the same that attends them, and the satisfaction that upon like occasions, accompanies virtue: But the advantages that you gain thereby, ought not to hinder our just acknowledgement, nor the prayers that we ought to make for your prosperity; since it is all that fortune hath left to the feeble, and those that want ability. She leaves you (replied the unknown Knight, with a passion of which he did not seem to be the Master) a larger power to be grateful, than she gives us opportunities to render you those services, which may be acceptable to you: and they who meet with them though at the price of their blood and lives, are certainly the most happy persons in the world. He uttered those words with so passionate a Gesture, that it was ealie to judge that it was his heart, that had directed them the way to his lips: nor did the Princess hear them without some kind of inward disturbance, nor without discovering by the blushes of her cheeks, that whether it were out of modesty, or something of anger to see her self so hard put to it, or some other passion; she was at a stand how to express her self in a reply; at another time and to another person than he, to whom she knew her self so much obliged, and obliged without any reluctance, she had not perhaps made any reply, for fear of lengthning out a discourse which she was not wont to hear, but the benefit was too great and too fresh in memory, and the person from whom she had received it, too worthy of her esteem to arm her self so soon against him with all that her natural severity might have prompted her to. And therefore tempering it with a sweetness to which she was obliged, and to which perhaps she was more inclinable than ever she was in her life; I do not believe (said she with a pensive and languishing eye) that it is possible to receive a kindness, more acceptable nor more important than that which we have received from your assistance, and with that life which we owe to you, I am perhaps obliged to you for something more precious, the memory whereof I shall preserve as long as I live. The unknown Knight laboured to reply with more moderation to these words, than he had used before in his last expressions, but he came off but ill: and though he gave them not liberty to divine precisely what he thought, at least he left them scope enough to judge, that his mind was not in a very settled condition. A little after spying some blood upon the Prince of Jutland's Clothes, and believing that it might be his own, he besought him to see whether he were not wounded, and proffered him to that purpose one of his men who was an expert Chirurion. Gisulphus thereupon absented himself to dress that little wound which he

he had received, but he made a sign to Melisimba, who fain would have seen his wounds dress'd, to stay; so that while he was in the Chirurgion's hands, and while he was busy in giving orders to throw the dead over board, and to cleanse the decks from the blood of the slain; the unknown Knight remained alone with Melisimba, and fed his eyes with the sight of her beauty with all the liberty he could desire, which he would not do in her Father's presence. Melisimba did not acknowledge him for her Father, but he guessed by her discourse that she was the Daughter of one of his Brothers, who had committed her to his charge, during a voyage which necessity obliged her to undertake. As the respect which the unknown person had for her, did not permit him to ask questions, besides that he was unwilling to employ that time which he had to discourse with her, so impertinently, so it was not very difficult for her to conceal the truth from him, though it may be at length she was not so well pleas'd with her self for what she had done, through the reluctancy which she had to dissemble with a person, to whom she knew her self so much oblig'd. She had no small desire to know who he was, but she durst not shew it, nor satisfie her self by enquiring of his Attendants; and for that he did not discover himself at all, her desire remained without any satisfaction, though she despaired not of finding it out, if they kept company together for any time. However, all this while she perceived that the eyes of the unknown person spake far more to her than his tongue, that he sigh'd oftentimes when he look'd upon her, and that his thoughts were more entangled and perplexed, than seem'd to correspond with his own natural humour.

This disturbance appear'd so visibly as to make her mistrust, lest he had received some wound in the Fight; and therefore though she were engag'd in other discourse, she thought her self oblig'd to move the question, out of the acknowledgment which was due to him, and which she truly had for him. Nor could she refrain, not without some appearance of trouble to ask him whether he were not wounded, and whether some of the blood that she saw upon his Arms, might not be his own. The unknown person sigh'd when he heard this question ask'd; and casting a bashful look upon the Princess, I do not believe, said he, that I have lost any blood in the Fight, yet I cannot boast to have come off without a wound; and perhaps I have received one this day, for the cure whereof there is no remedy in Physick. These words began to explain clear enough to Melisimba, the meaning of that discord which she observ'd in the mind and countenance of the unknown person. But though she were of a humour not to suffer patiently a farther knowledge, than such as she could gather from suspicion, she found her self not so provoked by these suspicions as at another time she might have been, and which she would not have hearkened to, had she thought they would have excited her displeasure against a person that she could not hate; and so giving him an answer without explaining what she conjectur'd; I am too much oblig'd to you, said she, to understand that you suffer any thing of trouble, and not to be apprehensive of it, and much more would it afflict me, were it as you say, that your grief were without remedy. I spake of physical remedies, reply'd the unknown person, which being not proper for all sorts of diseases, mine perhaps is one of those distempers over which it has no virtue. Whatever it may be, reply'd the Princess, I wish the cure thereof with all my heart, and I should be very ingrateful, if I should not all my life time implore the Gods for your happiness. There is some likelihood, (reply'd the unknown person with a smile) that your prayers may not prove unprofitable; and though possibly I may be more in love with my distemper, than to desire the cure thereof, the compassion which you have for it will give me sufficient ease. He had perhaps said more, if the Prince of Jutland, who went to dress a slight wound which he had received in his left Arm, had not interrupted them, telling Melisimba she would do well to perswade the unknown Knight to put off his Arms, and retire to take a little rest after so hard a toil which he had undergone for their safety. The unknown person without expecting the answer of Melisimba, told him that he had no need of rest. But because it was a shame for him to tarry longer in her presence, with his Arms all besmear'd with blood, he thought it more became him to go and put on others wherein to appear before her, and so to return into her presence with an offer of all the service which he could assist her with, in the affair which had caus'd her to hazard her self upon the Sea, and also of his company, if it were not offensive to her; or that he could be any way advantageous to her by such encounters as he had already made: Melisimba had not time to make answer to the offer of the unknown person, but she found that she could hearken to him without any reluctancy; and Gisulphus himself judg'd well that in the condition of his affairs the assistance of so valiant a person, and a person that by all likelihood was of no ordinary quality could not but be most advantageous to him. The unknown person upon this went aboard his own Vessel, and so into his Cabbin to change his Cloaths. But while he was thus employ'd, and that Gisulphus and Melisimba were discourfing upon this laft accident, and of the conjectures that they were to make thereupon, almoft at the fame inftant the wind began to rife, and the waves to fwell, and by and by grew fo tempeftuous, that the two Veffels that were now ungrappled, were by the fury of the weather feparated above a Bow's ſhot one from the other; and at length the wind grew fo high, and the Sea fo rough, that it was impoſſible for the Veffels to keep together, with all the ſkill that the Marriners uſed; and in a ſhort time they not only loſt that hope, but hardly preserv'd themſelves from ſinking. However, it ſeemed to Meliſintha, that ſhe ſaw the unknown Knight upon the deck of his own Veffel, ſtretching forth his Arms from the ſide where he ſtood, and endeavouring with all his might and main, maugre the Tempeſt, to return to her, and teſtifying to her by all the ſigns imaginable, the grief which he had to be ſeparated from her by this unhappy accident. But ſhe ſoon loſt the ſight of him; for beſide that the Veffel was ſoon carried out of ſight, the weather grew fo foggy that there was nothing to be diſcerned upon the Sea: and all that were in the Veffel of Giſulphus, thought upon nothing but how to ſave their lives. I cannot tell what Meliſintha thought at that time, but we may well believe, that ſhe did not brook without ſome diſcontent the abſence of a perſon, to whoſe generoſity ſhe was ſo much indebted, and in whom ſhe had perceived other things which intermixed other favourable thoughts perhaps for him, beſides thoſe of her acknowledgment. However it were, ſhe would not diſſemble her ſorrow to Giſulphus: and the Prince of Jutland teſtified no leſs how much he was concern'd himſelf for it, expreſſing himſelf with as much heavineſs, as the new danger would permit him. The tempeſt was furious for ſome hours, but afterwards abated contrary to their expectation; and, as if the Tempeſt had not been raiſed but only to ſeparate them from their Preſerver, the winds grew ſtill, the waves grew ſmooth and calm; and immediately there blew a Gale ſo favourable to the Prince of Jutland's deſign, that he deſcryed the coaſt of Denmark ſooner than he expected; and in a ſhort time he made the Port whither he was firſt bound.

All this while grief diſplayed all that was ſad, or miſerably to be lamented in the Court of the King of the Saxons; and that Prince altogether deſperate, not being willing to hear either reaſon or comfort, had ingulſed himſelf into ſuch an immoderate ſorrow, that he was ſcarce capable of any diſcourſe. After he had devoted the two firſt days to tears and lamentations, and to all that grief could urge him to of extravagancy, the third day he ſolemnized the Funerals of the unhappy Gondemond. And though in the condition wherein he was, he regarded not that pomp or magnificence uſual upon ſuch high occaſions, yet for the love which he had for this unfortunate Prince, he was reſolved to omit nothing of what had been uſually accuſtomed at the obſequies of former Kings, ſo that both to eternize among the Saxons the memory of his Son's deſtiny, and the cruelty of Meliſintha, he cauſed the ſtory to be painted about a magnificent Tomb which he erected, but more hainous than indeed it was, and ordered theſe words to be engrav'd upon the Marble of the Sepulchre.

Love laid Gondemond in this Tomb, though he killed him not with his ordinary Weapons; but that which the eyes of the cruel Meliſintha had begun, her mercileſſe hands completed.

And a little lower.

Paſſenger, bewail his deplorable Deſtiny: Yet weep no more, for it is blood, and not tears, which his revenge demands.

The King effectually began to offer blood to the Gholt of Gondemond, and having loſt the principal victims againſt whom he had arm'd the the thunder of his anger, he exerciſed it upon all thoſe perſons whom he ſuſpected to have in the leaſt contributed to the eſcape

scape of Gisulphus. And among the guilty he caused many innocent persons to suffer, or at least all such as were accused not to have discharged their trust with care. His grief was so increased by the ill success of those whom he dispatched in the pursuit, that they could hardly escape his anger, though he remembered that he had sent them too late, and that though they had held the same course which the enemy kept, he had given them too much time to be overtaken. But as his affliction was excessive, the Gods were pleased to vouchsafe to him a very great comfort, without doubt the greatest that he could receive, if his revenge had not transported him beyond all consolation. For while he was in the Temple, and standing at the Sepulchre of Gondemond, whither they had carried him that day, and which he watered all the while with his tears, he heard among the crowd the sound of Prince Aldemar's name, and by and by he saw the press make way, and Aldemar himself coming towards him, his youngest, and his only child. The sight of him wrought the desired effect; for upon his too much coveted return, the heart of his disconsolate Father opened it self to as much joy as it was capable to receive, considering the mournful condition it was in. And this joy, making way for its self through all his grief, raised a kind of combat in his mind, wherein he expressed the tenderness of his affection by a new flood of tears, that spake instead of his tongue, which the labour and conflict of his passions had locked up under a mournful silence. The young Prince had thrown himself at his Father's feet, with his cheeks all over bedewed with tears like his Father's, he embrac'd his knees with a behaviour full of passionate submission, while his Father becoming master of those first commotions that had stupified his mind, to follow those which reason and nature taught him, raised him up with his Arms stretched forth to embrace him, and after that held him in his Arms a good while, not having the power to speak one word. When he began to speak, it was without order or coherence, calling him many times his Son, with a voice interrupted with sobs, and without uttering any thing afterwards for a long while. To these marks of tenderness the Prince return'd all those tokens of a filial affection, that a good disposition could make manifest. And for that he had already been told of his Brother's tragick end, and that the sad objects that presented themselves to his eyes, such as were his Father's countenance, his Brother's Tomb, the mourning furniture of the Temple had wrought that effect, than which, no other could be expected in a soul naturally inclined to grief and pity. He appeared before the afflicted King in such a condition, as made him soon sensible of the share he took to himself of his sorrow, and the inclination he had to intermix his own thoughts with his Father's. The King as yet expressed himself but in some few abrupt words, till at length overcoming those passions which had hindered him from expressing himself as he desired, Aldemar, (said he, with a voice loud enough to be heard by a great part of those that were in the Temple) *when you took your leave of me, you had then two Brothers not unworthy their noble descent, neither the one, nor the other; but remorseless death has deprived me of both, though after two several manners, the difference whereof has imprinted different thoughts in my breast; Genselaric lost his life by the fortune of war, in a Country which he invaded perhaps with little justice; and I have no reason to seek to be revenged either upon the French Ambiomex, nor upon the King of the Turingiens: but the ever to be lamented Gondemond has suffered death at the hands of a woman, to whom he had surrendered up his heart; a woman whom, from a Captive, he had raised to the Throne of the Saxons, a woman that he had espoused in the presence of our Gods, so shed his blood with her own hands, and mingle it with those flames, wherewith she had consumed your Father's Palace to ashes. You are now all my store, and with my Crown you are to possess my affections; but though I hope you will never prove unworthy of my Scepter, as I am apt to believe by those marks which I find in your disposition, yet are you never to hope it, unless by the revenge of Gondemond, and the sacrifice which I have promised to his Ghost, of that inhumane creature that massacred him, and that barbarous person that lent his assisting hand to a murderer so inexorable. Though you did not owe this satisfaction to my grief, though you did not owe it to all that relation or nature do demand, as well as I, yet you owe it to your honour; that ought to be more dear to you, than either your Crown or life. Nor certainly can you endure without the loss thereof, that the cut-throats of your Brother should find any Sanctuary within any corner of the world. Prepare your self therefore, Aldemar, to pursue them to the ends of the earth, at the head of an Army, to second your indignation equally in censured with revenge: and swear to me at the feet of these Altars, and before those Gods who were witnesses of the fatal marriage of Gondemond, that you will give neither peace nor truce to those murderers, and that you will never take repose your self, till you have delivered them up into my power, that I may offer them up to the Ghost of your deceased Brother.*

Thus spake the King to a person, who needed no arguments to what his revenge; and for that they had made him a rehearsal of all that which had pass'd, and that with so much partiality, as to render Melisintha far more in fault, than she was in truth, by charging her to have consented to the marriage of Gondemond, on purpose to dig his grave in her Nuptial Bed; and that she gave him with her own hands one of the stabs that deprived him of his life: he entertained so great an abhorrency of the Action, that he burn'd with an impatience to hasten to that revenge which it behoved him to take; and gave way to some thoughts of cruelty, out of a detestation which he had of such cruel actions. Neither Melisintha's Sex, nor what they reported to him of her beauty, did any way move him; but looking upon her as a Monster, rather than a woman, he gave full liberty to the discourse and tears of the King, that wrought most vigorously upon his inclinations, to take all the effect they could desire. The King knew part of his thoughts, before he opened his mouth to express himself any farther, when the young Prince, soon after, beginning to speak; Yes, Sir, said he, I engage my self as far as you can desire, to revenge the death of Gondemond; and though I owed neither that obedience to your will, nor that consolation to your grief, the blood of a Brother so dear to me, and the detestation of a crime like that of his murderers, have kindled in my breast a just rage, not at all inferior to yours. I will seek them out, in whatever part of the world they find the least Sanctuary; and they shall feel the thunder of your just anger, whoever they be that protect them from our revenge; and though Melisintha's Sex will not let me sheath my Sword in her bosom, yet shall it not hinder me from delivering her up into your power, and leaving the disposal of her destiny wholly to your justice.

After this manner spake Aldemar, and as he uttered these words, his eyes sparkled with anger, and his frowns were such, that the King no farther questioned his fidelity to perform what he promised. This hope made him sensible of that comfort, which before he believed could never have entered into his heart; and this respite given to his grief, causing him to observe more circumspectly the behaviour of his Son, made it plainly appear to him, that the absence of three or four years had wrought such advantageous alterations in his person, or rather had so increased his virtuous inclinations, that not permitting him to be prepossessed either with the memory of Genselaric, or blinded with the love which he had for Gondemond, he could not admit of any comparison between the two deceased Princes, and him whom the Gods had preserv'd. In short, the whole Court agreed with him, that few persons in the world were better accomplish'd than Aldemar; and to say the same of him as I have said of Melisintha, before I saw this Royal Company, I never saw that person who, in my opinion, ever excelled him for his noble aspect, behaviour, and those other ornaments that completed the comly grace of his person. His eyes are lively and sparkling, his hair black, his complexion somewhat inclining more to brown, than is usual under the Climate where he was born; his proportion admirably perfect, his presence lofty and noble, above what I am able to describe.

The King, after he had beheld his person with delight, upon his discourse with him, found no less perfections in his mind; and saw beyond his expectation, how he had improved himself by his travels, and his abode in the Courts of strange Princes with an admirable success. Some days after he observed yet more; but as on the one side, this afforded him great cause of comfort and joy; and that notwithstanding the passion for Gondemond that had prepossessed him, he now was of opinion that fortune was agreed with reason to call him to the Crown, who without doubt was the most worthy of it; so he was not a little afflicted to see himself obliged by the necessity which he himself had imposed, and by the burning desire of revenge that tormented him without ceasing, to part with such a Son, his only Son, and a Son that he should expose to great dangers, by the enterprise which he had engaged him to undertake. Sometimes he began so far to repent, as to think of revoking his imposition, and committing his revenge to other hands; but presently after, being incensed by his first thoughts, and believing that there was no other person but he, that could so well accomplish his desires, he yielded both to part with his Son, and to let him undergo the dangers which he might expect, to satisfy that immoderate passion which continually tormented him.

While he was raising the Army which he was resolv'd to employ in this Expedition, he had sent Spies to the Court of the Danish King, whither, he made no question, but his enemies were retired, by whom, in a short time, he understood, that Gisulphus and Melisintha were there, and that they were favourably entertained by the King, who had not only promised them protection, but that knowing Melisintha to be the lawful Heiress of Jutland, though deprived of her inheritance, he had a design to marry her to Prince Simbald, his Brother; and to assist them with an Army, to restore them to the possession of that fair Country, whereby he should assure to himself the amity of that Kingdom, and rid himself of a neighbour, whose power was always an eye-sore to him. That he desired this marriage for his Brother, not having any children of his own, but what were very young. That Gisulphus was willing to consent to the match out of the hopes he had to recover his Kingdom, and that they believ'd Melisintha would not refuse to espouse Sinibald, being a comely Prince, and of great valour. That for the accomplishing these designs, they assured him, that Gisulphus and Melisintha, whom her Father was willing to shew to the people, the better to encourage them to the maintenance of their interests, were to set forward in a few days with a Navy, which the King had provided for them, to make themselves Masters of the most important Sea-port Towns of Jutland; and that Sinibald was to march in a few days after, with an Army to enter Jutland, so soon as Gisulphus had secured the Sea coast. The King of the Saxons was overjoyed that his enemies did not hide themselves from his revenge; and the great courage of Aldemar was pleased to behold these opportunities to signalize his valour, and to acquire fame in the performance of his Father's commands, so agreeable with his inclinations to revenge the death of his Brother. In a few days after, they received a confirmation of the news, with all the certain particulars: and how that the Danish Fleet was ready to set Sail for the Coast of Jutland. The assurance which they had of this news, made them hasten the execution of their design, not being willing to let Gisulphus make himself Master of all the Sea-port Towns: And to this purpose the King commanding aboard such Seamen as he had in readiness, gave order to Prince Aldemar to meet Gisulphus, himself preparing with his Army to encounter Sinibald by Land. Before Aldemar went a Ship-board, he exhorted him with all earnestness imaginable to the revenge of Gondemond's death, and engaged him by new Oaths, not to give it over as long as he lived. After that, Aldemar put to Sea with a Fleet well equipped, and sailed toward the coast of Jutland.

But though the wind favoured him it was contrary to Gisulphus and Melisintha, who being within view of the Coast of Jutland, were forced back again toward Denmark, and to shelter themselves under certain Islands. In short, this obstruction of a contrary wind that rose some days after they put to sea, lost the execution of their design to the great grief of Gisulphus; who well knew that the good success which they expected, depended chiefly upon the suddenness of execution. He had flattered himself with a pleasing hope which he had, of the favourable inclinations of the King of the Danes. And though he well knew the reasons that obliged him to interest himself in his defence; and that he was not ignorant as to the advantage of his daughter, that there was a vast difference between the party whom they offered her, and the person whom she had refused; yet the implacable hatred which he bore to Gondemond, and to the House of the Saxon King's, had caused him to prefer a mean person before the Heir of that Crown: and he chose rather to recover his Dominions by the help of his Friends, than by the favour of his cruel Enemies. Melisintha's thoughts seemed to be conformable altogether to his, though indeed there was not any thing that she could see more advantagious to her, than to Ally her self to the King of the Saxons. But though out of respect which she had to the will of her Father, she did not altogether reject the proposition made her to marry Sinibald; neither did she seem very much to approve it, notwithstanding that there was nothing in the Prince of Denmark that she could dislike: and though through the impatience of his love (for he grew easily enamoured) he had desired and requested of the King his Brother and the Prince of Jutland, that the marriage might have been accomplished before his departure; she excused her self, that she was not in a condition to espouse a Husband while a miserable Exile, and one that had nothing to help her self. And she perswaded her Father by many Arguments which she alledged, that he should defer the Marriage till he came to be in the possession of his Kingdom, to which the King of Denmark, who desired this match only upon that consideration easily consented. While she was on shipboard she appeared very sad, and if out of the delight she had to comply with her Father's will, she forced her self sometimes to look a little chearfully; yet there was a certain pensiveness that seized her, which shewed that her mirth was not natural. However because she had had misfortunes enough in her life to make her sad, therefore her Father did not greatly wonder at it though it troubled him very much: But while the wind held in a contrary corner, he attributed the greatest part of her care and melancholly which he observed in her eyes, to the trouble she had for being so disappointed. At length finding the wind still continue contrary to their design, they began to think however of returning by the help of Art toward Jutland, where they had yet some hopes to arrive soon enough for their purpose, when they discovered the Saxon Fleet, which under the conduct of Aldemar in good order bore directly upon them with a fresh gale. Gisulphus well understood the preparations which were made upon Prince Aldemar's Arrival in Saxony, and the solemn vows which the King had caused him to make to revenge the death of Gondemond. He knew likewise that he was to command the Fleet which was to be sent against him, but he did not think that they had been in a condition to set so soon to Sea, and he was in good hopes that before they could be ready to seek him out, he should have finished the greatest part of what he designed, so that he was not in a little surprize when he descried them first, seeing himself compelled in an instant to take new resolutions. Some of the Captains of the Danes that were near him, advised him to hawl close to the Shore, and not hazard an engagement, the ill success whereof would entirely ruine all his designs: And this counsel probably had prevailed, but that he considered that the Enemy was master of all the Danish shore, by reason of the Garrisons which they had in the Sea Towns of Jutland, where Sinibald was not yet entred, so that he should be inclosed between them, which hindred him from landing to shun those that pursued him by Sea: Whereas in bearing up to the Enemy which he saw before him, he had nothing to fear but only them, nor could they receive any reinforcement from Land. On the other side, he knew by a light vessel that he had sent upon discovery, that the Enemy was not stronger than they: and as he had a Courage more hot and more fierce than was usual at his years; and by reason of the hatred which always reigned in his Soul, he coveted nothing more than to spill the blood of the Saxons: He therefore prepared himself to fight, and put all things in readiness accordingly. He would have sent Melismtha away with orders to sail back into Denmark, accompanied with such persons as he could confide in to conduct and guard her: but besides that it was a very difficult thing to sail back into Denmark, the Enemies Fleet lying between them and home, she told him that she was resolved to run the same fortune with him, and that she hop'd the Gods would give him the victory: so that all he could persuade her to, was to keep at a distance with the same persons that he had appointed in a Vessel, which was ordered to keep out of harms way: And that it fortune proved contrary to him, that upon the first knowledge she had of it, she should endeavour to recover Denmark with all the speed she could. Having thus ordered their affairs, Gisulphus went aboard another Vessel, and going from Ship to Ship put all things in good order, and having taken all his advantages like a brave and experienced Admiral; he bore briskly up to the Saxons, so that in a short time both Fleets came within bow shot, and the Sky began to grow dark with the infinite showers of Arrows, that they let fly on both sides. True it is that manner of fighting lasted not long, for the impatient Aldemar bearing out of order before any of his own, and appearing at the head of the Ships Company with his Sword in his hand, he grappled Vessel to Vessel, and so came to fight hand to hand. I can well bear witness of what there passed, for I commanded one of the biggest Ships, and had some share in the success of the Engagement. The Prince of Jutland every where did the part of a skilful Commander, and a valiant Soldier; and he so encourag'd the Danes, both by his speech, and by his actions, that oft times the Victory inclin'd to his side, while the Seas were colour'd with Saxon blood. But the Valiant Aldemar, whose flourishing youth afforded him a more vigorous and brisk strength, appear'd to the Danes in his Glittering Arms, like a bloody and fatal Comet; and strowing death in all places where he appear'd, he not only increas'd the Courage of his own, but discourag'd his Enemies: And sailing up and down the Fleet, where he found his own too hard beset, or any important resistance, there by his presence he restor'd the Fortune of the Day. In fine, after great toil and labour he disorder'd the Enemies Fleet, so that they fought confusedly without any obedience to the Orders of Gisulphus: Nor was it long ere their disorder increas'd more and more, through the Valour of the Saxon Prince, who plyed his advantages, so that at length the Victory became wholly ours, and the Danes were totally defeated. Gisulphus did all that a valiant man could do, to stay their flight, but all his endeavours proving vain, he signaliz'd his fury by the death of many Saxons, that fell by the point of his sword. But in the height of all his despair, he saw the victorious Aldemar cover'd with blood enter aboard his Ship, killing all that stood in his way: At this sight he pull'd down the Viser of his Helmet, and fortifying himself with a courageous resolution, fearlessly prepar'd to encounter so terrible an Enemy. Aldemar who knew it was his Ship, and knew him likewise by several signs, gave him so weighty a blow upon his head, that he fell down quite stupif'd at his feet: He caus'd him to be taken up at the same time by those that were next him. But he would by no means see him, lest it should have rais'd a pity in him altogether unprofitable, and so turning himself to one of the chief Officers of the Fleet that he saw next him, and whom he trusted with all things of greatest Importance: I believe, said he, that the Victory is ours; but for fear, that if Fortune should change her Countenance, we should be blam'd for not having done our duty, nor perform'd our oath: Make you haste, and in this Ship, which I leave for the same purpose, carry this Prisoner to the King my Father, and tell him, him, that by this prosperous beginning, which I have given to his revenge, he may expect as length that satisfaction which he desires from me. After these words he left that Ship, where most of the Danes had been put to the Sword, and having order'd a Convoy for the Officer, that was to carry Gisulphus; he pursu'd his Victory with that vigour, that in a short time he found no more resistance: for that the greatest part of the Danes having lost their lives in the Combat, the rest threw down their Arms, crying out for Quarter to the Victor: Who knowing well that they were not the Murderers of Gondemond, spar'd their lives and us'd them civilly. There was a great number of Prisoners, whom they put into certain Ships, after they had disarm'd them.

But among them all they could not find Melismtha, though several of the Saxons that were most forward to satisfy the passion of their King, and were most zealous to follow his Orders, searched for her in all the Ships, and sought for her in all the Creeks along the shore. They understood from the Prisoners that she made all the sail away that she could, as soon as she saw the fortune of the Engagement favour the Enemy: and that with one Ship and a few persons, to whose care her Father had committed her, she was fled toward Denmark, and because they thought there would be a great reward for those that should take her; the most zealous among them with the most nimble Vessels, undertook the pursuit. Though till that time, Prince Aldemar had testified no less indignation toward Melismtha, than he had done toward Gisulphus, and that his anger seem'd to be as much enflam'd against her, as against her Father, and that the fact for which she was accused, and which the Saxons verily believ'd she had committed, seem'd the more odious in a person of her sex, yet he was not much troubled for not finding her, and turning to them that were most forward to undertake the pursuit; If she escape our Revenge, said he, she will not escape the justice of the Gods, and we perhaps shall be more happy, to see her receive the punishment of her Crime by other hands than ours.

While she fled toward Denmark, this unfortunate Princess who had arm'd so many Swords against her life, though she suffer'd her self to be governed by those, to whom her Father had left her in charge, and who against her will had hoys'd sails, and made all the hast they could for the Coast of Denmark, when they saw the victory incline to the Saxons, not without more than ordinary compulsion; forsook a Father whom she dearly loved: and as she sat in the Ship that made for Denmark, she always turned her eyes, almost drown'd in tears, toward the place which she had forsaken, sending the unprofitable succour of her sighs to his relief. However, they who had the charge of her ill acquitted themselves thereof: for it being their ill fortune to have none but bad Scamen in the Vessel, and such as were withal amaz'd with fear, they made not half the speed which they might have done, so that night coming on before they were sail'd very far, they made but little way while it was dark: so that the Sun no sooner began to appear, but they were discovered by the Saxon Vessels that pursued them, and who knowing the Danish Vessel, made after it with so much speed, that in a short time they fetch'd her up and took her: Then it was that Melismtha seeing her self arriv'd at the height of her misfortunes, would have freed her self by death from all the worst of evils that she fear'd from her accursed fortune: and running to the side of the Ship, she would have thrown her self into the Sea, had she not been caught hold on by those persons that were near her, and who after they had in vain put her in mind of the charms of her beauty, that would soon disarm her Enemies; were constrain'd to make use of force to keep her from doing her self some mischief. In the mean while the Saxons, not finding any resistance from men, that could hope for no good success, having oblig'd them besides upon promise of their lives to lay down their Arms, went aboard the Danish Vessel. How furious how enraged soever they were at the sight of Melismtha, they could not forbear to pay her that respect which it was so difficult to deny her: and being by good fortune command'd by a Captain that was nobly descend'd, and of a considerable Family among the Saxons, he would not suffer any thing unhand'some: so that she was brought before the Victor, without receiving the least injury or affront. They who were the Masters of her liberty, understanding the design that she had to have thrown her self into the Sea, kept continually by her to hinder her from it: And I am assur'd that they beheld those charms in her eyes, that they repented they had been so eager in pursuing her: and that they rather inclin'd to let her escape than bring her prisoner, had they not fear'd the anger of the King: and had there not been two Captains of equal Authority, who out of the distrust they had of each other, durst not discover their intentions. Melismtha desired them to use her civilly, and to have some respect to the Quality of her birth: which when they had assur'd her, she demand'd of them whether her Father was alive, and understanding that he was a Prisoner, the grief that seiz'd her became so violent, that it fail'd but little of putting an end to her days, and made it apparent to those that guarded her, that the danger which threatned her, was less terrible to her than that to which the life of her Father was exposed. After this she spake no more, but settling her self by the strength of her virtue to suffer her misfortune constantly; she patiently submitted her self to the power of the Victor: Now by reason that the Vessel was a very nimble Sailer, and that Aldemar was got head most of all the rest of the Ships, they soon discovered the Fleet, and in a short time after came board and board with the Princes Vessel, and went aboard with the fair Prize which they had taken. By and by the Cry went through the Ship, as it did immediately after through the whole Fleet; that Melisintha was taken: And Aldemar that heard it as well as others, spake aloud to forbid them from bringing her before him; when he saw her approach in the midst of her Guard, who retired some few steps backward after they had presented her to the Prince, Aldemar troubled at what they had done, would not so much as cast his eyes upon a beauty the sight whereof he dreaded: and Melisintha notwithstanding all her confidence, could not, without growing pale, behold her self in the presence of the Brother of Gondemond: and much ado she had to look upon an Enemy, whose good fortune had made him Master of her Destiny. But Melisintha having cast her eyes upon Aldemar, at the same time that he turn'd his face toward her, immediately knew him to be that unknown person, that had deliver'd her from the Pyrates, and who by many tokens at that time seem'd to be smitten with her beauty, of which he had preserv'd the memory longer than she desired. This same sight, and this same knowledge striking her with astonishment, made her head dizzy that she was e'en ready to swoon upon the deck; had she not been supported by two young virgins that attended her, and who kept her up in their Arms. But her surprize, as great as it was, was no way equal to that of Prince Aldemar, nor can words make you apprehend what he felt, when he understood that this admirable Princess, of whom he was become so passionately enamoured, from the very first time that he saw her, and whom he loved a thousand times beyond his own life; was that very Melisintha, who according to the common report, as he had been made to believe, had killed his own Brother: and the same Melisintha that he was necessitated to expose to the revenge of the King. Certainly among all the adventures the most estranged from the Common Course of Fate, never did any accident fall out so wonderful nor so surprizing: and the astonished Prince was so amazed at it, that for a long time he could not compose his judgment, to believe the reality of a thing, which he could not look upon to be other than an illusion or a dream. His whole countenance betrayed his admiration in such a manner, that all that beheld him might easily perceive it: And if one of the Masters of the Ship, had not done the same Office that the Ladies did for Melisintha, he could not have sustained himself in that weakness, which had shadowed all his face with a mortal paleness, and had caused a trembling in his body from head to feet: he remained a long while in this condition, not daring to lift his eyes toward that face, which for those reasons that had been imprinted in his mind, it behoved him to look upon with horreur, yet was he not able to remove them off from those beloved cheeks, the image whereof he carried engraved in his heart, and so deeply engrav'd, that he did not believe that any length of time could deface it.

All this while he kept himself in a silence, that amazed all those that stood upon the deck, a silence of a person troubled, irresolute and desperate. He so continued a long time, till at length lifting up his eyes towards Heaven, O ye immortal Gods, said he, what an unhappy fate is mine! And wherefore is it, that ye preserve me? He fixed his eyes upon the ground when he had uttered these words; and by and by turning himself toward me, whom he had some days before honoured with a particular confidence, he gave me to understand by a sign, that I should clear the deck of all the persons that were there. I understood his meaning, though not the reason more than any of the rest, only attributed it, as they did, to the beauty of Melisintha, which was able to work greater effects. Thereupon I caused them to retire where they might not be observers of his actions. When he had a little liberty, he beheld Melisintha with somewhat more confidence than before; and beginning to express himself, though in words interrupted with several sighs, Ab most inhumane Beauty, said he, that Beauty to which I have surrendred my heart; is it possible, that you should prove to be that Melisintha who so cruelly slew my Brother? “And is it possible, (replied the Princess with a languishing eye) that that person to whom I owe my life, and for whom I had a Soul full of acknowledgmet, should be the Son, and the Brother of the “cruel Destroyers and Enemies of our Family, and yet the preserver of my life? She stopp'd at these words, and the Prince seem'd to be touch'd in such a manner, that for a long time he was not able to make a reply, commending to his eyes the task of speaking for him, in the midst of that grief which impos'd that silence upon him. At length,

with some pains beginning to open his lips, O Gods, said he, can it be that a celestial beauty, and a Beauty which through my misfortune I adore, should be guilty of a cruelty detested by all the earth? The Princess's colour came into her face at this reproach, intimating something of disdain, and beholding the Prince with an eye incensed at something that the took amiss; and yet with a look wherein there appeared more of sweetness than extravagancy: Aldemar, said she, neither ought you to adore me, neither have you perhaps any reason to hate me; and although you are prepossessed with an unjust prejudice against me, you may understand in time that I should not be so criminal, were I less unhappy. Oh Melinthia, (replied Aldemar with a sigh) since you had espoused Gondemond, you ought not to have killed him; for you have other weapons to take away the lives of men, without embroiling your fair hands in blood. "I neither espoused Gondemond, replied the Princess, neither did I kill him. And though without blame I might have taken away the life of a person, who after he had deprived me of two Brothers, and the Crown of my Ancestors, would have deprived me of my Honour; yea, most certain it is, that he might have been still alive, for any thing that either my hands or my consent contributed to his death. Would to all the Gods, replied the Prince, that at the expence of all my blood, what you affirm, were true. But though we may be ignorant of the particulars of Gondemond's death, however it is publicly known that you were married to him. "All the world knows, replied she, that I was hurried to the Temple by force, to make me espouse Gondemond; but the whole Court of the Saxons knows as well, that at the Altar I refused him for my Husband, when they demanded my consent; and I will add this, that though my hatred toward him were such, that I would have rather chosen to die, than marry him, yet I neither desired his death, or if I had desired it, yet had I not the heart to dip my hands in blood. That was the blow of a stouter hand than mine; and I must also tell you, 'twas the stroke of necessity, and not of design; and that he that slew Gondemond, would sooner have spared his life, could he possibly have saved it without losing his own. I make this justification to you, Aldemar, as to my Judge, and the person who commands my life; but not to divert you from your resolution; or from what you owe to your Brother's revenge. My life is too unfortunate to desire the preservation of it from the Son of the King of the Saxons; and you may fulfil your Father's orders as to my person, as you have already disposed of my Father. As to what relates to your person, replied the Prince, I know well enough, what orders I have to obey; and as I have received my commands from a Sovereign more absolute than the King my Father, I will stand to consider what I have to do, as to the execution thereof; for though you see me much afflicted, you find me not irresolute: nor are you to look upon me as the commander or disposer of your destiny, since mine is at your devotion so long as I live; and be you but pleased to think how to repair the injury which you do me; seeing that although you should prove guilty of the crimes of which your enemies accuse you, of which my heart, no less than your lips, informs me that you are innocent; and that with the blood of Gondemond you had shed all the blood of our Family; I should not however stick one moment to lay down my life for the preservation of yours. "I should be willing to owe my life, replied Melinthia, to him who with the hazard of his own, defended it from the Pirates, but I would not willingly owe it to him that has so cruelly sent away my Father to be put to death. 'Tis very true, replied the Prince, that I have sent away Gifulphus to the King of the Saxons: but the sorrow that I feel for so doing, is not less than yours; and there is no danger to which I will not expose my self, to recover him from the place to which I have sent him. "O unhappy Parent, (replied the disconsolate Princess, letting fall a shower of tears from her fair eyes) and yet more unfortunate child, if she survive thee! Alas, what will become of thee? And what art thou not to fear from the cruelty of thy implacable Enemy? Aldemar was so inwardly touch'd with these her lamentations, and to behold the tears of Melinthia, that for a long time he was not able to speak, either to justify himself, or to console with her; and at length finding that he could neither do the one, nor the other, 'Tis not by words, said he, that I can express the part that I take in your affliction, and the sorrow that I have to be the cause of it: it must appear by deeds, only my endeavours must speak what I have in my heart, while I make use of all my power to preserve the Prince of Jutland. I will not tell you, that the King will give ear to my prayers; but I assure my self, that to the request which I shall make to him by a peculiar messenger of my own, which I will dispatch with all the speed imaginable, he will so far yield, as for some time to delay the execution of any design that he may have against his life, and in the mean while I will seek out all means to deliver him, though I exchange my liberty for his, and lay down my life for him. Receive in the name of all the Gods, all the reparation that I am able to give for the miseries which I have been the cause of; and be pleased to believe, that it no less concerns my repose than yours, that you should be satisfied. Melinthia found some comfort in these expressions of Aldemar, and in regard the safety of her Father was that which most employed her thoughts, and that which she preferred before all other things, she condescended for his sake, which she would not have done for any other consideration, to owe her Father's life to the Son of the Saxon King, though her great courage could hardly bend to be beholding to him for her own: Aldemar finding he had no time to lose, considering the danger which threatened the life of Gisulphus, dispatch'd away one of his own Attendants, whom he most relyed upon, to whose industry he recommended the management of that affair with all the Rhetorick that passion could put into his mouth. He instructed him in few words that he had to say, and gave him a Letter to the King, the substance whereof was this.

Our victory is entire, and you have taken Melisintha as well as Gisulphus. I shall bring her speedily my self, not daring to trust her in the hands of any other person, for very important reasons; and for the same weighty considerations I humbly beseech you, Sir, to stay till she be in your hands, before you execute the effects of your just anger upon her Father.

As he was sending away the person, he turn'd toward Melisintha, and whispering to her, Do not you believe, Madam, said he, that I would trust any other but my self in a business of this importance, if for the preservation of the Prince of Jutland it were not more necessary that I should be here than at Court. I hope you will soon find it; in the mean while, till you see the effect of my good will to serve you, suspend the hatred which by my misfortune you bear me. Till now I never bore a part in the injuries done to your Family; nor can I be accused of usurping your Territories, or of killing your Brothers: and therefore, next your self, I am more unhappy than criminal; and would to all the Gods, that my misfortune might endure no longer than the crime; and that in repairing my offence, as I hope I shall do, I may not be miserable till death, as I have reason to fear. Thus spake Aldemar, but the Princess made no reply otherwise than by certain looks that shewed more of grief than anger in her face; and which sometimes through the inclination we have to flatter our selves, gave him, as he thought, some reason to hope, that he should not remain all his life time so unhappy as he imagined.

For my part, (said the King of Suevia, interrupting Gismond in his discourse) I wish him nothing but misfortune; and I see already that he is in the number of those children that oppose themselves to their Parents inclinations; and that led by foolish and inordinate passion fail in their obedience to those that gave them their being. I thought, said Varanez smiling, that he was one of those that you had no kindness for, nor did I expect that you would be more favourable to him. Hitherto, Sir, (said Prince Balamir to the King of the Suevians) you have no great reason to accuse him, for though he had not been in love, yet compassion might move him to act for the safety of Gisulphus and Melisintha without any offence. I believe, said the King of the Suevians, that you would have done as he did; and this is not the first time that I have confess'd to you, that my disposition is not so mild as yours. Your disposition, replied Arderic, is not so fierce as you would make us believe; and well you know, that you have not been always an enemy to that passion which you so much exclaim against. I have heard him as well as you, (replied the Queen of the Cimbrians to the King of the Alains, smiling) but I am afraid that we shall see him ere long in a condition to want that pardon and forgiveness which he now so disdainfully slight. Let me never obtain it, replied the King of Suevia, if any such thing ever befall me: and in the mean time give me leave not to preserve it for any others that forget their duty. He had said more if they had not seen the Queens meat served up, which made them defer the rest of the adventures of Melisintha till after Supper, which they dispatched with more than ordinary haste, out of a desire to hear the remaining part. At length Supper being ended, they all took their Seats as before, and Gismond went on with his Relation.

The End of the Second Book of the Sixth Part.

PHARAMOND.

BOOK III.

Aldemar quitted his Cabbin to Melismtha, where he ordered her to be attended with that respect, as if she had been his Queen, and he himself her Subject born. This proceeding of his made a great part of the Saxons admire, who thought it not fitting for him to treat in such a splendid manner, a person whose destruction the King his Father fought at the expence of his Subjects blood. One part of them that observed it, attributed the cause thereof to the natural courtesie and mildness of the Prince, which would not permit him to use rigour toward a fair Princess, though she was devoted to the King's anger: others, to whom the power of beauty was not unknown, conjectured the truth, believing that the charms of Melismtha might work the same effect in his heart, as they had done upon the unfortunate Gondemond. However it were, there were none that murmured at it, as well for the reverence they bare to the virtue of the Prince, as for that they looked upon him as the person that was ere long to be their King; and therefore they most willingly conform'd themselves to comply with him, seeing it was his pleasure that the Princess should be honourably attended. The evening before he had her good night, coming to her with the countenance of a person, whose life and repose seem'd wholly to depend upon her; Madam, said he, I need not tell you, that you are free; for you know perhaps that the chains which the King of the Saxons prepared for his enemies, are rather prepared for his Sore; and that in reigning over my heart as you do, you also reign with sovereign authority over all places where I have any power. But it is time now for me to ask you what course you intend to take, and where you would that I should put you ashoar, that you may be out of your enemies reach. Melismtha seemed to be mov'd at this discourse of Aldemar, from whom she did not expect a resolution so far contrary to his Father's purposes; and beholding him with eyes that plainly shewed, that she had not utterly abolished that acknowledgment which she owed to his former services: Sir, said she, it becomes me not to abuse your generosity, nor to desire, that for me you should expose your self to the anger of the King your Father: but since in the liberty which you give me, you desire to know what I intend to do, I must tell you, Sir, that all my thoughts are fixed upon the preservation of my Father; and that instead of going to seek a Sanctuary in Denmark, where I might chance to find one, I rather study how I may have the freedom to offer my life to ransom Gifulphus, if the King your Father will accept it. The Gods, replied the Prince, preserve us from any such necessity: for I will sooner suffer death my self, than let you go to seek it, where you will infallibly find it without reaping any benefit thereby. We shall obtain our lives much more easily, while we are at liberty, than if we were in the King my Father's power, and though I make no question but he will grant me that delay which I have requested, yet I dare not rely farther upon my credit, to hope for more: and therefore instead of going near him, the better way will be to get as far off from him as we can, and that I land you in Jutland some two or three days hence, at what time the Danish Army will be advanced into the Country. There it is that I shall find means to accomplish a design which I have thought upon, for the liberty of Gifulphus; and if the success answer not my hopes, there is nothing which I will leave unessay'd, to repair the injury which I have done you, and to let you understand what I suffer in my heart for your afflictions. Melismtha was very unwilling to consent to what Aldemar propos'd, neither believing it to be just to abuse such generous intentions, or to be engaged to her enemies for such great obligations. On the other side she was assur'd, that she ought to leave nothing neglected to preserve her Father; and it was that consideration

which made her overcome all difficulties, which at another time would not have permitted her to do the same. She turn'd toward the Prince with a pensive look, and beholding him with all the marks of a troubled mind. I know very well, said she, that I ought not to give my consent to any resolutions that may be to your prejudice. But what ought I not to do for my Father's life? and what should I be able to say for my self, should I refuse any likelihood of its preservation? I once more own my self beholding to you for it, and I am willing to receive it at your hands, though not happy enough to merit your good intentions. You might perhaps do better to let an unfortunate Virgin perish, upon whom the Heavens have shewn'd for so many years together; but if that be not your purpose, dispose of my life, you and the Gods who have delivered it into your hands. At these last words, notwithstanding all the constancy of Melisinthæ, she could not forbear to shed some tears: And the Prince, who, if we may so say, receiv'd them all into his heart, looking upon her with a behaviour that easily discover'd his torment. Yes Madam, said he, I shall take care of your life, since you trust me with it, and would it might please the Gods that mine were not expos'd to greater misfortunes than can threaten yours: In the mean time, if it be possible, give some respite to your grief: And assure your self, that to dry up your tears, I will willingly expend all my blood. Concluding these words, he bid her good night, leaving her with her attendants in the Cabbin, which he had quitted, to take some rest himself after a day of so much labour.

After that fatal interview, wherein he wholly lost his Liberty, he suffered all that love could make a heart suffer, that was too deeply sensible thereof: For besides what he felt through the strange Effect of that violent Tempest that had so cruelly separated him from Melisinthæ, without giving him time to know who she was, and less hope ever to see her again; he had very rigorously prov'd, not only the severity of her absence, but the loss of his hopes, which was far more grievous and terrible. He lov'd, and lov'd with a violent passion, not knowing whom he lov'd. He had affected her above all things, and it was under this affection, that his soul continually labour'd; but if he had receiv'd any satisfaction, contrary to his expectation, yet it was an unhappy and cruel satisfaction, and perhaps he had reason to have wish'd, for the happiness of his life, that he had eternally been unacquainted with the fair cause of his sufferings. The torments, which till then, had turmoil'd his thoughts, might perhaps have something common with these other afflictions, to which the hearts of Lovers are liable; and probably he might not be the first that had lov'd without knowing the cause of his Love: But by this fatal acquaintance he saw himself expos'd to all that his evil Fortune could bring upon him, or rather he saw himself overwhelm'd in an Abyss of misery, where his reason forsook him, not being able to shew him any way how to get out. All the love which he had could not keep him from being sensible of somewhat of shame, for loving that person, who, as the general report went, had either slain his Brother her self, or been the cause of his death. The danger which threatned her during the King's life, and the sorrow he had for sending her Father into Captivity, and exposing him to a manifest danger, added a mortal fear to the rest of his disquiet, and well understanding the severity of Gisulphus; and his implacable hatred of the Saxon Kings, he had some cause to be jealous that the Memory of his first Services, would not blot out the Injuries which he had done him; and that though he should pardon what he had caus'd him to suffer under the Chains of the Saxon King, if he should prove so happy as to free him, yet that he would never consent to grant him Melisinthæ. To this consideration he added, that though the King were willing to consent, yet it was not wholly in his power, it being the common report that he was engaged to the Danish King, in whom he plac'd all his hope, and on whom he solely reli'd, on his Brothers behalf.

This last thought intermixing jealousy with his other passions, was not the least important that troubled him: And when after all the obstructions, which oppos'd themselves to his happiness; he considered that he had a Rival, and such a Rival, who had all the likelihood of being happy to his prejudice, since he had besides the advantages of his services; the inclination of Gisulphus, and perhaps those of Melisinthæ favourable to him: He could not find in all his courage, wherewith constantly to support this last effect of his evil Fortune. However, certain it is, that it was not his jealousy that most tormented him that night: And therefore seeing that that mischief, which was nearest at hand, and which at present most threatned him, ought to prepossess his care, rather than that which was farther off, and which time and his own courage might more easily remedy; he employ'd the greatest part of his industry about Gisulphus, how he might defend him from the dangers that threatned him, and by what means to gain his liberty. He knew he was to begin there, for that so long as Gisulphus was in prison, and in that danger, whereinto he himself had thrown him, he durst not only not open his lips to Melisinthæ, to tell her what he suffer'd for her sake fake, but could not well appear in her presence, guilty as he was of the just cause of her grief.

The fear he had to displease the King his Father, though it were very considerable, yet it was the least thing which he stopp'd at : And though at another time he might have beheld his anger as something too terrible for him ; yet now when the life of Melisimba, which seem'd absolutely to depend upon her Fathers, was concern'd, he laid aside all other considerations, he prepar'd himself without any hesitation, to undergo the most cruel disgrac that could happen to him : provided he might thereby restore Melisimba that comfort which he had taken from her, and that he might be look'd upon by her as her Friend, and not as her Enemy. He ponder'd upon the means the greatest part of the Night : And when he thought he had met with what he sought for, he not only felt some repose and intermission of his trouble, but he also perceiving the glimmering of some hopes that one day he should not be so unhappy, as he fear'd for himself, but that by the merit of his person, the advantages of his Birth, the Dignity to which he was advanc'd by the death of both his Brothers, he might at length prevail over Melisimba, and overcome the obstinacy of Gisulphus. For some intervals of time he also had some reason to delight himself with a pleasing flattery, and to judge by the reflexions that he had made, upon all that appear'd in the Countenance, in all the discourses, in all the actions of Melisimba, that she had no disaffection toward him ; and that if at the first meeting she had testifi'd as much acknowledgement as he could desire, in the last she had not manifested all the indignation, nor all the displeasure, which he had just cause to have fear'd from the order of his birth, or the imprisonment of her Father. In this turmoil of different thoughts, which sometimes comforted him, sometimes tormented him by intervals, he spent the whole night without sleep, and rose in the morning in such a condition, that you might easily perceive in his countenance the difference, between his morning discontent, and the troubles which perplex'd him when he went to bed.

While he waited till the Princess was ready to be seen, he gave some order about business ; but it was with such a discomposedness of his mind, that thereby 'twas an easie thing to discern the condition he was in ; and while he was thus employ'd, he receiv'd news by a Vessel dispatch'd from the Shore, that Sinibald in three days would enter Jutland, where Sigimer, who was one of the prime Nobility among the Jutlanders for his birth, and in whom Gisulphus had the great assurance for his fidelity, was got before into Arms with some Regiments of Natural Jutlanders, who for their faithfulness to their Prince, had fled from the Saxon Dominions, out of their Native Country, and were retir'd into Denmark ; and that with those Forces he had surpris'd Gelasiz, which is one of the most important Places in that Province, not above six miles distance from the Sea, and put the Saxon Garrison to the Sword, and that he had there fortifi'd himself, expecting the arrival of Sinibald, making daily incursions to the very Walls of the other Garrisons, and taking all opportunities to distress them. The Prince having receiv'd this news, kept himself silent for a while, as one that had his thoughts fix'd upon some strong imagination, and by and by turning himself toward us very pleasantly and calmly : I do not believe, said he, that if this place be so strong, as they say it is, that we shall be able to retake it by force, before the arrival of the King with his army : But it is not impossible for us to reduce it without the loss of one man, and I have thought upon a way that perhaps might take effect. He said no more, but presently understanding that he might visit the Princess without disturbance, he went to her Cabbin ; and when he entred he trembled all over, and look'd like one that was to appear rather before a Master or a Judge than before his Prisoner : He observ'd, by the eyes and behaviour of Melisimba, that she had taken as little rest as he ; nor was it any wonder to him, that the grief and sorrow which she labour'd under, had so disturb'd her rest. He sought also in her eyes what he could find of his own Fortune : where if he did not see there what he desired, yet did he not seem to find either too much cruelty, or too much disdain. In accosting her, he desired pardon of her for the inconvenience which she suffer'd upon the rude Element, to which she was confin'd : And the Princess having heard him with her usual sweetness : I must accustom my self, said she, to greater hardships, and I shall freely undergo them without making any complaint, or without bearing any ill will to them, that have caus'd them, so I might but save the life of my Father. I hope we shall, reply'd the Prince, for Fortune, favourable to my intention, promotes the execution of a design, which I have contriv'd for that purpose, and upon which I do relye, as the most assured means. Having spoken these words, after a short silence, he demanded of the Princess what Sigimer was, and how he stood with the Prince of Jutland : to which the Princess making answer, that he was one of the Prime Nobility of Jutland, and one whom for his inviolable fidelity Gisulphus had in most esteem; the Prince told her how that he had taken Gelasia by surprise, and ask'd her if she thought that he had so much kindness for her, to receive her into that place with eight or ten men only; of which number perhaps himself might be one. Melisimba beheld Aldemar for some time, without returning him any reply; but at length, Sir, said she, I do not question but that Sigimer would willingly receive me with a greater number of men than what you speak of, and I am well assur'd that he would do a great deal more for me than that: But I cannot understand, of what advantage that will be for my Father's preservation. You shall find that in the conclusion, reply'd the Prince, in the mean while, said he smiling, do not you fear that I intend to surprize the place, to put it again into my Father's possession. Instead of taking any thing from you, I intend to restore Jutland into your hands at the price of my blood; nor will I enter into such a Place, but in such a condition as may give no occasion of jealousy to Sigimer. You give me none at all, reply'd the Princess, and you may well judge that it is not for the preservation of a Town, that I would conceive the least suspicion of you, since my life and Fortune are in your hands, and that it is only by your means that I hope the preservation of my Father. But most sure it is, that I cannot apprehend, how that which you desire of Sigimer, can any way advantage it. You shall apprehend it suddenly, reply'd the Prince, and that it is only to advance my design without obstruction, and that I may remove that difficulty which you talk of, of exposing my self to the displeasure of the King my Father: You shall see how I will manage this affair, and all things shall be so carried, that Sigimer shall have no suspicion. The Princess consented to Aldemar's request, without endeavouring to inform her self any farther of his intention.

And for that the wind was favourable to carry them toward Gelasia, the situation whereof many that were about the Prince understood, and knew the entrance into the Harbour; we sail'd to the nearest shore with that speed, that in few hours we discover'd it; and in short, we got into Harbour in a very good hour, so as to land just before Sun set. Coming near the shore, the Prince, who in the Execution of his Design, was to observe some formalities to avoid the discovery, that the Souldiers might think he had a design to surprize the Town, he land'd, about two miles from the place, two thousand men, ordering the rest to attend his commands a Ship-board; and having plac'd these two thousand Souldiers at a post which he chose, with a command not to stir, till he order'd them to advance; he desired the Princess to take horse with her women and some men, who particularly attended on her, and immediately with ten or twelve men only, of which number he was pleas'd to make me one; we march'd toward Gelasia, being guided by one of Melisimba's servants: If they that were men experienc'd in war, were not a little astonish'd to see the Prince act in that manner, at a time, and in a Country, wherein he could not use too much caution; we who accompanied him, were yet far more surpris'd at his proceedings; and I being of that small train, could not apprehend his intentions no more than the rest, though I began now to perceive a good part of the effect, which Melisimba's beauty had wrought in his soul; so that we followed him with a silence that sufficiently testified our admiration: before we came near the place, some Horsemen appear'd, who without adventuring near kept at a convenient distance to observe our March and our number; and presently after, upon the report which they made, a great Body presented themselves full in our way, who seeing us March directly towards them, as persons that were no way afraid, yet neither prepar'd to fight, they came up to us in very good order: But when their Captain was about to speak to us, Aldemar shew'd him Melisimba, and nam'd her name to him: At which name so belov'd, and so ador'd by the Jutlanders; and at the sight of her, who was presently known by the Captain who led that Squadron, being the Son of Sigimer, all the Jutlanders made a great shout, and all the chiefest in Quality of the whole Party, alighting, came and paid their obedience to the Princess with all the joy imaginable. Immediately the Son of Sigimer sent to advertise his Father of the arrival of the Princess, and the Messenger made so much haste, that before the Princess could get to the Gates of the City, Sigimer very honourably attended by the best men of the City, came forth to meet her, and receiv'd her as his Sovereign, or rather as a Goddess: Melisimba return'd him many kind expressions, and many thanks for his fidelity; and Sigimer manifested the joy which he had to see her, at a time when he so little expected it; with all the demonstrations thereof imaginable. And moreover, he humbly thank'd the Gods, that had brought her thither at such a time, when he had no reason to fear any Enemy; and when, upon the arrival of Prince Smibald, whom they should see in two days at the head of fifty thousand men, he should see her Mistress of all Jutland, as her Ancestors had been before her.

But by and by Sigimer's joy was cruelly abated, when he began to think of Gisulphus. And it was not without many thousand tears, that he testifi'd to the Princess the sorrow which which he had for his Imprisonment, and the fear of that danger which threaten'd his life: Meliffintha answer'd the tears of Sigimer with tears of her own, and only contenting her self to tell him that she hop'd that Heaven would deliver him; she enter'd the City without discovering the Prince of the Saxons, whose mind she did not know, and who was look'd upon by Sigimer, only as one of her train, though his person were sufficiently remarkable, and without question had been taken notice of, if he had not pass'd among us for one of our fellow-servants: Till then Meliffintha was ignorant what Aldemar intended, at which she seem'd to be much troubled: But when she was in her Apartment, whither Sigimer had conducted her, and that our Prince took notice, that Sigimer, after he had excus'd to the Princess the bad Lodging which she would find in a place of War, and a Garrison, where the Saxons had put all things out of order; cast his eyes upon her more circumspectly than he had done before, asking the Princess withal how she came to escape out of Aldemar's hands, he gave us a wink to retire out of the Chamber; by which action, and by the following obedience that we yielded, he thought him to be our Master, and judged by all appearances that he saw in his person, that he was of no ordinary Quality. He began to look upon with some respect and esteem, when the Prince addressing himself to Sigimer; after he had turn'd to Meliffintha, with a behaviour that seem'd to crave leave to speak; Sigimer, said he, the Prince of Jutland is in the power of the King of the Saxons, and there is nothing to be omitted that may conduce to his preservation: I am Aldemar, and that's enough to tell ye, I am your Captive, as Gifulphus is the King my Father's Prisoner. And you have no other way to save his life, or obtain his liberty, but by offering to the King in exchange his own Son for Gifulphus; and by giving him to understand that just as he deals by Gifulphus, you will deal by his Son. I cannot tell whether he will prefer my safety before his own revenge: But I have some reason to hope; and I verily believe, that he will not lose the only Son he hath, merely to satisfy himself with the destruction of a single Enemy. You may send him news of my imprisonment, and your design: And you may use me after the same manner, as he uses the Prince. See, Madam, (so he continu'd his speech, turning himself toward Meliffintha) the reparation which I am about to make for the injury I have done you; and if I knew any other way more certain to deliver the Prince of Jutland, though it were more hazardous than this, I would most gladly embrace it: And with all my heart I would venture any thing more precious than my life for your satisfaction. Thus spake Aldemar to Sigimer and Meliffintha; and both the one and the other were so astonish'd at his discourse and behaviour, that instead of interrupting him, they remain'd a good while as if they had been dumb, without being able to answer him: Sigimer, who understood nothing of Aldemar's Love, and who could never have imagin'd him to be the Prince of Saxony, seeing so little likelihood thereof; was the more astonish'd. But because it was not for him to discourse before the Princess, concerning the Prince's Proposition, he held his peace, only looking upon him, to see whether he could find in his eyes the intention of his thoughts. But Meliffintha, who by reason of the knowledge which she had of the Prince's love, had the less cause to wonder; first recover'd her self, and beholding Aldemar with eyes that in the midst of their acknowledgement discover'd discontent. "How Prince, said she, was this then the design which you had to preserve my Father?" "If I knew a better way, replied the Prince, I would most certainly follow it, though I were sure to meet my present death. But the Gods are my witnesses, that I know but only this, and that I look upon this as the only means to redeem your Father." "Though it be the most assured, replied Meliffintha, yet it is not the honestest, nor the justest way for us to accept; and though I bare as great a hatred to you, as I did toward Gondemond, I would not entertain a profer, to which I cannot hearken, without committing a piece of Treachery unworthy of my Birth and Courage." "Then you desire not the preservation of your Father's life, reply'd Aldemar, and you make your self guilty of his death, if you withstand the only means which you have to save it: My Father's life is more dear to me, reply'd Meliffintha, than my own; but I would preserve it by ways less dishonourable; and less criminal: For though yet you were our lawful prisoner by the fate of War, and not by an act of your own Generosity, which we dare not abuse, I am not to look upon you as the Son of the Saxon King; when I call to mind that it is to you that my Father and my self already owe our lives, and that we had perhaps been expos'd to suffer something worse than death, had you not rescu'd us from the Pyrates; You owe much more, reply'd the Prince, to your Father, than to him that had you that service: And I will add this moreover, that you save him, without injuring me; since in his Liberty I shall find my own, and that in becoming your Prisoner, I am not expos'd to any danger, from whence you cannot redeem me when you please." "I cannot tell you, reply'd Meliffintha, whether I shall be always Mistress of so much power, and there may fall out accidents that perhaps may alter my inclinations. When that falls out, (replied the Prince, beholding her with a passionate look) will you envy me the honour of having exposed my self, to any thing of danger for the love of you? Or would you have me believe to my mischief, that the reluctance which you testify against an offer so advantageous to you, is rather an effect of the ill will which you bear me; than of your generosity altogether unseasonable, when it pleads against your Father's preservation? The Prince uttered these words in so sad a manner, and with so many Signs of love and grief mixt together, that Melismtha was deeply sensible thereof: But when with some tears that flowed from her fair eyes, upon the apprehension of her misfortune; she expressed the dislike she had of being beholding to remedies contrary to her inclination; Sigimer, who had been silent all this while, and in whom the love of his Prince was more prevalent than any other consideration, taking upon him to speak, and addressing himself to Melismtha; "Madam, said he, you have reason to make some scruple, of accepting the proposition of the Prince of the Saxons: Nor is it just that in submitting himself to your power, out of his only desire to serve you, that he should fall into the condition of real Prisoners. But now that the life of a Father, whom you have always held most dear, lies at stake; you cannot refuse the means which the Prince puts into your hands to save him, without being guilty of a great error: And you ought to embrace it so much the more willingly, because you no way endanger the Prince's life, seeing there is no likelihood to the contrary, but that it will be altogether at your disposal. Melismtha held her eyes for a long time fix'd upon the ground, without being able to determine what resolution to take: but at length looking upon the Prince with a behaviour full of tenderness; "Since, said she, your will and my evil fortune constrain me, I consent to that seeming appearance of your imprisonment, which may restore me my Father: but it is only the shew of an imprisonment which I accept: For though I should be so unhappy as not to recover my Father by this means; I would rather consent to my death, than that you should fall into any other greater mischief. These words did so rejoice the passionate Prince, that the presence of Sigimer could not debar him from casting himself at the Princess's feet, and embracing her knees with such a behaviour, that Sigimer made no farther doubt of what he had conceived before in his mind. Melismtha blushing withal raised him up, not letting him discern any thing in her eyes to the contrary, but that she might at length be sensible of this fair proof of his love. Presently they resolved that to take away all suspicion of the truth, especially from the King of the Saxons, that it was his voluntary act to become a prisoner, they order'd him a Guard, and observ'd all the formalities of a seeming strictness usual upon such occasions: And the Prince the more to oblige them to it, assured them that he more feared the anger of the King, than the danger of being neglected and forsaken by him, in case he should know him to be a voluntary prisoner and out of all jeopardy. Sigimer at the same time sent for a Guard, and when he had placed them at the door of the Chamber, the Prince sent for us to come to him, and speaking to one of his Pages with a countenance apparently sad; "Go, said he, tell Alderic (that was the name of the Officer in chief, whom he had left to command the two thousand men which he had landed) I command him to retire a Ship-board, and that all the Fleet return home, not being able to reduce this place to set me free, nor to keep the Field against the powerful Army of the Danes, which are marching into the Country. Alderic may tell the King, that in going about to surprize this place I was surpris'd my self, and that through the ill success of a young mans rash attempt, I am a prisoner to the Enemy, and destin'd to the same fortune that shall be shewed Gisulphus. With those instructions he sent him away with one of the Princess's Attendants, to whom the ways were better known but with order to return again with the same person. As we were but nine or Ten that kept with him, whom he had chosen among all his Servants to be near him, out of the confidence he had in their fidelity, we were with less trouble always about him: and though we knew our selves to be prisoners, yet such was our affection for him, and such were the charms of his person, that we were all unanimously contented to stay, and we thought our selves honoured by the choice he had made of us, to be companions of his fortune. Though he were appearingly a prisoner, and perhaps by Sigimer's order not conformable to that of the Princess more than she believed him to be: He was however attended with all manner of service and respect, and with all the observance that he could have commanded in his Father's Court. Then it was that among all those that were about him; (of whom the greatest part had more reason to have expected the same advantage) that he reposed the greatest trust in my self, and that he then discovered the particular secret that lay concealed in his breast. Then it was that I understood from his own relation, what he had suffered from the first view of Melismtha, the particulars of what discourse had had passed between us, such as I have already recounted to you, and what had befall'n him since that fatal meeting, by reason of that imperious passion that was become the sole Mistress of his heart. From the knowledge which I had thereof, I ceased to wonder at many things that had surpris'd me; like those of which I was a witness some days before: And for the honour which he did me to trust me so far with the secret of his imprisonment, and with what ever else had befall'n him of greater importance in his life; I engaged myself to his service with a passion most invincible, and a fidelity most inviolable.

All this while his imprisonment was the most pleasing that might be, though not so much for his gentle usage, as for the happiness which he had to see Melisimba every day, and indeed at all hours that discretion would permit. In short, that fair Princess who did not forget, the great obligations which she had received from him, and who perhaps found in his person, sufficient ground for thoughts more favourable, than only those of acknowledgment; beheld him with all manner of kindness: And if he found her not so sensible of his love as he desired, at least he had this advantage, that she endured the testimonies that he gave thereof, and that by a compliance to which he had oblig'd her, rather than out of a natural disposition; he had prevail'd with her to hear him discourse of his affection. That was his greatest happiness, only this afflicted him, that though he conjectur'd by the behaviour of the Princess, that her inclinations were not contrary to his, yet he was no less convinced that those inclinations, would however in the end be subordinate to her Father's will. Notwithstanding, he remained sufficiently content with the first days of his imprisonment: But when he understood that Sinibald was advanced into the Country, and was within a few days march of the Town where we were, perhaps out of a design to visit Melisimba, of whom he was passionately enamour'd, and of whom by the promise of the King of the Danes and the Prince of Jutland, he expected the entire enjoyment; Jealousie awaking in his breast, so excessively tormented him, that his affliction shew'd it self apparently in his countenance: and the Princess having perceived it as soon as we, besought him to tell her the cause in so obliging a manner, that easily manifest'd how deeply she was concern'd in his disquiet. Aldemar was unwilling to deny her, and therefore after a few sighs; Hitherto Madam, said he, I did not think that I had done any thing in your behalf, but what was very inconsiderable, and that to restore the liberty of Prince Gisulphus, I ought to have exposed my self to some far greater danger than this of an imprisonment: But as pleasing and as honourable as it is, there is something in it more severe and harsh than you are aware of, and I fear you will have reason to remember one day, that to serve you I have put my self into the power of my Rival. I do not well understand what it is you mean (replied the Princess with a smile) nor can I believe that whatsoever pretence you make, Sigimer can be your Competitor. All that behold you, replied the Prince, are in jeopardy to be my Rivals, but I confess it is not Sigimer that troubles my thoughts, nor did I think but that you would have easily guessed him to be Sinibald of whom I gave you the hint. As you are not in the hands of Sinibald, replied Melisimba, so could I not conjecture that you spake of him: And as I am ignorant that you two have the same designs and the same inclinations, I could not believe that you had any design to call him Rival. How Madam, (replied the Prince beholding her with a passionate look) do you believe that I have less love for you than Sinibald, and that I pretend less than he to the honour of serving and adoring you till death? I know not well, (replied the Princess blushing when she spake) what to resolve or what judgment to make in this particular: But I would willingly owe to your virtue alone whatever you have done for us, and as it is most probable that we are not born one for the other——Here the Prince interrupted her, “Alas! said he, if I am not born for you, I am born for an untimely grave: And without doubt I must cease to live, that very instant that I cease to be yours. But Madam, (so he continued beholding her with a languishing aspect) can you be so cruel as to forbid me to hope? or can you forget that hope is a happiness that attends the most miserable to the grave? “As it is not for me to give you any hope, replied the Princess, so neither is it for me to deny it you: But you must wicah remember, that it is not either by our inclinations, or our own private thoughts that we are to be govern'd, but by our fortune and by the will of our Parents. “As for my inclinations, replied Aldemar, I know they will never submit, either to Paternal Authority, or the Empire of fortune. But as for yours, concluding with a sigh, I dare not hope that they will be ever favourable to me. And I fear much more your inclinations, than either the power of fortune or any other obstruction which the enmity of our Parents can raise in my way. “However they are strong enough, replied the Princess, to make you confess that I spake the truth, when I told you that 'tis very probable that we were not born one for another: And as you know the intentions of your Father, I believe that as for mine, his resolutions are so fix'd, as for ever to shut his eyes to all advantages, though never so truly visible, in any design that you should have for his daughter. “As for my Father, replied Aldemar, I have great hopes that reason, and his great desire to preserve the only Son he has left remaining, may allay his obstinacy: And for the Prince of Jutland I do not despair, by those services wherewith I may oblige him, to vanquish the ill will which he bears to our house, and to bring him to take it into consideration that I am not Gondemond, though I am the Son of the King of the Saxons: and that I never was concern’d in those injuries that have drawn your hatred upon us. But it is from you Madam that I fear all my unhappiness: Nor will my Courage fail me to hope for a Victory over all other difficulties, if you your self prove not more favourable to the fortune of Sinibald, than to that of the unhappy Aldemar. “I have but even now given you to understand, replied the Princess, that so long as I lived I would be always obedient to my Father’s will, and that I have strictly observed that rule, in all that has hitherto pass’d upon the proposals of the King of Denmark and of Sinibald. “That’s to do all that can be expected, replied the Prince, for that is in the end to bestow your person upon Sinibald. Though I should be still in hopes yet, were not you more kindly disposed toward my Rival: For there is something already fall’n out, and many other things may happen in the course of the Prince of Jutland’s affairs, which may disengage him from his promise, though it were true that he had made it. “I am able to say this, replied the Princess, that it was not my inclination that mov’d at all in that affair, and that they hardly took any notice of my consent. However it is true that I made no opposition, nor will I oppose as long as I live, what is impos’d upon me by my duty. “But now, replied Aldemar, this happy Lover begins to approach, he comes to see a Rival in captivity, who might cross his fortune were his fortune equal, and it will be to his happiness that I must be sacrificed, and not for the preservation of Gisulphus, nor for the satisfaction of Melisantha. If you think that Sinibald will be able to derive any advantage from your imprisonment, I advise you not to tarry here but to return to your Father, without having any cause to fear that your withdrawing your self, shall any way blot out of my remembrance, those obligations which I owe to your generous endeavours. “I would not stay, replied the Prince, were the King of Jutland at liberty, but as I have no other way to restore him to his freedom, than by remaining in the power of my Enemies; I will rather expose my self to all the cruelty, which the fortune of my Rival can make me suffer, than forsake Gisulphus in the danger wherein I plunged him, through my own unhappy Error. “In exchange of this generous resolution, replied the Princess, I will debar Sinibald from making any advantage of your imprisonment: and perhaps you shall find little reason to be jealous, of your being sacrificed to his happiness. “Were I sufficiently happy, (replied the Prince transported with joy) to dare the presumption of hoping, that in the favour of a Prince who dies for love of you, and with whom your condition would be no way inferior, or less prosperous than with the Brother of the King of the Danes———Here Melisantha interrupting him; “How, said she, can you have any such kindness for a miserable Virgin, detested of all the world for the report of her cruelty, and would you be so venturous as to espouse her, who according to the general opinion of the Saxons, is the reputed Murtheress of Gondemond? “If Gondemond suffered death, replied the Prince, he well enough deserved it: And he had been more than happy, if in truth according to what most believe, he had received it at your fair hands. So that it is not the fear of a Destiny like his; that can divert me from my purpose: and I dare dye as well as he in the prosecution, but not by arming either yours or the hands of Gisulphus against my life. “My Father and I, replied the Princess, know how to make the distinction: for indeed we have as much reason to esteem you and to account our selves happy in your service; as we had reason to abominate Gondemond. “With that, replied Aldemar, perhaps it becomes me not that I should hope to be more happy than he: Nor is it my wish that either fortune or your inclinations should be more favourable to me: At least there is little likelihood, said Melisantha, that the King your Father will consent to what he desired for Gondemond: and seeing that Melisantha who at that time was guilty of no offence toward him, is now become too hateful to him to accept her for his daughter. The Prince was about to have made a reply, when Sigimer entered the Chamber to bring her News, that Sinibald having taken by onset, one place of strength that opposed his entry into Jutland; he was become Master of another by composition: and that he would that day quarter within a days march of Gelasia, from whence on the morrow it was very probable, he would endeavour to give her a visit. Though Aldemar had prepared himself to receive this news, he could not hear it without changing colour: And Melisantha who perceived it, gave him an occasion to discover some discontent on the other side in her own countenance: Yet she was willing to conceal it before Sigimer, and and beginning her speech with a smile, that shewed however as if it had been forced: I fear me, said she to Sigimer, we have not free leave to be glad before Aldemar, for the prosperous beginning of our success; and indeed modesty forbids in his presence to shew any signs of joy, which are to him rather cause of sorrow. Now for that the Prince would not express himself before Sigimer, he made no reply at all to the discourse of the Princess, being contented only to let her see by a look accompanied with sighs, that it was the visit of Sinibald that he feared, and not the progress of his Arms.

That fear was the reason that he rested very little the next night. Nor was the following day less troublesome to him, for as Sigimer well foresaw, Sinibald arrived much sooner than he was expected. The Prince was with Melisintha when she was inform'd that Sinibald was at the door, with a fair retinue of the Danish Nobility, and a great part of the Officers of the Army, who attended him to render the pomp of his visit the more magnificent; whereupon the Princess, understanding by his eyes the anguish of his mind, desired him to let her know whether he would see Sinibald, or whether he would retire while she received his visit. The Prince considered a long time what course to take; for if on the one hand, the envy he bore his Rival obliged him to avoid his sight, in a place where he appeared with all the advantages of a happy Lover, and of a Lover destined to enjoy Melisintha: on the other side, the unwillingness which he had to give him place, importun'd him to stay with Melisintha, and to disturb by his presence a great part of the joy which the other had promised himself in seeing her. But when he remembered that he was to act the part of a prisoner, and that the Princess, though she permitted him all that freedom, would perhaps be troubled that Sinibald should find him with her, at a time when perhaps he thought him more closely secured; and fearing that his presence should cause some unnecessary reservedness in the reception which she was obliged to give him, he made a low obeysance to the Princess, and retired to his Chamber. I shall not say any thing of the visit which Sinibald gave to Melisintha, or of the discourse which they had together, of which I never had any knowledge, neither is it pertinent to our purpose; only this I must tell you, that after he had stay'd some time with Melisintha, he thought himself obliged in point of Honour to visit the Prince of the Saxons; and though he look'd upon him as his Rival, and perhaps understood beyond suspicion, that his voluntary imprisonment, and the liberty of Melisintha, were but the effects of that love which he had for her, rather than for any other cause which they alledged, with less appearance of truth. Yet what he owed to the Dignity of such a Prince, and the fame that his great reputation had raised him, made him lay aside all unkind thoughts, and having sent Sigimer before, to know if it were convenient, he enter'd his Chamber with a good part of that fair train that attended him. Being near the Prince with the rest of my companions, I saw Sinibald, and observed him very curiously; he was a Prince of a noble carriage, a fair proportion, and a lofty aspect, about thirty years of age, Renown spake very advantageously on his side: and it was said that he had performed many famous Actions in foreign Countries, where some discontent had made him lead a good part of his life; and that if he had been in Denmark at what time the Saxons made war upon it, he might have given to his Country as great an assistance, as it received from the valour of Prince Viridomar.

As Aldemar was naturally endued with entire principles of Honour and courtesie, at that time methought he appeared more constant in his resolution than ordinary; and though he entertain'd Sinibald to the height of civility, yet he seem'd to carry himself more haughtily, than perhaps he would have done, had he not been a prisoner. Sinibald who had not the same expectancy to wear a Crown, as Aldemar, and who understood well the distinction which that difference of Birth had made betwixt them, strictly tyed himself to that observance which became the interview, and was not wanting to pay to the Prince that respect which was his due. We observed also that his presence had in a manner surpris'd him, and that whatever he might have heard reported concerning his person, did nothing at all diminish his admiration upon the sight of his person.

After the first complements that usually pass upon interviews of the same nature, Sinibald gracefully address'd himself to Prince Aldemar, telling him, that though he were infinitely troubled to see a Prince of his merit in the custody of his enemies, yet he could not but look upon this unhappiness of his, as an effect of his good fortune. And that in the design which he had to re-establish Jutland under the jurisdiction of its lawful Prince, he could not have freed it from a greater obstruction of its quiet, than it would have found in the opposition of his valour. Aldemar, notwithstanding his inward rancor, could not choose but kindly hearken to this discourse of Sinibald, and to pay him what he had lent, he told him, that against the obstruction of his valour, all opposition was too feeble, and that in such an attempt as he had undertaken, he would most certainly meet with greater difficulties, than what he might have found in vanquishing a young man like him, little experienced in war, but that he would probably meet with others able to oppose him; and that he should find his words true, by the event of his success against enemies more formidable than himself: and that it was in vain for him to flatter himself with hopes, that from his hand alone Melisintha was to receive the Crown of her Ancestors. Sinibald smiled at this discourse of Prince Aldemar, yet keeping himself within the bounds of that respect which he was resolved to observe towards him: I confess, said he, that the honour of restoring the Crown to Melisintha, is an honour to be coveted by all the Princes in the world; but as there are none more devoted to her service than my self, I have hopes that fortune will prosper my good intention with a success answerable. All good intentions, replied Aldemar, are not always favoured by fortune: and as it greatly concerns me to wish that you may not have all the success which you desire, I also hope that you will find more powerful opposition than you are aware of. I had some reason to fear it, replied the Danish Prince, were you to fight at the head of your Father's Army; but since they are deprived of so powerful an assistance, you must give me leave not much to doubt the victory. Were we to encounter one another, replied the Saxon Prince, I am persuaded we should put our selves to a considerable trouble, and I believe, that to which side soever the victory should fall, neither of us would be ashamed of being conquered. But as I do not at all despair, that such a thing may come to pass, be pleased to defer till that time the decision of an argument which only the chance of war can determine. Sinibald would no longer enlarge upon that subject, for fear of exasperating Aldemar, by whose countenance he found that he might be easily provoked. And after some farther discourse upon some things of less moment, he took his leave, telling the Prince, that he would advise the Princes to consider what was due to his Dignity, and his Merit; and that for his part, he would render him all the service, which in the condition wherein he was, he could expect from a Prince that understood how to respect his virtue. This is the sum of what passed at their first interview.

The next day Aldemar, who had the liberty, in the view of Sinibald, and all the world, to walk about the Castle, return'd him his visit, where all things were carried with extraordinary civility. But the same day meeting again in the Princesses Lodging, taking his observance from the interest which my Prince seemed to have, he grew to be settled in the jealousy which he had of his love, by several signs and tokens; and consequently, from that moment he conceived that hatred against him which is usual among Rivals. That which lay boiling in Aldemar's breast against him, was no less: and he thought himself so much the less obliged to dissemble it, by how much he believ'd him the happier of the two, looking upon him as the person that went to deprive him of all his bliss, and make him miserable.

They conferr'd a long time concerning Gisulphus's imprisonment, it being Sinibald's purpose to put Melisintha upon that discourse, to awaken her displeasure against the person that had sent her Father into captivity; and after some time spent upon this Subject, Sinibald addressing himself to Aldemar: I fear me, Sir, said he, that the confinement of the Prince of Jutland, is not so mild, nor so commodious as yours; and though we may hope that for your sake the King of the Saxons may abate something of his rigour, you must of necessity confess, that there is a fair difference between his Fetters, and Melisintha's Chains. That which you say, is most true, replied the Prince, and yet in some respect the difference is not so great; for there is hopes of being freed from the chains of the Saxon King, but in Melisintha's fetters we abide till death. Then I dare believe, said Sinibald, that you are in danger of being a long time a prisoner; and it would be more troublesome to be a prisoner to the Princess, as I find you here, were you not also under that confinement which I imagine. You may very often guess at the truth, replied Aldemar, if all your conjectures are as truly grounded upon reason as this; and I believe as well as you, that it is more easie to get out of the prison which you see, than that which you suppose. If this misfortune have befallen you, replied the Danish Prince, I pity your condition more than I did at first; for it is too severe to be a double captive in Melisintha's fetters. I do believe, said Aldemar, that my misfortunes are sad enough to move compassion; but it is not to you that I ascribe any cause thereof, nor from you that I beg that pity, nor do I find myself touch'd with that acknowledgment, which you may think it deserves. I am always ready to do what I can, replied Sinibald, in bewailing those evils of yours, which I am not able to assuage, and where I may be able to afford relief, you may be confident I shall not content my self with a single sorrow. You are too generous, replied the Prince, and I ought not to abuse your intentions; but perhaps you have more reason to be troubled at my last misfortune than the first, seeing that by the first you get an advantage, but by the last you are only engaged in a vexatious turmoil. I know so well well how to disengage my self, said Sinibald, as not to fear any perplexity. Perhaps you never met with the like, (replied Aldemar very smartly) but neither in the Princess's presence; nor for me that am a prisoner, is it expedient to say more, especially since we may meet with other opportunities to explain our selves. I expect them as earnestly as you can do, said Sinibald, and I take them to be so honourable, as to assure you, that I shall be always joyful to meet them. They had said more if Melisintha had not interrupted them, by changing the subject of their discourse, and by letting Sinibald perceive in her eyes the distaste she took, to see him so offensive to such a prisoner as Aldemar. They met several times after that, and talked with the same briskness, but without going any farther, by reason the Princess took care to hinder it, and out of the fear that either had to displease her.

In the mean time Sinibald's jealousy increased to that measure, that he could no longer conceal it. I cannot tell what particular demonstrations he might give of it to Melisintha, but he manifested it to the Prince by several signs, whereby he foresaw that he would not long maintain that civility towards him, which he had assured him in the beginning. It was our belief, that he was very much troubled what to do with him; for in one respect, the hatred which he bore him, made him wish that he might be kept as close a prisoner, as if he had been taken in war; or at least, that a part of that liberty which he had, might be taken from him. In another regard, he wish'd that they would send him quite away, not being able, without a great deal of impatience, to suffer his abode so near the Princess, believing, that there he did him more mischief, than he could have done at the head of our Army. I know not what designs he might have put in execution, had he made any longer stay at Gelasia, but he was constrained to depart from thence sooner than he desired; for seeing that he had undertaken to expel all the Saxons out of Jutland, who possess'd the whole Country, except only three Towns; and for that he also understood that the King was already upon his march to find him out, it was high time for him to repair to his Army, which he did forthwith, having first represented to Melisintha, by what we understood after his departure, that if she would not be guilty of the loss of her Father, she should confine Aldemar after another manner than she did; that in all probability, the King of the Saxons, seeing himself likely to lose Jutland, would take some fatal revenge upon Gisulphus, if the fear of losing his Son did not put a stop to his fury; and that she ought not only to deprive Aldemar of all opportunity and hope of liberty, otherwise than by an exchange for Gisulphus; but also to make him use the more diligence to solicit her Father's freedom, she ought to make his confinement more irksome than hitherto it had been, and to deny him the happiness of her conversation, so delightful to him, to the end he might with more impatience desire enlargement.

After Sinibald's departure we received news of the King, by those whom the Prince and Melisintha had sent to him, to inform him of Aldemar's imprisonment, and to propose his exchange for Gisulphus, who reported that the King was transported with joy that Gisulphus was taken; and that he had thundered out his displeasure, in threatening what torments he would have inflicted upon him, if the person who was sent from the Prince to beseech him to defer his anger, had not arriv'd to prevent the execution; that the Prince's Letter had wrought the effect that was desired, and that the King, delaying his revenge, had put Gisulphus in the hole of the prison, where he used him with all sort of rigour; and that for some days he had fed himself with pleasing hopes, to sacrifice both the Father and the Daughter to the Ghost of Gondemond. But soon after, when he received news of the Prince's imprisonment, and the danger he was in to undergo the same misery that Gisulphus endured, this joy was suppressed by a most violent grief: in the midst whereof he hardly knew which went nearest to his heart, whether the danger that threatened the life of his Son, or the obstruction of his revenge. At first he was absolutely resolv'd to return Gisulphus, for the preservation of his Son, and that he had caused the Prince of Jutland to be removed to a more decent prison, and less severe, though he kept as strict a Guard upon him as ever. But at length reflecting upon the particulars, which they had related to him of taking the Prince, causing them to be repeated over and over again, and having better examined the circumstances than he had done before, he found so little of likelihood and conduct in his design, that at length he concluded that his imprisonment could not be other than voluntary, and that through the beauty of Melisintha he was infallibly fallen into the same passion, that had been the ruine of his Brother; that he was the more easily persuaded to believe this mischance, because it was no more than he had feared; and that he now made no doubt at all, but that the request which the Prince had made to him, to respite this revenge upon Gisulphus, was but an effect of his love for his Daughter: That upon these conjectures, which by little and little from suspicion turn'd to an absolute conviction, he fell into such a rage against Aldemar, which appeared no less violent than his other passions, that he called him a hundred times Traitor, ingrateful and perfidious; and vowed, that he would let him perish a thousand times, rather than he would abandon the revenge of Gondemond; that he had detain'd for some days those that were sent, not being resolv'd what answer to return. But that he had dismiss'd them at length with an express command to tell the Prince, that the life of such a perfidious Traytor as himself, was nothing so dear to him, as what he owed to the memory of his Brother; and that if for his Honours sake he were obliged to redeem him, he would redeem him by force of Arms, and not with the liberty of Cisulphus.

This was the answer which the Agents of Aldemar and Melisintha brought back, the recital whereof overwhelm'd them with a sorrow so excessive, that all the force of their courage was but little enough to withstand it. But though Melisintha's grief was extraordinary, yet was it more moderate than the Prince's, who refus'd to admit of any consolation, when he call'd to mind, that it was his own act that had plung'd him into a danger from whence he was not able to recover him, he accus'd himself before her, and besought her to throw him into some Dungeon, that he might suffer like her Father, to load him with Irons, and to let his Father understand, that it was in her power to use the utmost extremity towards him, if her Father was not set at liberty. But the generous Princess, afflicted as well to see him take on, as tormented with her own sorrow, on the contrary besought him to retire, and not to draw upon himself the anger of his Father, nicely to pleasure two unfortunate persons, and not to link himself to the misfortune of a House abominated by Heaven, and deliver'd up to all the strokes of celestial vengeance for many years. There were several generous contents and disputes between them upon this subject, till at length the Prince compelled the Princess to submit to his reasons, telling her that his imprisonment would secure the life of her Father, though he might not gain his liberty thereby; that his Father had no more Sons to inherit his Crown, and that however he was at present enraged against him, he would act nothing against her Father's life, while he remained in her power. He desired her therefore to let him venture a second Letter, wherein, after he had confessed the truth, he would implore his pity, and try what he could obtain from his Fatherly affections, which design of his, the Princess well approving in the person of a Son, who might without any dishonour, humble himself to his Father how submissively soever. He dispatch'd away one of his Pages with a Letter to the King, the substance whereof was this.

Prince Aldemar to the King of the Saxons.

*S*ir, I confess I am an offender, I confess I am doubly a prisoner to Melisintha, and I am fallen into that misfortune so fatal to your House, which you have so much dreaded for my sake. But, Sir, I am perhaps through this misfortune, become more worthy of your pity, than your anger: for I shall be miserable indeed, if by the effect of my over-ruling destiny, where my will has had no power, I must be thus expos'd to all manner of infamy. But, Sir, since you have seen Melisintha, since you have experienced the charms of her beauty, by the fatal proofs thereof, will you expose me to this inevitable danger? Or can you think it strange that I have received a wound, seeing that my heart is not invulnerable, and that I am also Brother of Gondemond. That which you approv'd, that which you favour'd, that which you desired for Gondemond's sake, is that now a crime in me, because that Melisintha whom he lov'd in her innocency, is now accus'd for the death of Gondemond? But, Sir, you may inform your self from the mouth of Cisulphus, he will charge himself with the whole crime, and clear Melisintha from having contributed so much as a thought to the death of my Brother: I accuse him not to incense your anger against him, since he can expect no other effects of it, but what may prove fatal to himself, but only Sir to inform you, that in loving Melisintha, I do not love the murderers of Gondemond; I am therefore less faulty than I have confess'd. And, Sir, you will understand by my Page, that it was not since my last departure from you, that I became a Captive to the beauties of Melisintha. I saw her by a fatal accident before, and from that time my heart has been on fire; and when I ran with zeal to obey your commands, and to revenge my Brother's death, when I was preparing to find you Melisintha, as I had sent her Father, I found my self fetter'd in her chains, and through that misfortune that took away my liberty, I saw my self unable to dispose of others. Sir, upon this confession that I make of my misfortunes, if there be any affection yet remaining in your your heart for me, I beg of you the life and liberty of Gifulphus: he can suffer nothing of which I am not guilty. And if I cannot restore to Melisinthā a Father whom I have deprived her of, I will surrender my life to her satisfaction, and pour forth at her feet, all that remains of your illustrious blood in the veins of the only surviving and most unfortunate of all your children.

Having sent away the Page, the Prince continued for some days overwhelmed with such a load of grief, that would certainly have press'd down his life to the grave, had it not been mitigated by the happiness which he enjoyed of Melisinthā's company, especially since he enjoyed it with more freedom than he could possibly do while Sinibald was in Town. He could not find that either in her countenance, in her discourse, or in her behaviour there appeared any thing to make him have an ill opinion of his fortune, until that the King had so cruelly declared his intentions, and that it was rather the reserv'd discretion of Melisinthā, than any distaste or prejudice which she had against him, that for the present harden'd the heart of the Princess against his love and merit. At the same time also he knew well enough, that notwithstanding all the promises of Gifulphus, and whatever Articles had been agreed to in Denmark, Sinibald was not yet so certain of his happiness as he imagined himself to be; and that if Melisinthā had any way yielded to give her consent to the marriage, she was rather guided by her obedience, than her own inclination.

In the mean while we received news every day in the place where we were, of Sinibald's proceedings: and we heard that in all parts he had worsted the Saxons that were in Jutland, and had taken several places of importance, either by main force, or by means of that correspondence which Gifulphus held through the whole Province; and most men concluded, that he would in a short time reduce all Jutland under the obedience of Melisinthā, when he understood that the King of the Saxons was at Sea with a power equal to his, and that he made for that Cape which is commonly called the Cimbrian Promontory. This news instead of troubling him, did much rejoice the Danish Prince, and without wavering or studying what resolution to take, he rais'd the Siege which he had laid to a certain Town, and march'd directly to meet the King, with much stoutness and resolution. Then it was that the Prince received the answer which he expected upon the return of his Page, where he beheld the King's resolution in these words.

The King of the Saxons to Prince Aldemar.

Return to your Duty, forbear to love your Enemies, and come and fight in the revenge of your Brother. Upon these conditions only will I receive you as my Son, and will pardon you the injury which you have done me.

Upon reading this short Letter, and a more large explanation of the inclinations of the King, which he received from his Page by word of mouth, he felt such an increase of his grief, that he began to forget all considerations of filial respect. I know, (said he, speaking of the King) that he is my Father, and at the same time I understand that he is my King; but in neither of these two qualities has he sufficient authority to claim that power over my heart, as to deface the image of Melisinthā there. It may rule there in despite of him, since it will tyrannize there in despite of my self, though I had a design to banish it thence. Nor is there any Duty, nor any authority that can command me out of the bonds of her beauty. After that he bitterly express'd his dislike of the King's proceedings; and reflecting upon the little care he seem'd to take of his life, rather choosing to leave him to the mercy of his enemies, than to redeem him by an exchange for Gifulphus. I have not merited, said he, this low contempt; for surely the life of a Son, and of a Son not unworthy of his descent, ought to be more valued by a Father, and certainly rather to be desired than the death of an Enemy. I will not listen to any thing which the justice of my resentment might move me to utter at this time; and I know there is no injury whatever can arm me against my Father and my King. But I will either redeem the Father of Melisinthā out of those chains, wherewith I my self have fettered him, or will lose my life in the attempt; and since it is so little valued by a Father that contemns its preservation, I will abandon it to all the mischief that may befall it, but I will restore to Melisinthā her Father, whom I have taken from her.

But if he had any cause to complain of the King's severity, fortune revenged his cause in such a manner, as he had least occasion to wish for. For we understood that after some light skirmishes, that had passed between the Danes and the Saxons; the King and Sinibald had fought; and that either through the misfortune of the Saxons, or the valour of Sinibald, the Danes had obtained the victory: and that the loss on the Saxons side was so great, that the King was constrained to retreat to his Ships in great disorder: and to return to Saxony in such a weak condition; that would no longer permit him to defend Jutland against the victorious Arms of Sinibald. Aldemar was with Melisintha when the news came, and so little he dissembled his sorrow to hear it, that the Princess easily perceived it: and whether it were to let him know that she took notice of his grief; or whether it were to let him see that she truly pityed him; I dare not, said she, rejoyce at the happy success of our Army; seeing you so much afflicted: and certainly if the King your Father understood, how much you laid to heart his ill success; I am very confident your peace would be soon made with him. You would do me too much injustice, replied the Prince, should you believe me unconcern'd for my Father's loss of Jutland: nor need I justify myself where I know you have no cause of accusation against me. But I must confess that I could have wished these advantages, at which you believe me so much troubled, to any other person than to Sinibald: and that I cannot but with infinite grief behold him so prosperous in a design, that opens him the way to the enjoyment of Melisintha. Though Jutland were ours, replied the Princess, Gisulphus still remaining imprisoned by your Father: nor is it so near the recovery of his Kingdom, as the safety and liberty of her Father, which the daughter hopes for. If it be that replied the Prince, with an alteration of joy that signally appeared in his countenance) I fear less than I did the success of Sinibald, nor do I despair of my own. But O Gods (thus continued he after a few minutes of silence) what can I expect from fortune, should she prove more kind than the heart of Melisintha. Save the life and redeem the liberty of my Father, if it be in your power, replied the fair Melisintha, and after that hope for all things, from an obedience which I am never to deny him. She could not utter these last words without blushing, though so full of innocency; and therefore believing that she had spoken too much already, she altered the subject of her discourse.

Aldemar knew not then what judgment to make of his condition; and if he found a greater happiness in the hope which he had, to mollifie the heart of Melisintha, than in all his disgraces; yet was his happiness counterbalanc'd, by the number of his sorrows and his discontents: For besides what his jealousy to see the success made him endure, especially when he reflected upon the reward promised to his victories, he began to be ashamed of mewing himself up within the compass of narrow walls, while Sinibald abroad got honour, and won battels from his Father. Willingly would he have fought against his proud Rival in his Countries behalf, could he have done it without renouncing the love of Melisintha. But he neither had the power nor the purpose so to do: nor did he know any duty that could oblige him to take up Arms against one whom he loved a thousand times more dearly than his life, for a Father that rather chose to let him perish, than thwart the honour of his revenge; for a Father whom they did not assail in his own dominions, but only expell'd out of those which he had usurp'd. In this hurly burly of different thoughts, he struggled for a good while: And if at the time that he was with Melisintha, the troubles of his mind were charm'd by the sight of an object so delightful; the grief which he observed in the Princess and his disquiet for being the cause thereof, cruelly augmented his anguish, and reduced him at length to believe, that under a kind of shadow of happiness, he was altogether miserable. While these strange Irresolutions floated in his mind, seeing that the means which he had attempted to redeem Gisulphus, and restore Melisintha her chiefest consolation, had not proved successful; he tormented his thoughts in the search of others, though without being able to resolve upon any thing: especially through the fear he had, that if he should absent himself from Melisintha, he might lose all his own hopes and her Father's life together. However at length he was constrained to determine: and one day that he was in his Chamber, waiting till it might be convenient for him to attend the Princess; he saw her entring into his Chamber with only two Virgins attending her, without any other train. He mov'd toward her very much confus'd and abash'd at the honour which she did him: But immediately the Princess and he withdrawing to a window; gave him to understand that Sinibald was in quiet possession of all Jutland: that after the victory which he had obtained, and the retreat of the Saxon King; he found little or no opposition: that very few places held out till they were assailed, but all yielded upon composition: and that all the Saxons who were in Garrisons, were gone away either by Sea or to Denmark, with such Letters of safe conduct as he had given them: and that having no more to do he was returning victorious to Galatia. Aldemar heard this discourse of Melisintha, with alterations and motions of a different nature:

ture: And as he was about to utter his mind, the Princess preventing him with a resolute utterance; "Prince, said she, you have no longer time to consider, you must of necessity leave us, and seek out some other ways to restore me my Father, than what you have already tryed in vain. I shall with all affection continue the remembrance of you, and I despair not but that you may find better success some other way, where I may be permitted a greater liberty. Sinibald returns victorious and absolute Master, and as he wants nothing to compleat his wishes, but the liberty of Gisulphus; I make no question but he will endeavour to obtain it, though with the loss of yours, and deprive me of the power of disposing it. I know well that you do not fear the danger, since you have willingly exposed your self to it: but be advised withal that I fear it more than death, which I would rather endure than the reproach that I may lye under, of having abused your noble and generous intentions. On the other side you have perswaded all the world that you love me: you have confessed as much to your Father, nor do you conceal it from any other person whatsoever. It is the general opinion that your pretended imprisonment is no other than an effect of your own will, and of your affection for me: so that it is the judgment of all the world, of Sinibald and of your Father himself, that you remain with me not as a Prisoner but as a lover: to which you know I neither can consent, nor is it in my power to suffer it, especially during the imprisonment of my Father, without incurring his displeasure and the scandal of the whole earth. For these reasons which you understand as well as my self, I beseech you Sir to make hast away: and do not give me any farther cause of discontent, either to see you dealt withal by your Enemies as a real prisoner, or to see you appear as my Lover at such a time, when my Father's captivity and the knowledge of his intentions, will not permit me to suffer it. Thus spake Melisantha, when the Prince beholding her with a languishing and passionate aspect; "I see Madam, said he, that here I shall but create new jealousies in Sinibald by my stay, and that this Victor for whom fortune so openly declares her self, will not suffer so near your person a Rival who surpasses him in love: and it may be is not inferiour to him in merit. This is the reason and no other that obliges you to banish me from your presence: and I wish to all the Gods that it prove not the means to put me on the rack of my severest torment, when I am forced to surrender you to the too happy Sinibald. "I pardon these expressions, replied the Princess, knowing the reasons that force them from you: But you cannot have any such thought without offending me. For besides that you have heard me unfold my self to you, perhaps more freely than I ought to have done, in relation to my thoughts concerning Sinibald; whose pretences as they are all grounded upon the consent of Gisulphus, you may be sure shall never prevail upon me, without the liberty and the presence of my Father likewise, which are both necessary to the accomplishment of his desires. "But, said Aldemar, my abode with you whether as a Lover or a Prisoner, still assures you of the life of Gisulphus; though it may not absolutely redeem him: And if after I am gone he should be put to death, who can you blame for so fatal a misfortune? when there are just and lawful means to shun the danger. "Those, replied the Princess, I will make use of though they cost me my life: But as the means which you propound is unjust and treacherous in me to accept, I will never yield to make use of it. "If you can, (said Aldemar after a short silence) so conceal my departure that my Father may have no knowledge thereof, till I have had time to execute what I have design'd; I do not despair of freeing the Prince of Jutland out of prison, and bringing him hither my self in a few days. "Would it please the Gods that you might accomplish it, I would undertake to keep your departure so secret, that no living person should have the least notice thereof. Upon this assurance, I will prepare my self to put a design in execution, which I thought upon some few days ago: And since the King my Father hath so little valued my life, I will not stick to wrong my honour nor my duty, by robbing his fury of a prisoner that he keeps by force from me. If I have success you shall speedily see the Prince of Jutland, but if the success answer not my hopes and my desires, I will return a prisoner to your self, or if you refuse me to Sinibald. He will receive me without doubt out of the great care he has of your Father's liberty: And since it is my fate to advance the happiness of his good fortune; I had rather meet my own destruction, than suffer the death of Gisulphus. "Your generosity, said the Princess, makes me altogether ashamed of my self, and obliges me to tell you farther, that if I cannot have the freedom to testify my acknowledgment, I shall esteem my self very miserable. Endeavour what you can for the liberty of my Father, and if fortune will not favour us in this attempt, I beseech you, nay rather if I have any power over you, I command you, not to commit your self to the hands of Sinibald. He will make use of your misfortunes doubtless to obtain Melisantha: and if you should suffer any mishap, as you would persuade

“her you are willing to do; I am apt to believe I should have some reason to repent my “misfortune. Aldemar perceived something more than of ordinary kindness, and obliging sweetness in this discourse, to be his comfort in that affliction, which he must of necessity suffer in parting from her: and after he had made some few reflections, that obliged him to a short-silence; “I hope, said he, that the Gods will be favourable to us, and that I shall “remove the cause of your grief, if fortune do not oppose me. In the mean while I must “leave you for a time, and if you were ever in love you cannot but know, what this absence “will make me suffer. But though absence be a very great mischief, ’tis not that which I “fear so much, for I am able to support it with the assistance of my courage: But hence pro“ceeds my fear, when I call to mind that while I am absent; Sinibald is with you: and “that he aspires to the top of his felicity with favourable hopes. You may for any thought “of that matter set your heart at rest, replied the Princess, for as you know that Sinibald can “expect nothing from me, so long as Gisulphus remains in durance; if he be redeemed by “your assistance; you need not question your being by him preferred before Sinibald: and “that besides the double consideration of having twice saved his life; he shall likewise not “forget the advantages, which you have over the Brother of the Danish King. Upon these words which Melismiba uttered, not without some little violence upon her natural humour, the Prince’s grief was not a little asswaged: And passing from this discourse, to consider what course they were to take, that his departure might be concealed from the Saxon King they concluded that because it was not easie, to conceal his departure from those that were upon the place, that they would give it out abroad, that upon some extraordinary advice which they had that day received from Sinibald; which he had sent by a particular messenger; that they would send the Prince to some remoter Prison, and carry him to some more secure place than Gelasia; which was speedily to be put into the hands of Sinibald, like all the rest of the Garrison Towns: that that very night he should be conducted to the Sea-side, by those very persons that should be appointed for his Guard, and be thence immediately ship’d away in a Vessel ready prepared to receive him. All things were performed as they had concluded, being much furthered by the respectful obedience, which Sigimer gave to the Princess: For though he seemed unwilling at first, yet he durst not disobey Melismiba, the rather because he was privy to all the proceedings of Aldemar, and understood very well what kind of prisoner he was: so that to shorten my relation in things not pertinent, and to pass over the passionate and tender expressions on the Prince’s part; when he took leave of Melismiba; by the care that Sigimer took to serve the Princess, some hours before day the Prince together with his peculiar attendants, was guarded to the Sea-side by a small party of horse which Sigimer commanded, where we found a Vessel ready fitted with all things necessary for our voyage.

As we were ignorant of the design that carried our Prince to Gelasia, so we were ignorant of the reason of his departure, though I was the first of all his retinue to whom he discover’d it: For a little while after he had been aboard, and that he had given order what course to steer, he call’d me singly to him and asked me if I understood the humour of Gelimer, and whether he were really my friend. I made him answer according to the truth that he was a bold daring person, and that we had for several years past, entred into a very strict league of mutual friendship. But have you any knowledge, replied Aldemar, of his affection for “me, or do you believe him to be a person, that will venture the King’s displeasure to serve “me, in the most important concern of my whole life? When the Prince had spoken these words I understood what he meant, and because I knew that it was Gelimer that guarded the Prince of Jutland in a Garrison under his command, I made no question but we were then making a voyage for the liberty of Gisulphus: and therefore by reason of the experience which I had of the Prince’s love, and the knowledge of a good part of his reflections upon the King’s carriage toward him, I less wondred at his resolution than another might have done, and I gave him a ready answer to his question: “I have for a long time, said I, known “Gelimer to be passionately devoted to your service: And I know moreover Sir, that you “have a great share in the obligation of his preferment: for that it was your self who beg’d
 “of the King that command which he now enjoys, some few days before your departure “from Cynesia. “That which you say is very true, replied the Prince, and it was that in “part which made me the more forward, in that resolution which I have taken for the liber“ty of Gisulphus: whereupon he did me the honour to communicate to me, the design which he had to get into Selima privately by night, being the place where Gisulphus was imprisoned under the custody of Gelimer: and to try whether by fair means and upon the consideration of being able to advance Gelimer’s fortunes, he could oblige him to deliver the Prince of Jutland into his hands, and to put himself under his protection to avoid the

King's fury; and if he could not persuade him to that, to try some other way, which he would not attempt till the last of all, as being such as would of necessity make a louder noise, and be occasion of more important disturbance. Now because I knew it was a vain thing to go about to divert him from his resolution, I would not trouble my self to contradict him, or to lay before him the difficulties which he might encounter, but contented my self to tell him what I verily thought, that Gelimer was a person very fit for his purpose, and that besides his engagements to him, and the devotion which he had to his service, he was a person very ambitious, and consequently would the more willingly embrace any opportunity to raise himself.

This discourse made Aldemar the more confident to proceed in his design, which was to sound Gelimer's inclination, before he attempted any other way; and so making sail with all the speed imaginable, we left those Islands called the Saxon Isles on the right hand, making Denmark upon the left, and one evening we put in to the shore near the mouth of the Elbe, within the distance of an hours march from Selima; knowing the way, we easily got to the Gate, notwithstanding the darkness of the night. But before the Prince would appear himself, he commanded me to ask for Gelimer in my name, and that I should make his arrival known to no other person but himself, without speaking to the Guard at the Gate. I observed his command, and called for Gelimer, who coming to me as to his friend, I told him that the Prince desired to rest himself in the Garrison for an hour, and while I was talking to him, the Prince came forward with the small train that attended him, and made himself known to Gelimer. Gelimer was very much surpris'd to see him: and I cannot tell what resolutions he might have taken, if he had had time to consider. However it were, he durst not refuse to open the Gates to the Prince, to whom he was oblig'd for the chiefest part of his being, and who, by reason of his Father's years, was in a short while likely to be his King, he received him with a countenance that denoted something of distrust, though he labour'd all he could to put a good face upon the matter, and to hide the disquiet of his mind, and conducting him to a place which he thought most convenient for him. But the Prince quickly let him know that he intended to make no long stay there; and taking him aside presently after he came into his Chamber, Gelimer, said he, I come to you as to a person of whose affection I am well assured, and from whom I am now to require a very great piece of service, and to whom I shall not forget to make that acknowledgment which your obligation shall merit: I must either lose my life, or give Gifulphus his liberty; for my destiny is so link'd to his, that there is no separation to be made betwixt them. 'Tis from your kindness and affection to serve me, that I come to demand him. Do this, and I will not only protect you from the King's anger, by making you the copartner of my fortune, but also raise you to that degree, that you shall thereby with advantage find the value of the obligation you laid upon me. Nor can you be thought to have done anything blame-worthy, or misbecoming a brave person, in saving the life of a Prince so unjustly and so cruelly destin'd to destruction. Besides that the example which I my self set before you, is sufficient to authorize the fact, and to free you from any reproach that you can justly bear. In short, it is your Prince, and he that may suddenly come to be your King, who here demands of you his own life, and the liberty of Gifulphus; or rather who commits himself into your hands, by reason of the confidence which he has in your particular self. For so great a piece of service you may expect a suitable reward; or rather, being you know that I am neither treacherous, nor ingrateful, there is nothing but what you may expect at my hands. Gelimer heard him patiently all the while; but after the Prince had done speaking, he stood mute a good while, without being able to make any answer. And between these two extremities, whether to deceive his King who had trusted him with the custody of a prisoner of that importance, and to expose himself to all things that were to be expected from his fury; or whether to disoblige the Prince, who was ere long to be his King, and who in a few years would be able either to advance or degrade him, according as he should be dealt withal upon this very occasion, he was not able to determine what to resolve: nor could he tell how to disengage himself; only in laying before the Prince, how much he ow'd to the trust which the King had reposed in him, he seem'd to give him a hint that from any other person but himself he should have very ill resent'd such a proposal. But at length he was oversway'd by the charms of the Prince's entreaties and persuasions, against which it was hard for him to defend himself; or else out of the hopes of those offers which were made him; and of which, from a Prince of his humour and disposition, he might easily expect the full performance; or out of fear to offend him, and to have him always for an enemy. However it were, he told him he was ready to obey him, and to follow him, for there was no staying for him after such a fact committed in a Kingdom where, during the King's life, there was no safety for the Prince himself, and where, for so he concluded with a sigh, he quitted a brave command to serve him. The Prince embrac'd him a thousand times, and promised him rewards of his service beyond what he could desire. And having conferr'd with him for some time, in contriving how they should go all together, without giving the Soldiers and Officers any Alarm, and whom they ought to leave at their departure in Gelimer's place, knowing he had little time to lose, and that the success of the design consisted in speed, he caus'd himself to be conducted to the prison, with an intention to set Gisulphus at liberty in his own person, and to depart without farther delay: Gelimer having taken care to send Horses for Gisulphus and himself, to the place where we had left ours. The Prince had forbid Gelimer or any other person to discover to Gisulphus who he was, till he gave us notice, fearing perhaps the resolution of that Prince, whose obstinate hatred against the House of the Saxons he well understood; and therefore he concluded to pass for that unknown person who had defended him against the fury of the Pirates, the remembrance of whose person he could not but retain, and which for that reason could not be hateful to him.

The Prince of Jutland was at that time in an indifferent handsome Lodging; they had also taken off his Irons, which they constrain'd him to wear when he was first imprison'd, and he was likewise indifferently attended, but they kept a very strict Guard over him; and because he was not permitted to hear any news, 'tis very probable that he did not then in the least expect his liberty. The Prince went into his Chamber with only Gelimer in his company; and as for Gisulphus, he being accustomed dayly to see Gelimer, was little or nothing mov'd at the sight of either, but received them courteously enough. With much pains he rear'd up his eyes to behold their faces, his own being in a bad condition, for his Beard was long, and neglected, and he wore the whole countenance of a man whose life was a burthen to him, which mov'd the Prince to a compassion that kept him silent for some time. However, the Prince was the first that spoke, and accosting him with a behaviour answerable to the respect which he had for the Father of Melisintha; Sir, said he, let us make haste out of this prison where you have suffered too much already; and now breath a better air, and enjoy a better fortune. Gisulphus with some difficulty lifting up his head at these words, and casting his eyes upon the Prince's face, Young man, said he, make not a scoff of my misfortune, I know already it can never be altered but by death. But if it be to death thou art leading me, thou shalt see how willingly, how cheerfully I will follow thee. These words, uttered by the Father of Melisintha, caus'd tears to flow from the eyes of Aldemar; and therefore going nearer the Lights, that Gisulphus might see him better than he did before; If you would well observe my countenance, said he, you would from thence make a more auspicious conjecture: if you can but remember that you have seen it at any other time, you will then perceive that it is not to lead you to death, that I am come hither. These words, and the accent of his voice, which made Gisulphus something recover himself, forc'd him to look more steadfastly upon Aldemar's face: and by reason, that he had charily preserv'd in his breast the resemblance of a person, to whom he was engag'd both for his own and Melisintha's life; and for that the shape and countenance of the Prince had nothing of common air, he readily knew him again. Upon the knowledge hereof he recoyl'd back some few steps in a posture of amaze, and immediately advancing towards the Prince with a behaviour that testified all the marks of Acknowledgment; O my valiant protector, said he, what favourable God has sent you hither to my assistance? For I make no question but that it is only to my assistance that you are come hither. 'Tis so, Sir, replied Aldemar, 'tis only for your redemption that I come hither. If Melisintha be safe, replied Gisulphus, if she have escaped death and shame, I embrace your assistance with joy; but if Melisintha be lost, neither my life nor my liberty can do me any kindness. Neither is Melisintha dead, replied Aldemar, neither has she suffered any other misfortune than that of your confinement, and you shall find in a few days in Jutland, that there is no other who commands there as Prince, but your self. "If any other but your self should be the relater of such news to me, replied Gisulphus, I should not believe a word; but having been a witness of what you have performed, it is not for me to suspect you of untruth, and having received already so great a benefit at your hands, there is nothing which I will not have farther hopes of by the assistance of your power. Let us go then, (said Aldemar, taking him by the hand) and seeing it is so that we can get free of this place, let us make no long stay here. Gisulphus then stretch'd forth his Arms, and having embraced Prince Aldemar with tears that joy and tenderness drew both at once from his eyes, he followed him without speaking one word, suffering themselves to be guided by Gelimer, who (to omit all unnecessary particulars of our departure) soon sets us free of that place, and in a little time after we got to our Vessel, where Gisulphus and Gelimer went aboard so much to Aldemar's joy, that he could hardly contain himself.

When

When we were got aboard, and that Gisulphus found that we steer'd our course directly for Jutland, he besought the Prince to tell him, to whom it was that he was engag'd for his life, at least this second time, for fear lest by some accident or other he might lose the opportunity of his satisfaction; but Aldemar desired him to stay till he saw Melisintha, telling him that for certain important reasons, he could not yet discover himself, nor let him understand by what means he had his liberty, till he came to be in his own Dominions, and in the presence of the Prince's his Daughter. Well then, said Gisulphus, I will press you no farther, to what you are so unwilling to disclose, and I will moderate the impatience which I have to know my continual preserver, out of the hope which you give me that I shall receive satisfaction in a short time. But I suppose you will not deny to tell me to whom I am oblig'd for the safety of Melisintha, and the recovery of my Dominions. "For the recovery of Jutland, replied Aldemar, you are oblig'd to Sinibald, who with an Army of the Danes defeated the Saxons and has reduced Jutland entirely under your subjection: but for the life of Melisintha and your own, you owe them to Prince Aldemar. Aldemar! (said Gisulphus in a great amazement) the Son of the Saxon King! He that, I am given to understand, overcame me in fight, and sent me captive to his Father! "This very Aldemar, replied the Prince, preserv'd you from that death to which the King his Father hath design'd you, and who having taken Melisintha also, carried her safe into Gelasia, which Sigimer had newly regain'd from the Saxons, and surrendred himself a voluntary prisoner to his enemies, to deliver you from his Father. He told him all along what had pass'd since that; and let him understand the obligations which he had for Prince Aldemar, yet without making any such mention of him, that might discover him to be the person, and without derogating at all from the honour and services of Sinibald. Gisulphus heard all this discourse very calmly: and when the Prince had done speaking, 'Tis an effect, said he, of that evil fortune that has persecuted me all my life, that I am still beholding for such great obligations to the Son of the King of the Saxons. And it is not without great reluctancy, that those thoughts of hatred, fortified in my heart by such powerful reasons, must now be chang'd into thoughts of affection and acknowledg'ment. As I have heard, said the Prince, Aldemar was never concern'd in any of those injuries which were done by his Family to yours; and I am so far from understanding any reason for you to forget the memory of what he has done for you, that I think those obligations are more to be valued in him than in another: for besides the danger to which he has expos'd himself to serve you, as another might have done, he has done something more than others could have done for you, in incurring, as he has done, the fury and hatred of the King his Father. "I know it very well, replied Gisulphus, and let him make no doubt, but that if he be yet with Melisintha, as you tell me he is, he shall have no reason to complain of my ingratitude. But I must confess, it will never be that I shall see my self beholding to the Son of my most inveterate enemy, without shame and discontent. The Prince was unwilling to press him any farther upon Aldemar's interest, for fear of making a discovery, believing, that since he found him sensible by what he had related to him, of what Aldemar had done for him; when in the person of Aldemar he should behold the same Defender, who had saved Melisintha and himself from the fury of the Pyrates, and who came to redeem him out of the hands of the Saxon King, he would be as equally sensible of that acknowledg'ment which was due to him.

All this while we made for the coast of Jutland, avoiding Denmark with the greatest care we could; but because the wind was not so favourable in our return, as when we were bound for Saxony, we were forc'd to keep longer at Sea than we expected; but at length with much ado, putting into the Port of Gelasia, we there understood that Melisintha was gone thence the day before, and that under the safe conduct of Sinibald, retired to Nicopia, the chief City of Jutland, seated upon the Banks of the River Eidorz. Though Aldemar did not doubt but that Sinibald was with Melisintha, yet the very thoughts thereof went to his heart, nor could he but be very much discontented, but to hear the very name of his Rival pronounc'd. However, he went by land with Gisulphus to Nicopia; and for that all the Passes were then open, they got thither without any difficulty. As soon as they enter'd the City, Prince Gisulphus was immediately known by all the chief persons of the City, who flock'd about him, while the common people made the Sky ring with their Acclamations, and resound with the name of their Prince, with such other marks of joy as easily testified their affection to their Sovereign. The report of his return spread it self with that swiftness, that it was got before us to the City; and Melisintha, to whose ears it had been conveyed by the confused cries of the people, amaz'd with the excess of her own joy, ran out of her Chamber to meet her Father; and at the same time also met Aldemar in a great Room which they were to pass through: Sinibald was with her; and if my Prince was troubled to see him with her, Sinibald was no less discontented to behold any Prince so near Gisulphus, knowing withal to whom Gisulphus was obliged for his liberty. Never was an affection discovered by marks more tender, or more lively, than that which was reciprocally at this time shewn between the Father and the Daughter. Never had grief for the separation of Friends caused more tears to be shed, than these two persons weeping for joy upon their unexpected meeting. Melisintha remain'd a long time in the Arms of Gisulphus, without being either of them able to speak: and if the Daughter could not untwine her self from the Arms of a Father, who had spent so many sad days in loathsome imprisonment; neither could the Father let go a Daughter, who was more dear to him than his life; and for whose sake he had suffered torments, during his imprisonment, far more cruel than the chains of the Saxon King. At length the consideration of Aldemar and Sinibald interrupted their importunate Careffes; and if Gisulphus could not behold the Prince of the Danes, by whose means he had been restored to the possession of his Dominions, without paying what was due to his Birth, and the largeness of the benefit which he had received at his hands; so neither could Melisintha behold Aldemar, to whom besides so many other obligations, she owed the life and liberty of her Father, without approaching him with all the marks of as real and effectual an acknowledgment as he could have expected. And while Gisulphus and Sinibald were busie in making their reciprocal complements and acknowledgments, which kept them from other observations: Oh, Sir, (said Melisintha to the Saxon Prince) how gloriously do you succeed in your enterprises; or rather how do you heap your benefits upon me? And how miserable shall I be, whenever fortune deprives me of the ability to testify the acknowledgment which my heart is full of. “The Gods, modestly replied “the Prince, prospered my good intentions, and I hope they will never forsake me, so you “continue to be favourable to me. I shall endeavour, said the Princess, what lies in my power, and perhaps more than I ought to do, to let you know that I am neither ingrateful, nor insensible. The Prince was charm'd with these expressions; but they had neither of them time to say more, without being over-heard by the throng of people, which the return of Gisulphus had drawn to the Court in a moment. I cannot tell you the discourse that pass'd between Gisulphus and Sinibald, for I never knew any thing of it; but it is very probable, that the service being so great, the testimonies of acknowledgment given by Gisulphus, were as ample; and that they were received by the Prince of the Danes with all civility answerable. After they had sufficiently express'd themselves the one to the other, Gisulphus, who well understood that he did not owe all to Sinibald, returning to Melisintha, As you have let me see, said he, the Prince to whom I am indebted for the Crown of my Ancestors, it is just that you also let me know to whom I am engag'd once for my Daughter; and you twice for your Father. The Gods that sent him to our assistance upon the Sea, sent him also to free me from a Dungeon, to the end I should not be beholding for my life, but only to him who had already prefer'd it. But if I hold my life from one of these two, and my Crown from the other, there is a third also by whose means I enjoy Melisintha, and to whom, as they say, I am also beholding for my life; it is just that I should testify my acknowledgment to him also, neither must Sinibald, nor our valiant defender deny us the liberty of paying what I owe to the virtues of so noble and so generous a Prince. These words surpris'd Melisintha, who was ignorant that Aldemar had concealed himself from the knowledge of Gisulphus; and began to perceive that her Father, though he appeared sufficiently sensible of the service he had done him, did not yet shew him that respect which was due to his Dignity. Nor did she take time to consider what she had to say, but answered according to what was in their thoughts: Sir, said she, I have already return'd my thanks to Prince Aldemar for your liberty, as I gave him thanks before for his noble performances for yours and my preservation at Sea: but I know nothing of any obligations that you have to any other person than himself. “How, (cried Gisulphus, with “the greatest astonishment in the world) is that valiant person that saved us out of the Pyrates hands, who came to fetch me out of prison, and from the power of the Saxon King? “Is he that same Prince Aldemar, who gave you your liberty, and kept off that violent and “cruel death which threatened me, and who surrendred himself a Captive into our hands, to “redeem me out of his Father's power? How, have the Gods united such a variety of obligations in one single person, and a person from whom we had the least reason to expect them? “I beg your pardon Sir, said Aldemar, for the fallacy I put upon you, and I hope you will judge “no other wise thereof, but that I concealed my self, for fear you should refuse a piece of service, from one that you had any reason to hate. All the severity of Gisulphus, nor all the implacable hatred which he bore to the King of the Saxons, could not debar him from letting the world know, by how many and by what important obligations he was engag'd to the Son of his Enemy: and being born with the heart of a Prince, though it might be somewhat hardened by his adversity, he could not find any person that had done more for him, nor one that had more prevailed upon his Soul, with the charms of his person: so that accosting him with very great marks of honour and esteem; Sir, said he, as the benefits I have received at your hands, are above the estimate of any Price and without any bounds, the sense we have thereof cannot produce expressions sufficient, to make the least acknowledgment according to their merit: Nor can my daughter or my self do more, than prostrate at your feet what you have so often preserved, by offering up our lives to you as to our common preserver and tutelar Angel. I cannot tell (modestly replied Aldemar) whether what I have performed in your behalf, be sufficient to repair the wrongs which I have done you, by exposing you to the revenge of the King my Father: However I shall think my self fully paid for my services, if you can forget those injuries: and if they can but protect me from the hatred, which you bear to our family. That hatred, replied Gifulphus, was grounded upon arguments powerful enough, and which you are not ignorant of: But as I have reasons not less prevalent, to harbour in my heart an opinion of you quite contrary to what I have of the rest of your family, I shall not only lay aside these former thoughts, of hatred, which perhaps I have too easily admitted, but with the same constancy shall preserve till death, the affection which I have for your self. Some other discourse they had, which tediousness forbids me to rehearse: Immediately Gifulphus gave order that the two Princes should be lodged in the Palace, and in this disposal of their Lodging as in every thing else; though Gifulphus looked upon Sinibald, as the person that had restored him to his Crown; yet he punctually observed the distinction between two Princes, betwixt whom the design of birth had made an apparent inequality. And although with the Crown, Gifulphus had taken upon him the title of King of Jutland, as his Ancestors for many years had done before; however he gave the Prince of the Saxons as much the precedency, as if he had been already the Crowned Sovereign of Saxony.

The first following days were spent, in such publick ceremonies and testimonies of publick joy, as the Jutlanders spar'd no cost to manifest upon so happy a change of their condition, which they celebrated with all sorts of shows and divertisements, wherein the splendour of the Court of Jutland sufficiently appeared. Sinibald who was nobly furnished by his Brother, for a Royal and magnificent expence; was very sumptuous in his Equipage: but Aldemar who neither received nor hop'd to receive any thing from his Father, could not follow his Example, and fretted that he could not shew his own liberal humour and disposition, but at the charges of Gifulphus; which he was resolv'd never to do whatever disgrace befel him. All this while the two Princes saw each other every hour: and their jealousie increasing by reason of the obstructions, which they reciprocally occasioned each to other; set that hatred on fire with which they were sufficiently animated already. For some days Aldemar could not discourse Melisintha as he desired, finding Sinibald always in her company, which stirred up within him that vexation which was easily perceived: But at length taking his opportunity, while Sinibald was entertaining Gifulphus at another end of the Chamber, and seeing no body with Melisintha, who did not retire out of respect to give him the more liberty; he went nearer to her than he was before: and speaking to her with a low voice not to be heard; "I have done, said he, what you expected of me, ought not I now to hope, that you will not forget the promise which you made to me. I will do for you, replied the Princess, more than you demand: And instead of yielding my obedience, when I shall be commanded to prefer Sinibald according to my promise; I will put my Father in mind how much he is more obliged to you than to him: and I will maintain your interest against him, as much as reason will suffer me to do. "I am more happy, said the Prince, than ever I deserved to be: for if you take my part, Sinibald will not have all the advantage over me. However I know not what to hope from the King of Jutland, for among all those offers of kindness which he makes me by way of acknowledgment, he speaks not one syllable to me concerning you, though he cannot be ignorant of the love which I have for you. "He may pretend ignorance, said Melisintha, in regard he never heard you make any proposition concerning it, nor is there any reason that he should be the first, that should take any notice thereof: But I dare assure you that I find in his inclinations, a kindness more than ordinary for you: Nor do I believe that his engagement to Sinibald, does at all impeach his consideration of the honour which you do him or blind his discovery of the great odds betwixt you and Sinibald. But may I hope, (said Aldemar with a passionate look) that you will appear on my behalf against the fortune of my Rival, and that you will not forsake me, if fortune prove my enemy? "You merit more, replied the Princess, than you demand: and setting aside my obligations to your generosity, there is no law that restrains me from making this confession, that in taking your part, you shall find me rather led by my own inclinations, than guided by “ the rules of acknowledgment : and this I shall shew, as soon as you shall have occasion “ to require it; and I shall let Gisulphus understand farther, that with Sinibald I can ne“ ver be happy. But you must know, that in making this opposition, there are certain “ limits which I must not exceed, and you have too much reason to desire it. It is not “ always reason that regulates desire, (replied the Prince;) but though I am in a condition that “ acknowledges very little subjection to its Empire, I shall desire you to do nothing for me that you “ cannot all without offence. They had said more, if Gisulphus and the jealous Sinibald; who “ could not long endure this familiarity, had not with their presence interrupted them. Al- “ demir laboured still for some days under some unquiet thoughts that tormented him, for “ the happiness of his Rival, and the kindness that passed between him and Gisulphus, though “ he could hardly believe, that either for his person, or for his Services, Sinibald could be “ more considerable than himself. But at length he resolved to declare his mind, for fear a “ longer silence might be prejudicial to him, or that Gisulphus might engage himself, not know“ ing his intentions. To which purpose, coming one day to visit the King of the Futlanders

 “ (for we can give him no other Title, seeing that the grandeur and splendour of his Court “ made him deserve no less a Title) he desired a particular audience: and being alone with “ him in his Closet, Sir, said he, when I did you that first service, whereby I had the happiness “ to merit some part of your friendship, I did not propose to my self any other reward, but what we “ find our selves in the content of having perform’d an honourable action. I could willingly have “ done much more (if I have done anything to deserve your remembrance) upon the same con“ sideration, without intermixing any other interest to bring down the price; but love becoming the “ Mistress of my heart, bred there both desires and hopes; and as I could not see Melissintha with“ out loving her, so I cannot live without desiring her and without hoping that at length by my love;
 “ and by my services I may deserve her. Without doubt my hopes have been too aspiring; for who “ among men can be worthy to enjoy Melissintha? Nor will I repeat either my Birth, or my Quality, “ you know them already, and to my misery you know them but too well. Though as through the “ knowledge of my intentions, your thoughts are become more favourable towards me, so I pre“ sume to hope, that I shall not be punished for the crimes of others; and that I shall have no greater “ a share in your displeasure, than I had in doing the injuries that gave the provocation. I ex“ pect from your Clemency, that in time you will abolish the remembrance thereof; and that when “ you see Melissintha Queen of the Saxons, you will have the same affection for them, as for the “ Futlanders; and that you will no longer divide the interest of our people, and our Families: per“ mit me, Sir, to flatter my self with these hopes, through the confidence I have in your goodness;
 “ and suffer me at last to demand Melissintha at your hands, not for the merit of my services, which “ are not worthy so inclinable a reward, but for the reality of my love, which hath inspired me “ with a boldness to aspire to so glorious a fortune. Thus Aldemir expressed himself, and en“ livened his expressions with so passionate a behaviour, that Gisulphus might have perceiv’d
 “ his love by that alone, had he been ignorant of it before. Gisulphus hearkened to his dis“ course with all the marks imaginable of a deep respect, though with manifest signs of his “ inward perplexity: “ Sir, said he, though you speak over modestly of the obligations “ which we have received at your hands, yet I know well the price thereof, so as to confess,
 “ that they are above all that we can do, or all that we can think to acquit our selves of a “ satisfaction. We owe to you our lives and liberties several ways; and we are the more “ engaged to your good will, in regard you have exposed your self to the fury of your Fa“ ther, and your King, and that you have refused no danger to succour the unfortunate: “ nor do I less understand the advantages of your Birth, and your high command after the “ death of your Father; and beyond all this, I look upon the merit of your person, which
 “ in a Soul like mine, is to be preferred before all the Dignity in the world. But, Sir, this “ knowledge serves me to no other purpose, than to let me see, that I am still to be unhappy, “ since my fortune gives me no more likelihood of that honour and felicity which you of“ fer me, than if I had not the liberty to accept it: perhaps, Sir, you may not be ignorant,
 “ at least there are few that do not know it, that I have promised Melissintha to Sinibald,
 “ and to the King of the Danes, who entertained me, and protected me in my misfortunes,
 “ and who lent me the assistance of his Brother, and his own Forces to recover my Country.
 “ I know the odds between your Quality, and that of Sinibald: I believe also that the dis-“ ference between the merit of your persons is not at all advantageous to him; and I will “ not deny to recover, that in what you have done for the safety of Melissintha and my “ self, you have done more than he, in restoring me to the Crown. But what avails all “ this, unless it be to render me unfortunate? Since I am engaged by my Word which I “ cannot recall, and that I must be content to see Melissintha espoused to a Prince without a “ Crown, nor can expect any other than mine after my decease, who might otherwise be“ hold

" hold her Queen of the Saxons (at the same time reigning my self in peace over the Jutlanders) by an access of happiness, espoused to so powerful a Prince, and a Prince to whom we are both so infinitely engaged. See, Sir, my condition, and while I excuse my inability, judge you which is the greatest misery, either yours, that in any other place may meet with a more happy fortune than that which you desire, or mine, who am not in a capacity to accept what you so kindly offer. This was the answer of Gisulphus, which Aldemar heard with a mortal grief; but as he feared before to find some difficulty in that pre-engagement of Gisulphus to Sinibald, so he did not despair to alter his resolution by vertue of those reasons and arguments which he had to alledge: and to this purpose, after a short silence, beginning again, I have heard it said, says he, that there was a proposal made to you in Denmark, at such a time perhaps, when your bad fortune might persuade you to give something of attention: but I never heard that you had engaged your self by promise; and though you should have obliged your self, you know, that since that time there have happened sufficient accidents to excuse the disengagement. You were free, both you and Melisinthia, when you made any promise to Sinibald: but afterwards you lost your liberty, Melisinthia also lost hers. So that if the King of the Danes and Sinibald desire of you the performance of your word, they ought to have restored you your liberty, to the end you might be in a capacity to perform it. " While I was a prisoner, replied Gisulphus, I might dispense with my promise, but now I am free, though it were by your assistance, and not through Sinibald's procurement, I am oblig'd to keep my word. It was a mutual engagement and stipulation, that if Sinibald recovered Jutland, I should grant him Melisinthia. He has perform'd his part of the obligation, and I ought to perform mine, else should I be the most treacherous among men, and should draw a just war upon my self, by making the King of Denmark my Enemy, who has always been my Protector. Sinibald, replied Aldemar, *expell'd the Saxons out of Jutland, because I forsook their defence to serve you, because I sent away my Army, that was able to have stopp'd his proceedings, because I threw my self into prison to redeem you, it was by such neglects as these, which would be my eternal shame (did not love excuse me) rather than through the valour of Sinibald that you recovered Jutland; and I suppose, you believe, that he might have found me strong enough to have opposed him, had I not rather chosen to lose all for your service, and that I had not renounc'd the Laws of Nature, and perhaps those of my Duty too, only for your sake. But, Sir, I am content, that you should leave your Crown to Sinibald, (for I omit to speak of your life, more than once by me preserved) only as she is my due, let me, and not Sinibald, enjoy Melisinthia: give to each of us, what you enjoy, by the services that each of us have perform'd: give to Sinibald, Jutland which he has won, provided that you leave me Melisinthia; let him rule over the Jutlanders, provided Melisinthia may be Queen of the Saxons. " Had I promised only Jutland to Sinibald, I would give it him immediately without more to do. But since it is only Melisinthia that I have promised him, there is nothing but the gift of Melisinthia can acquit me. Then let all things stand, (replied the Prince in a passion) as you left them after the the Battel, and let Sinibald force her out of my hands, if he has such a kindness for her: then she may be said to be his, but till then, he can claim no right of pretence to her, nor perhaps your self of disposing her in favour of him. " Seeing that Melisinthia, replied Gisulphus, was not in your power by any legal accident, but only by the violent chance of war, when we consider the arguments drawn from the unjust tyranny of your Family, which I have so long laboured under, you cannot pretend to have given her liberty, which she had not lost but by your means; and I would say the same of my own, were I not bound to you by other obligations than that of redeeming me out of prison. Oh, Sir, (said Aldemar, crossing his Arms upon his Breast, and retreating two or three steps backward) I find now too apparently, that the services which I have done for you, have not yet appeas'd that implacable hatred that you bear against our Family; and perhaps this is not the first time I have perceiv'd, that you still look upon me as the Son of the King of the Saxons, and the Brother of Gondemond. " I shall easily convince you of that opinion, replied Gisulphus, if you require any proof of my acknowledgment that I am capable to give. And unless it be that which I have disposed by promise, there is nothing within the verge of my power, which you may not absolutely command. And what can you offer him, (replied the Prince, beholding him with an angry look) that holds any proportion with his services, and his Dignity, from whom you have received them? Have you any Offices or Treasuries to bestow upon me sufficient to make me amends for the loss of Melisinthia? Or have you within your Kingdom, where withal, to advance the fortune of such a person as Aldemar? " I know very well, replied Gisulphus, very patiently, that I have nothing worthy your acceptance; and therefore seeing that Melisinthia her self is beneath your fortune, suffer me to give her to him from whom I came:*

“not take her. There is a way, said the Prince, to satisfy me, and disengage your self. You are engaged by your promise to give Melisinthæ to Sinibald; and it may be you believe that I deserve her as well as he. Discharge your self from the trouble of determining between two persons to whom you are equally engaged, and leave the decision to valour and fortune: Sinibald is a brave and valiant Soldier, I am no Coward, let us dispute the possession of Melisinthæ with our weapons, that so either the success of the Victor, or the death of him that is vanquish'd, may save you harmless from all reproach or complaint. Let fortune favour which side she pleases, you can come by no harm; for the death either of Aldemar or Sinibald gives you full liberty of election, which otherwise so long as we both live, may be a trouble to your mind to see that you can satisfy neither. “This proposal cannot be made, said Gifulphus, but by a person whose passion leaves him not the use of his reason; and you may very well judge, that I shall very unworthily behave my self towards Sinibald, to put that to the hazard of an encounter, which is his own by promise, and needs not be purchased at the price of his blood, or the hazard of his life: nor can I give any satisfaction to Aldemar, by exposing him to a Combat which may probably prove dangerous to his person. The possession of Melisinthæ is not so great a happiness as to be set to sale at the price of two such mens lives. And instead of saving my self harmless from reproaches and complaints, I could never pardon my own self for giving so fatal and so unjust a consent. Sir, said Aldemar, your consent is not at all necessary: we can with our Swords dispute the right of our pretences, without demanding your leave. “I am of opinion, replied Gifulphus, that Sinibald will not be willing to put that to the hazard of a Combat, which is his own by lawful right: and if I knew that he had any such intention, I have however power enough to prevent him. I cannot tell, (replied the Prince, who began to be impatient) whether you may have always power enough to maintain what you now say; or whether you may for all this behold your self again in your former condition of repentance. “I neither fear the effects of such a threat, replied Gifulphus, nor if it should befall me, could it make me repent of an action wherein I only did that which I ought to do. Well then, (said Aldemar, transported with anger) do what you ought to do, to advance the happiness of my Rival; but take from me first the ability, if I may advise you, of doing what I am able to obstruct it; or since that, notwithstanding the remembrance of some service, not to be forgotten without shame, you prefer before me a person inferior to me in all respects; Finish what you have begun, and take my life from me while you have it in your power; for be assured, if you do not prevent by my death the effect of my just anger, that I will arm the Saxons once more, and once more enter Jutland with Fire and Sword, to be revenged of your injustice; when Sinibald shall know, that he had not so easily vanquish'd the Saxons, had Aldemar fought at the head of his own Army. “To let you see, said Gifulphus, that these threatenings nothing at all terrifie me, I give you free leave to put them in execution, scorning the counsel which you give me to take away your life, while it is in my power. Neither the remembrance of what you have done for us, will permit me; nor does the fear of what you threaten, tempt me to it. And if you are not pleas'd to make any longer abode here, you shall have liberty to depart without any let or molestation within the Territories of my Jurisdiction. Yes, yes, I shall depart, replied Aldemar, and though for your sake, I have made a Father, who stretched forth his Arms to receive me in the midst of my adversity, my most mortal enemy, and that through this misfortune of mine I have no place of retreat, I have yet hopes, that what deprived your friend of refuge, will restore it to your enemy, and that I shall again find a Father whom I have lost; when I shall no longer be unfaithful to him for the love of you. Concluding these words he departed from the King's presence, so transported with rage, that he had much ado to prevent the fatal effects of a passionate fury. And they who met him coming out of the Closet, saw such apparent marks thereof in his eyes, that it was easie to conjecture what had pass'd. On the other side, Gifulphus was extremely nettled at his threatening language, nor had he endured it with so much patience, had not the remembrance of his great services been yet fresh in his memory; and that he thought it became him, to bear only words, from a person to whom he was so infinitely engaged. By and by he went to Melisinthæ's Apartment, but with so much disquiet in his face, that the Princess troubled thereat, thought her self obliged to enquire the cause. I understood the discourse that pass'd between them, from one of the Princess's maids of Honour, who had attended her in her imprisonment, and in all the misfortunes of her life; and from her it was that I learn'd all the particulars that I have hitherto related concerning the death of Gondemond, and many other things, that never could have come to light, but from the mouth of Melisinthæ, or her's, or of Gifulphus.

After he had suffered the Princess to make several entreaties, he told her at length all that had happened, and reheas'd to her word for word the whole discourse between him and the

the Prince. Melifuntha heard him very impatiently, and at length she was so disturbed in her mind, that Gisulphus could not draw one syllable from her, though he several times required her opinion upon the whole matter. He stood in admiration, and it may be was moved with pity, to behold such signs of sadness in her face: and therefore urging her with all his Authority to declare the reason; Would you not have me sorry Sir, said she, to see, that instead of that peace which you expect; you will go about to kindle greater wars than ever: while he becomes our mortal enemy, to whose fidelity and courage more than once we owe our lives. “You know, said Gisulphus, that one must be our Enemy either Sinibald or Aldemar: and as in provoking Aldemar, we only Arm a single power against us, who was our Enemy before; so you see well that your condition cannot be so bad, as if we should engage against us the Arms of the Danish King, whose protection is most necessary for us, and who by reason of the situation of our Territories, is a neighbour whose friendship is more important to us, than the Amity of the Saxons. But I fear Melifuntha, (adding to his discourse) that you mix particular with general considerations, and I believe I have discovered by some observations, that your thoughts encline rather to favour Aldemar than Sinibald. My thoughts Sir, replied the Princess, shall be always governed by your will, and though they were contrary to your intentions; I should find a way to reduce them to their obedience: But Sir I must confess, that as I have always thought, the obligations which we have received from Prince Aldemar, to be greater than what Sinibald ever laid upon us; and that it was my opinion, grounded upon several reasons, that you would have declared your self in favour of him; so I had disposed my self to obey your will, without any opposition. “How! replied Gisulphus, take you the services of Sinibald to be little considerable, when you know that 'tis to him I am beholding for my Crown? “Yes Sir, said Melifuntha, 'tis by the service of Sinibald that you reign, but by Aldemar's that you live. And as your life has been always more dear to me than your Crown, I confess that I thought there was no comparison, between Sinibald's kindness and Aldemar's travel. I must tell you farther, if you please to give me leave, and if my interest be worth your consideration, that together with the obligations which I owe him for your life, I am indebted to him for my own, and that perhaps I may not be thought to have offended, if so just an acknowledgment have bred something of an affection? I may also add, that having by so many proofs experienced that tender affection, with which you have always honour'd me, I always thought that you would testify it, rather in providing well for my future welfare, than in other things of lesser importance: and for that reason I thought that you would rather chuse to see your Daughter, Queen of the Saxons, commanding a potent Kingdom; rather than the wife of a Prince, that can expect to wield no other scepter but yours after your decease. “Are you then ignorant of the promise that I have made, replied Gisulphus, and have you no consideration of my word? As for your promise, replied Melifuntha, I never thought that Sinibald had any reason, to claim the performance of it, who not being able to free you, from the imprisonment of the Saxon King; cannot in justice expect to make any advantage, of the trouble and danger to which he himself, who set you at liberty, exposed himself. “Aldemar himself, said the King of Jutland; pleads not his own cause better than you do: And I find that your gratitude is more prevailing than I could wish it, but if you have an affection for him; you had as good fix it upon some other object: for in short he is not the person, whom I have resolved upon to be your Husband. My affection, said the Princess, whatever it may be; shall always submit to your will: But I hope you will pardon me, for justifying the respect which I have for Aldemar, for those reasons which obliged me to entertain it, fearing also the effects of his indignation; which may possibly reduce us to our former misery. I have already declared, replied Gisulphus, that we have no less to fear from the King of the Danes: and that if we must have a war; I had rather wage it with our Enemy than with our continual protector. Melifuntha durst not make any farther reply, but he might well perceive by her countenance, that it would be no small grief to her to obey his commands.

In the mean while Aldemar prepared himself for his departure, upon which he debated within himself with a strange irresolution: not that he had but only one single place of retreat, for he knew of many in the Courts of those Princes where he had spent his travels, and where he had also many friends; but for that his thoughts were wholly employed, how to revenge himself upon the King of the Jutlanders for his ingratitude; to overturn the fortune of Sinibald and to obtain Melifuntha by conquest. He knew he could not live if he did not overcome the evil fortune that threatned him. which he saw he could not otherwise effect, than by engaging in a war with Jutland. He considered also that he was engaged by the threatening language which he had given Gisulphus: he found also that he could undertake nothing of what he had design'd, without a sufficient Army and a powerful support and in short not without casting himself into his Father's Arms, to beg his pardon and assistance to make a war upon his Enemies. He could not doubt but that his Father was justly incens'd against him, and that his anger was not easily appeas'd: however he had hopes, to pacifie him by his humility; seeing that necessity constrain'd him to look upon him as his only Son, now that his other two were both lost: and more than out of any other consideration, by reason of the design which he then had of renewing the war, to the intent he might repair the loss of his honour, and the loss which the Saxons had suffered, by the overthrow that Sinibald had given them. As to what he had reason to fear in relation to his own person, he was little or nothing concern'd, for being to lose Melisintha: all other dangers were looked upon as nothing: so that at length he resolv'd to throw himself at the feet of the King his Father, and try if fortune would be so favourable to him, as to grant him what he hoped for. Thereupon calling to him, those of his own Attendants whom he had most respect for; he let us understand his unhappiness and the resolution he had taken: and commanded us to make all things ready, for his departure the next day. He had no reason to believe that the King would be at all displeas'd, with any of those that had attended him as his domesticks. But as for Gelimer he was loth to trust to the King's mercy, and therefore sent him away with a Letter, which he wrote in his behalf to the King of the Vandals, who was his particular friend, till he could make his peace with the King his Father, or that he himself were in a condition, to raise him to a better fortune than that which he had lost, by doing him that unhappy piece of service. He had a desire above all things to encounter Sinibald, and he did me the honour to chuse me out of all his Train, to send me with a message to him to that effect, and to perswade him without more ado, to put an end to the contest about the enjoyment of Melisintha by a single Combat, and to assure him that he would quit all his pretences to the Conquerour, if it were his fortune to be victorious. But it was impossible for me to speak privately with Sinibald, he was so narrowly watch'd; or rather so strictly guarded, as well by Gisulphus who by the discourse of Aldemar foresaw his design; and by all the rest of the Courtiers, to whom Gisulphus had given a special charge to take particular care of his person, that he was never to be met withal but in the midst of a great throng, who would not suffer any, especially the servants of Aldemar, to come near him. I doubt not however but that if it had been possible, to have made known his intentions to Sinibald; the Danish Prince would have given him all the satisfaction he could have expected, and that he would have done his endeavour to have baulk'd his Guards, to have let him understand that he deserved Melisintha, no less for his valour than for his fortune. However it were, our Prince could not find any opportunity to satisfy himself that way, and therefore was constrain'd to refer all his revenge, to the war which he was contriving, and to which he knew the King his Father had no less an inclination: He spent the rest of the day and the night following in preparing for his journey, and in hiring a Vessel to be ready for our transportation. Jutland is a Peninsula or half Island, fair, large and well peopled: but the entrances into it by land were in the possession of the Danes, being Masters of both sides of the Sea, and of all that space or tract of Land between shore and shore, which gives great advantages to the Danes over the Jutlanders: whom they keep shut in between those places and the Sea which environs them on every side, and that by reason of their being possess'd of those passes, they can either let in or keep out any other nation; that comes to invade the Jutlanders by land, which was the reason that the Saxons had so much trouble to keep that Country after they had conquered it, and that they were always forced to keep great Fleets at Sea, when they made war upon the Jutlanders, so long as the Danes were their Enemies, and refused them entrance by land as they had always done: And for this reason it was that we were compell'd to return by sea, and for that purpose to make sure of a vessel, which it was not very difficult for us to do. Gisulphus contenting himself only to spite Aldemar by refusing Melisintha, without impeaching his departure or giving him any other cause to complain; some hours before he took his last leave of the King, as it was necessary for us to do: the end he might give us free liberty; the Prince sent to know of Melisintha, whether he might be permitted to take his last leave of her, and whether he might be permitted to have some few minutes discourse with her out of the hearing of his Enemies; to whom the Princess not having received any order to the contrary, sent back word that she was ready to receive him privately in her closet. Aldemar hasted thither immediately, and entred himself singly leaving us in a Chamber hard by. Melisintha presently spyed in his countenance all the marks of his despair, nor was he without some consolation to behold in her eyes, all the signs of a real sorrow. But he had yet a far clearer manifestation of the Princess's inclinations, who coming toward him with a behaviour, far different from any that he

he had ever observ'd before, and eagerly preventing him as he was about to speak, "Princess, said she, it was chiefly my own desire to see you, to the end I might make you a credible profession of my innocency, and how little I am guilty of the ingratitude of my Father, and that I might justify my self before you, before the Gods, and before men; and let you know what a contest I have had with Gisulphus, as far as I durst venture to convince him that it was to your self, and not to Sinibald, that he was to surrender." Melifintha. I must add, (since in regard of the injustice which is done you, it is less sinful for me to confess that which till now I have never done) that as well my own inclinations, as my acknowledgment lead me to prefer you before Sinibald, and before all other men in the world; and that at the first time I saw you, I did not look upon you with an indifferent eye, and that my affection did not stay to expect the issue of your last services. I am perhaps imprudent to let you understand so much of my thoughts, at a time when I ought rather to conceal them, seeing that notwithstanding all this I am desir'd to another person. But my grief does not consult my prudence, and I had rather be wanting in that, than what I owe to your merit, your affection, your services, and my own repose. If in this you find any consolation, I am willing to share with you; and what ever resolution you shall take, I shall be glad to find you satisfied that I have neither been ungrateful, nor insensible.

These expressions so charm'd Aldemar's grief, that it almost remov'd it for a time, so that now with less melancholy, and less sadness in his eyes than had clouded them at his first entrance into the closet; Oh Princess; said he, why flatter you my despair with words able to revive me from my Tomb, were they real? "And why, (said the Princess with a discontented aspect) do you suspect them not to be true? Because, replied the Princess, I am the most unfortunate among men; but if that which you tell me, were true, I should be no longer believe my self to be so, but I should esteem my self more fortunate than Sinibald: for in short, Aldemar, did I think it true, that your inclinations were agreeable to your acknowledgment of my love and services; and that it were true, that you believe you should be more happy with Aldemar than with any other person, as you should not only never be tyed to Sinibald, so nothing should hinder you from the enjoyment of your faithful Aldemar. "If a true affection can produce that effect, replied Melifintha, you may be assured, but I cannot conceive how such an affection can disengage me from Sinibald, to make me Aldemar's. You have sufficiently testified, said Aldemar, that violence cannot force your inclinations, so that if you will act against Sinibald, and against Gisulphus, but half so much as you have acted against Gondemond, and the King of the Saxons, I desire all the power of Europe to give you to Sinibald. "Oh, Sir, replied Melifintha, blushing, have a care what you say; and consider, that there is a great difference between a tyrannical power, such as was your Father's constraint over me, and a lawful and natural authority, like that of Gisulphus: and can I look upon Sinibald, from whom we have received nothing but favour, as upon Gondemond, who deprived us at once of a Crown, our liberty, and the life of my two Brothers? Neither do I, replied Aldemar, require the death of Sinibald, nor the burning of this Palace; nor do I desire that you should use Gisulphus or Sinibald as Tyrants, or as Enemies. But if you have the same constancy to refuse Sinibald, as you had to deny Gondemond at the very Altar it self; if you have but the same confidence to commit your self to the Sea with Aldemar, as you had to trust your self with Gisulphus, all the assembled Forces of the Danes and Jutlanders together, should not hinder you from being Queen of the Saxons. "You know, replied the Princess very affectionately, that it is not lawful for me to disobey my Father, as I did my Enemy; and that what might be accounted an act of courage and constancy, in that extremity, and possibly might deserve praise, would now be otherwise construed, and would draw upon me the reproach of all the world. "And for going away with Aldemar, as I fled away with Gisulphus, I would willingly consent to it, if Virtue and Duty would permit me to follow a Lover, as they commanded me to follow a Parent. What then wilt you do for me, (replied Aldemar, relapsing into his former melancholy) and what success am I to expect from that pity which you make me believe you have for me; or from that affection with which you permit me to comfort my self? "I have discovered the affection I have for you, said the Princess, not for you to expect relief from thence, but to let you understand that I do not merit any that in those reproaches you may justly cast upon them that do you the injustice; and that by these proceedings of Gisulphus, whence your misfortune derives it self, I my self shall also become unhappy. If it be so, replied Aldemar I am still engag'd to do more yet than I thought for, and that if I thought to enterprise this to prevent my own misfortune, there is nothing which I ought to leave unattempted, to prevent yours; I make no question but I shall be able to stop this course of Sinibald's fortune, if you will be but so kind as to assist me: for if you can but defer for some few months the consummation of this fatal marriage, by that power which you have over Gifulphus, I will put his affairs into such a confusion, that he shall not have time to think farther of it. "How, (said the Princess, full of sorrow) must I be the incendiary to set all my native Country in a combustion? Must the blood of thousands be shed for me? And for my sake must our Family be reduced to our former calamity? Oh, Aldemar, I must never consent to this; and if you have any love for me, you will never appear in Arms against my Father. As for the life of Gifulphus, replied Aldemar, to me it shall always be sacred and inviolable; for whatever prejudice I may have against his humour, his death will never be an introduction to my happiness: And as for your Subjects, I will ease them as much as in me lies, from the miseries of war; to which end I will be sure to fall most heavy upon Denmark: But as for the happiness of Sinibald, you must give me leave to oppose it with Fire and Sword, which if you forbid me to do, you had as good yield your self to Sinibald, and suffer me to kill my self in your presence. "As I do not permit you, replied Melintha, so I deny you nothing; for as I dare not give you such a Commission as may make me guilty of all the miseries that shall happen to my Country, so neither is it for me to deny any thing to a Prince to whom I owe all things. You might do more than you do, replied the Prince, for if you remember what you once promised me; Redeem my Father, said you, if it lies in your power, and hope for all things. " (Peace, said Melintha, seeing him stop at these words) peace, Prince, and do but recollect your self; for then you will find, that what I meant by hoping all things, was intended of all things that were within the limits of an obedience, not repugnant to my Father's will. I have done more than I promised, for I have not only declared to my Father how ready I would be to obey his pleasure, should he command me to prefer you before Sinibald, but I have also let him understand, perhaps more than became me to do, that I should never willingly obey him, if he commanded me the contrary. What farther lies in my power I shall not leave undone; and while you by gentle means endeavour to change the resolution of Gifulphus, I will delay the consummation to the utmost of my power, and to the farthest length of time that I am able; nay, I will tell Sinibald himself, if I cannot otherwise prevail, that out of the dislike which I have to the marriage, I must have time to frame my humour to it: if you love me, be but satisfied with what I am able to perform; and assure your self, that I will sooner die, than injure my Gratitude; should I do that, I were not worthy of your affection, seeing that the honour I have to be beloved by you, is by me valued at a higher rate, than to omit any thing, so long as I live, that may assist me to deserve it. These your good thoughts of me, replied the Prince, are above all expressions of my thanks; and it lies on my part, to make my self worthy, by all the ways that my love and fortune are capable to contrive for my advantage. In the mean time I must depart and leave you to your self, and perhaps I shall never see you more, till married to Sinibald. "Come, said Melintha to him, the Gods will be perhaps more favourable than you expect: and you may depend upon my promise, that I will forget nothing within the limits of my ability to keep off the evil day. In the mean while, I conjure you, not to flie out when you take leave of Gifulphus, least out of the fear of what mischief you may do him, he may put a stop to your journey. I shall obey your command, replied Aldemar, and for that I know I shall sooner obtain Melintha by force, than by a second imprisonment, I shall do nothing that may prevent my being in a condition to win her. Having said these words, he took his leave, though not with so much resolution, but that his grief shewed it self with all the visible marks that usually accompany it; nor with so much constancy on Melintha's part, but that her fair cheeks were over-flowed with her tears.

Going out of the Princess's Chamber, he sent to know of Gifulphus, whether he might conveniently wait upon him; but the Prince of Jutland, remembering how far he was obliged to him, and who was as unwilling to provoke him as possible might be, presently left his own Appartment to wait upon him, and met him in a Chamber not far from Melintha's, where the Prince stayed the return of the messenger; Gifulphus excused himself for what he had been constrain'd to do, upon his words: but Aldemar, not forgetting what Melintha had commanded him, and who was willing to avoid all occasions of being stayed in Jutland, out of the design he had to return thither in a better Equipage, disssembled a great part of his anger, and took his leave with so much moderation, that Gifulphus had some reason to hope, that time and his absence from Melintha might make him quite lay aside his indignation. He would not visit Sinibald, but seeing him pass through the Chamber, as he was talking with Gifulphus, notwithstanding the resolution he had taken, he could not contain himself, but stopping him in his passage, and taking him by the hand, Sinibald, said he,

you must know, that you are beholding to me for Melintha, if it be the will of the Gods that you enjoy her, since 'tis to me that you are oblig'd for her liberty, and the life of Gifulphus: I would have contended for her, if our fortune had been equally favourable; for you must give me leave to think that I deserve her as well as you. No question but Sinibald made him an answer; but Aldemar, who left him as he had done speaking, would not stay to hear it, not being willing to engage himself in a contest whence he could not easily get off. In a short while after we took Horse, and because Gifulphus was unwilling to discontent the Prince as little as might be, we had all accommodations for our journey; and the next day we found a Vessel ready at one of the Ports of Jutland, wherein the Prince being embark'd, steer'd directly for the Coasts of Saxony.

Our King was then at Hispalia, a City seated in the middle of all his Territories, where he was raising more Forces, to carry on the war which he intended again to renew, against his implacable Enemies, and where he almost pined himself to death for grief. He had laid to heart the loss of Jutland, a fair and large Province, which till then had much added to the largeness of his Territories; and he had impatiently born the loss of that Battel which Sinibald had won, whereby he was constrained to quit Jutland to the Victor. But he was less afflicted at these losses, than with Aldemar's behaviour, whom love had caused to act so contrary to his love and interest. To that misfortune he attributed all the rest that had befallen him since the death of Gondemond: and because he verily believed, that if Aldemar had commanded his Army into Jutland, he had put a stop to Sinibald's success, and thereby not only sav'd the loss of the Battel, but kept Jutland still in his subjection, therefore he look'd upon him as the author of all his evil fortune. But his displeasure was more encreas'd by the liberty which he had given to Gifulphus, at such a time when he could have hindered him, as a Captive, from making any advantage of what Sinibald had done for him, and that he had some possibility of revenging himself for the death of Gondemond, and of being able to oppose himself to all the designs of his Enemies, that watch'd all opportunities to annoy him.

These wrongs committed by the only Son that he had left alive, overwhelmed him with a heap of affliction; and he was the more apprehensive thereof, knowing the rare endowments of his Son, and that his Princely Qualities were such, that he could not choose but love and esteem him. This affection, which notwithstanding all his fury, he could not drive from his heart, sometimes would persuade him to excuse the first faults of Aldemar, occasioned by that unfortunate passion, that had been the destruction of his other two Sons, and the effects whereof he fear'd in relation to this. Sometimes he saw some reason for what he had done, in giving Gifulphus his liberty, when he considered the Prince's contempt of his own freedom, and of his life it self, in committing it to the power of his enemies, till he could redeem himself by an exchange with Gifulphus. At other times, according to the different passions that reigned successively in his breast, as before he sought to excuse him, so then he sought to condemn him. In short, though he knew him to be guilty of offences bad enough to deserve his anger, nature pleaded for him, and represented to the King that he was his only child, that he was a Son to be esteem'd for the merit of his virtues, before either of those which he had lost, that he wanted his assistance to support his old age, and to oppose his Enemies, which made him earnestly wish that he would return to his Duty, that he would forget Melintha, and that he would recal himself into a condition to make amends for what he had committed.

These were the King's thoughts, though he concealed them as much as it was possible; when we arrived at Hispalia, after a prosperous voyage; and that the Prince having concealed his arrival, and surprizing him in his Closet, threw himself with all humility at his feet, embracing his knees. The King surpris'd at his arrival, was a good while before he could conceive him to be the same person, but when he was assured that it was the Prince, thrusting him weakly from his knees, How, Aldemar, said he, is it you, and is it possible that you have left Melintha? Yes, Sir, replied the Prince, *I am that offender, more worthy the thunder of your anger, than the marks of your affection. I have robb'd you of the revenge of Melintha, I committed my self a prisoner to the custody of your Enemies, to redeem her Father out of your hands; I loyter'd there, while I should have oppos'd the Arms of Sinibald; I delivered Gifulphus from those Fetters which you had provided for him. In short, I am guilty of all these, and many more offences, and worthy all the punishment which they deserve, unless the passion which forc'd me to commit them, may in some measure qualifie the heynousness of my crimes; and that you will be pleas'd to consider, that a Lover together with his heart sometimes loses his reason. I confess also that my repentance proceeds not from a good ground, since misfortune and indignation restore me to my Duty; and that if Gifulphus had not prov'd ingrati-* ful, I had linger'd all my life long at the feet of Melisinthæ. If my weakness and my misfortune provoke your anger, punish me, Sir, as your Subject: If they move your pity, look upon me as your Son, and attribute my faults rather to my evil fate, than to my intentions. "Then, said the King, you return to me, but only because Gisulphus was ingrateful; or that you had stay'd with him still, had he been so kind as you expected. 'Tis truth, reply'd the Prince, and if this confession which I make, deserve your anger, I am contented to die, rather as the object of your pity, than of your indignation; and perhaps shall be no less bound to you for my death, than for the life which you gave me. "This despair shews, reply'd the King, that you find your self wrong'd by your Enemies; and I would have concern'd my self in your quarrel, had you not forsaken me to serve them. But in short, what am I to expect from this repentance of yours, such as it is? Will it produce good effects, though the ground thereof be bad? Come you now to employ your valour in the revenge of your Brother's death, and to the destruction of Gisulphus and Melisinthæ? Sir, as for Melisinthæ, reply'd Aldemar, nothing but death can make me cease to love her, and consequently I am compelled not to attempt the life of her Father. But, Sir, if your anger can be any other way appeas'd, than by shedding that blood which I am forbid to still; if I may any way deserve your forgiveness of those faults which my love has committed, if you will trust me with the conduct of your Army, I will pluck from the ingrateful Gisulphus that Crown which they have set upon his head: I will repair the loss that you have suffer'd, through the fortune of Sinibald, and I will prevent, at the price of my blood, a marriage not more fatal to me, than destructive to your Kingdom, and pernicious to the well being of your Sovereignty. "You are more amorous than politick, reply'd the King, and by your past actions it is easie to judge. that rather your love than the good of my Kingdoms, inflames your passion. But let it be as it will, (for I must not deny, this alliance between the Danes and Jutlanders to be prejudicial to me, and that it deprives us almost of all hopes ever to be Masters of Jutland) though I should have so much of paternal affection to pardon your past offences, though I should so far confide in you, as to put you at the head of an Army, do you think I would ever give so much way to your foolish passion, as to let you espouse that cruel woman who kill'd your Brother. Oh, Sir, reply'd the Prince, Melisinthæ is altogether innocent of the death of Gondemond. And by Gisulphus himself while he remain'd imprison'd under your power, would he but have confess'd the truth from his own mouth, you would have plainly been convinc'd that Melisinthæ never was consenting to the murder; she was more than sorry for the fact, though it be true, that she hated Gondemond as the person that slew her Brothers. And if you knew her, Sir, you might apparently see that inhumanity is a crime no way compatible with her virtue. In short, Sir, (said the Prince, pursuing his discourse, when he perceiv'd that the King patiently hearkened to him) either inflict upon me that death which I have deserv'd, and by a just punishment deprive your self of the only child the Gods have left you, or else forbid me not to hope that you will one day behold with pity the effects of a passion which you your self did once approve, though it cost both your Sons their lives, and will send me also to the Grave, if your goodness save me not, the only remedy of my affliction, which I have so unhappily abused. Concluding these words, he embraced the King's knees, and moisten'd them with such a stream of tears, that the King, who could not but regard his noble qualities, which he really doted on, and who look'd upon him as the only object of all his hopes, could no longer withstand the motions of his affection, and immediately letting fall a shower of tears, he tenderly embrac'd him; and after a short silence, Well, Son, said he, I am resolv'd to pardon what is past, and will pardon Melisinthæ for your sake; and I am resolv'd to arm all my Forces, to the end you may be able to dispute the possession of her with Sinibald.

He utter'd his mind in these few words, which were so pleasing to the Prince's ears, that they transport'd him with all the joy that his Soul was capable to receive. He made it appear in the passionate returns of his thanks, and gave such satisfaction to the King for the favour he had done him, that oblig'd the King to bestow upon him all the marks of his affection that he could desire. After this, all the Court came to congratulate the Prince: and as he was honour'd for his deserts, for the sweetness of his behaviour, and his obliging familiarity; and for that they had reason to expect something from him beyond the fame of his Brothers, or the renown of all his Ancestors, they solemniz'd his return and reconciliation to the King, with all the signs and ceremonies of publick joy.

During these publick festivals, the King finding every day more and more reason to love and esteem him, and to settle the affection which he had for him; manifest'd his diligence in nothing more, than in hastening to compleat his levies, to the end he might be furnish'd with a sufficient power to win Melisinthæ: and in short, that I may finish my relation. Both

Father and Son so well plyed their affairs, and so well improved the friendship of their confederates; that in a short time they raised an Army, greater than had been raised in our Country in all the former wars: and being of opinion that in regard of the strict league that was between the Danes and the Jutlanders, that it was necessary to make war against both Nations at once; they agreed that while Aldemar with a puissant Army invaded Jutland, the King with another Army should fall into Denmark, not expecting to make any great conquest there; so much as to prevent the Danish King from succouring Gisulphus and Sinibald. What they had resolved they put in execution a few days after, to which purpose, Aldemar having now ready the most numerous Fleet, that had been seen upon our Seas for many years, embark'd his men: and the King at the same time begun his march for Denmark. I made no question but that I should have attended Prince Aldemar, to whose service I had entirely devoted my self, among the rest that had attended upon him in his misfortunes in Jutland, of which number was Gelimer, whose peace he had made with the King. But the King made choice of me in particular, said Gismond, to send me to your Majesty, (addressing himself to the King of Suevia) to let you know the reasons that hindered him from joyning with you in your quarrel, or from sending any forces to your assistance. I doubt not Sir, but you find them sufficient for him, to hope that you will excuse his disappointment, and that notwithstanding the allyance between the Danish King and yourself, you will be pleased to keep your self a Neuter, as you have hitherto done betwixt the two Crowns.

This was the relation of Gismond, and as those illustrious Auditors had hearkened with all attention and heed imaginable, to the adventures of Aldemar and to what Melantha had suffered; they could not but be much concern'd and troubled within themselves, to understand the misfortunes of two such unhappy Lovers; wishing all happiness to Aldemar and all success to his undertaking. The Queens, the Princesses, the Kings and Princes, who composed that Royal Society, every one declared their opinions: and there were very few that favoured Sinibald, or who were not offended at Gisulphus, though there was no want of Arguments to excuse his proceeding: Only the King of Suevia differed in his judgment from all the rest, and when he had an opportunity to speak, addressing himself to Gismond; We have no reason, said he, to complain of the King of the Saxons, for he has too many irons in the fire to concern himself with us, but I must tell you that I pity his weakness, and that he does not deserve to succeed in his designs, for his indulgence to the foolish passion of Aldemar. We would have otherwise counselled him, had he required our advice: but perhaps the event will teach him whether he hath acted prudently or no. And so concluding he bid the Queens good night, and took Gismond along with him, and by reason it was late, the other Princesses did the same; leaving the Princesses to their repose.

The End of the Third Book of the Sixth Part.

PHARAMOND.

BOOK IV.

THat Night was spent by those illustrious personages, as many others preceding had been: for there was hardly one in the whole company, whom love gave liberty to sleep. Balamir who among all these lovers, was none of those that suffered the least, though he were the most esteem'd and favour'd of all those that admired the Cimbrian Queen, and who had more than one reason to be perplexed in his mind; was the first that was stirring next morning, and going to the King of Suevia; he desired leave to visit Prince Viridomar. That King who infinitely respected him and revered him for his virtue, though their dispositions were far different; would by no means deny him: so that the Prince of the Huns, having first sent to know of Viridomar whether it might be seasonable, went into his chamber. If Balamir by what he had observed, in the person of Viridomar, and by the same which he had heard of his Acts, had conceived that respect for the Prince which was due to him; Viridomar who in their society one with another, and that first part of an encounter, had found in him all things answerable to his renown, was no less just in paying him according to his merit. Nor was it to be perceived during those visits which Balamir made Viridomar, oftner than any other of the Princes, that the late quarrel had bred in the heart of Balamir, any effect so worthy the grandeur of his Soul, which Viridomar did not find redoubled in his own breast for him: Nor could he without sorrow or at least without some shame, behold Balamir the first in manifesting those kind thoughts of each other, which were common to both. He received Balamir with all becoming grace, and gave him to understand by his looks, that the discontent which his passion might occasion, did not hinder him from being sensible of the satisfaction which he received in his visit: instigated therefore by the engagement laid upon him, because he could not go before him, being detained by his wound in his bed; he was willing at least to prevent the discourse which he expected from him, with the testimonies of his acknowledgment: Therefore after Balamir was fate down by his bed-side, looking upon him rather like a Freeman than a Captive; You ought, said he, to have contented your self in admiring Viridomar, either for his discourse or for his courage; without shewing him this last advantage which you have got over him: nor can he otherwise comfort himself, than in the joy which he has to find his own thoughts so conformable to yours, though fortune have denyed him the opportunity to give the first testimony thereof. "I cannot tell," said Balamir smiling, whether I durst have given you a visit in any other place, than where you have neither Arms nor freedom: For if you call to mind that violence, which you offered to a just inclination, that made me to covet the Honour of your friendship, rather than the encounter, you may thence conjecture, that I should be safer in any other place, than here." "I should be ashamed of an offence which you call to my remembrance," replied the Prince of Suevia, if I did not believe that for the reason which now you know, you might have excused it in part, and if the other might not be justified by the glory, which I thought to have purchased in the encounter." "You had so little need," replied the Prince of the Huns to seek for honour by that encounter, who are laden with the renown of so many other famous deeds; that if you had no other reason you might be blam'd, to have compelled a person to fight who had no inclination to it: and who refused it so long, that you had good cause to suspect his courage. "If that reason," replied Viridomar, will not justify me, I hope you will have regard to others: and you know too much of love, to excuse the fault which love causes us to commit. "We have so great an obligation to yours," replied Balamir, that we “are engaged particularly to respect it : for if love had not prepossessed your heart to de-“send it against that Celestial beauty, that makes so many persons miserable, your return “into Germany had been fatal to our hopes. “It may be, said Viridomar, that in regard of “the good opinion which the King of the Cimbrians had of me, my love might have vy’d “with the affection of any of Rosamond’s admirers. But if the dispute lay upon virtue and “merit, that of Prince Balamir is too formidable, to give me any hope of success. I say the “virtue of Prince Balamir, for as for those other pretenders who have united themselves “in her Quarrel against King Pharamond; I had not for any of them quitted my own interest.

 “You would but too well have defended it, both against Pharamond and against us, replied “Balamir, and we find by your taking part with the King of the Franks, how great advan“tages he has, through the beauty of his Sister in the assistance of your Arms. There is no “way that I could ever hope, to succeed against the King of the Franks, though by that “success which he hath had against me in two Battels; I got more honour than in all those “other wherein fortune was more favourable to me. I only wish for your sake that you “were not his Rival, for setting aside all other obstructions that oppose him; he had no “reason in the world to despair, had he not Balamir’s merit to encounter. “This merit, “(replied Balamir very modestly) is not worthy that applause which you give it, so inconsi“derable in respect of Pharamond’s, that he has the least reason in the world, to suspect or “be afraid of it. ’Tis my misfortune to be his Rival not my desire : and as I sought for “death in finding love, so I make no question, that in this love I may find that death, which “a former love made me seek. “To say the truth the danger is apparent enough, replied
 “the Prince, which threatens all them that are Armed against Pharamond’s life : and well they “may expect to, meet with death in the attempt. But seeing there is no less danger of “Pharamond’s life than of yours, and that to whether of you two fortune gives the victory, “by the death of the other, the whole world will be the loser ; therefore it were to be wish“ed that Balamir were not Pharamond’s Enemy. “I have already declared to the great “Countance, replied Balamir, that I was no foe to Pharamond, though by misfortune I was “become his Rival : and as I will never hazard a Combat with you more upon this dispute, “(thus he went on smiling) so there shall be nothing wanting, either of my counsel or en“deavours to conclude a peace with him. And I dare presume to tell you, that as much “link’d to his interest as you are, whether through your own inclination, or for the love
 “you bear the Princess his Sister, you cannot have a higher esteem, nor a more venerable re“spect for the merit of Pharamond than my self. “He is very unfortunate, replied the Prince “of Suevia, that having so much merit he should have so many Enemies, for that virtue is “unhappy that produces miserable effects. “But Sir, (said Balamir, to alter the subject of “the discourse) may we be well assured that you will not change your opinion? And “though you have defended your self against the first sight of Rosamond, (for we understand “that you have seen her) may we think that you will always preserve your self with the “same success, and that we shall not be trebly unhappy, in finding you among the number “of our Rivals, who are so much to be feared? “I confess, said Viridomar, that before such “a Beauty as Rosamond’s, there is no man dares presume to undertake, either for his own “liberty when he is free ; nor for his fidelity though engaged in his affections to another.
 “But this I dare assure you, that how divine soever she may appear, she will never cause “any other effects in me but of admiration and respect. For that which defends me from “all the power of her Glances, is a beauty not so contemptible, that a man can expel from “his heart the resemblance thereof, having once taken possession of it. “I have, said Ba- “lamir sighing, known some that have said as much, but however they have been very “much deceived. In some persons, replied the Prince of Suevia, who having lost their “hopes wander in search of a cure ; or in some lovers, who for many years like Prince Bala- “mir, have lost their beloved object ; it is not impossible to find this alteration : But for “me that do not believe my self in that condition, and who do not despair of my good for“tune ; I promise you, Sir, I shall never be your Rival, so you never love Polixena. Bala- “mir was about to reply, when Gondioch who as well as himself, had obtained leave of the “King of Suevia to visit the Prince entred the Room. Viridomar courtcouly received him, “though he had no great kindness for him ; by reason of his ingratitude toward Pharamond : “however he had reason to consider his Royal dignity, and those great endowments of his “mind, by means whereof he had gained so high a renown ; before his passion had Eclipsed
 “the lustre of his virtue. Gondioch after some expressions of his sorrow for his misfortune,
 “and his readiness to serve him to the utmost of his power ; told him that he came particu“larly at the request of Gondemar, who could not rest in quiet for the error which his jealousy

he would have come himself to have desired his pardon, had he not been hindred by force. That against him of all men in the world, he would never have drawn his sword, and that instead of assaulting his person had he known him; he would rather have defended him to the last drop of his blood. Viridomar answered to the first part of his discourse, that as to his own particular, he had done very justly and honourably: but when he had heard what had been delivered on Gondemar's behalf; "I cannot tell, said he, whether it does not rather become me to make my excuse to Gondemar, since I might have avoyded the encounter which he forced me to, had I let him see his error: But as it was a thing of too great importance for me to discover, and for that men like him and my self do not readily explain their meaning, when they are dar'd by another with a Sword in his hand; I am in some hopes that he will the sooner pardon me, for what farther past between us; instead of condemning him I shall applaud him as long as I live: and I find all his Actions so worthy the esteem which all the world has of him, that if I had another Sister, with whom I might do him those kind offices, which Albifinda denyes me to pretend to; there are few in the world that I would advise her to prefer before him. The only fault that he committed was, in disclosing a secret which you trusted to a person of no worth, by means whereof you have occasioned all this trouble. "As for me, (replied Gondioch somewhat ashamed of himself) I assure you that it was as much against my will, as it was against the will of Gondemar that this secret was discovered, and that I should have been more wary, had I known that you had been any way concerned. "I am nothing troubled for my own concerns, replied the Prince of Suevia, for you see I did not mind my own interest, when the repose and reputation of my Sister lay at stake. "If Briomer, said Gondioch, who has imprudently committed an error, thought you would not be displeas'd to see him; he would endeavour to justify himself. "No Sir, replied the Prince, I care not for the fight of him, and were I at liberty I would make him understand, that it becomes not such a one as he, to blemish the reputations of persons that he ought to reverence. This discourse had set the two Princes in a heat, in regard of the prejudice that Viridomar had against Gondioch; if Balamir had not prevented it by changing the subject of the discourse, and if the Prince of Persia together with Martian, and after them the King of the Alains, the Herules, and the Basternes, had not entred the Room and interrupted them. They all profered their services and their civilities to the Prince of Suevia, who received them all like one, who was not unacquainted how to entertain great personages, especially the Prince of Persia, whose high dignity and generous qualities deserved a particular consideration. Varanex put him in mind of the accident, which first gave him the honour of knowing him; when Viridomar thanked him for the favour which he did him at that time; in saving him when he was expos'd to so much danger, while he encountred Balamir. Alderic and Gudegesile omitted nothing to express their good intentions toward him, and the young King of the Basternes, who for the love which he had for Albifinda, was particularly oblig'd to a more than ordinary address, behaved himself with singular applause. Their discourse was upon several indifferent subjects; for Viridomar, who had not the same kindness for any of the rest, as he had for Balamir, would admit no discourse of Pharamond; or if it were urg'd, Balamir by his prudence assist'd him to put it off.

Soon after they took their leaves altogether, and went with the King of Suevia to wait upon the Queens who were already dress'd: they found them altogether in the Queen of the Cimbrians Chamber, who rose the latest; and because it was a lovely day, the Prince of Persia made a proposition to the Queens, to take the air in a great Wood that was between the two Camps, where there were several fair and spacious walks, delightful shades, and some pleasing Fountains, and security enough by reason of the cessation. The Queens consented to the proposal, and having given their orders accordingly, they made haste with Dinner that they might have the more time to walk. Rosamond and Amalzontha were the more ready and willing to go, thinking they might find there a better opportunity to entertain themselves in private, than where they were always haunted and pester'd with a crowd. After Dinner the Chariots were soon ready, but because those fair Princesses (according to the custom of the age wherein they liv'd) were wont to ride a Horseback; several beautiful Nags were made ready, caparison'd with costly and magnificent Furniture, and led after the Chariots for the Ladies to ride, when they came to the Wood. The two Queens and the Princess rode together in Rosamond's Chariot, leaving the rest to their Attendants, and with a magnificent Convoy of Princes that attended them on Horseback, they took their way toward the head of the River Seguz, which rises at one end of the Wood.

This fair company, the fairest then to be seen in the world, rode slowly towards the Wood; and the Lovers of Rosamond surrounding her Chariot, every one strove to divert her with some discourse or other, or were else ambitious to give her the opportunity to observe their graceful postures in sitting and managing their prancing Steeds: only Jordan is prepossessed with either melancholy or discontent, stayed behind. But the Prince of Persia, the valiant Balamir, Ardaric and Godegesile, with the young King of the Basternes, accompanied of Albifinda, appeared all together in great splendour, keeping as near about the Chariot as the way and opportunity would permit. But the King of Suevia, burnd with other thoughts than those of Gallantry, kept at a distance, accompanied with Marnez, Briomer, and some other the most considerable Commanders of the Army. At length, the Queens, together with their train and their Royal Convoy, came to the Wood; and being already got into a clean and open way, Albifinda and Amalazomba who had before agreed to ride, causing their Horses to be brought for themselves, and some of their Attendants, were presently set up by the assistance of the Princes, who crowded to proffer their services, and took no small delight to behold their skill and comely grace in riding. The Queen of the Cimbrians not having a disposition to follow their example, desired to be dispensed withal, and remained alone in her Chariot that followed after them that Rode.

They had already taken some turns, when they found themselves at the end of the Wood where Balamir and Viridomar had fought some days before upon a quarrel about Pharamond, but had been parted by the Prince of Persia, who also there first beheld the fair Rosamond. By the importance of the accident that had rendred it remarkable, he knew it again, and being willing to put Balamir, who rode on the opposite side of the Chariot, in mind of it: See there, said he, where once I saw two valiant Combatants with their Swords in their hands, and where once perhaps I saw'd both the one and the other from no small danger. For my part, said Balamir, I believe my self to be the person who was most oblig'd to your kindness, for I make no question but I was in the greatest danger: but perhaps that place ought not to be so remarkable to you for the noble action which you there performed, as for the first sight of the Queen, and the effects which thit has produc'd. True it is, replied Varanez that there it was that the fight of her finish'd what the fair Picture had begun: nor have I forgot, that it is to you that I stand indebted both for the one and the other. I expect that you should return me thanks, replied Balamir, when you find that you have reason to bless your self for the good fortune of that accident: or if your happiness be not answerable to your wishes, that I did what lay in my power to preserve you out of the number of the miserable. You have perhaps some reason, (answered Varanez very fiercely) to keep me from that misfortune, for possibly you will find no great comfort to have a person so considerable as my self for your Rival. When that misery befalls me, replied Balamir, smiling, I must endure it patiently; and besides you are not ignorant, that we are wont to comfort our selves in the crosses that proceed from our Rivalship, with the thoughts of that honour which we may be likely to purchase in the dispute with our Competitors. He uttered these words so seriously, that the Prince of Persia had not so easily digested them, but that the presence of the Queen curb'd his anger, so that while he with a redness in his cheeks that betrayed his choler, was studying what to reply, Ardaric, who for his own interest was equally concern'd with Balamir, preventing him, True it is, Sir, said he, that it is a very great misfortune to have a potent Rival; and although perhaps I may not want courage to dispute my pretences, yet I am not of Balamir's humour, and rather than gain honour by your competitorship, I wish you were both fix'd to your former affections, and that I had not the honour to have you for my Rival. Though it were so, replied Godegesile, I question whether you would be the happier for that, for you would find others that would give you the same trouble. I know, said Ardaric, that the King of the Burgundians is no contemptible Rival, and may be no small obstruction in my way; but were we deliver'd from the fear of these two, your heart and mine would be much more at ease. For my part, said Prince Balamir, I fear none of those things; for though perhaps I have as much courage as another, I must be so just to my self, not to hope to be ever happy. "If you did your self justice, (replied the Cimbrian Queen, who till then heard them with silence) you would have a better opinion of your fortune: But fortune, (concluding with a sigh, said she) is a Goddess that respects not virtue.

Thus discoursing they entered the Wood, being led by Albifinda and Amalazomba who rode a Horseback before; when the Princes of Suevia coming up to the Chariot to speak something that she had to say to Rosamond, the Queen of the Turingians still rode on before the company; and being always known to love solitude, because it gave her thoughts their full liberty, the Lovers of Rosamond kept close to the Chariot, and the King of the Basternes applyed himself to Albifinda, while Amalazomba rode slowly before, musing to her self upon what the passion then ruling in her heart suggest'd to her remembrance; but while she was in this pleasing study, she heard a noise among the Bushes, and by and by the saw a wild Boar come rushing forth with so much violence against the very nose of the Horse, insomuch that the Nag, perhaps naturally fearful, was scared after such a manner, that he started out of the smooth way into the thickest part of the Wood, and getting the Bridle between his Teeth, carried the frighted Queen among the Trees, not being able in the fright she was to hold him in. The danger she was in, either of being thrown, or kill'd among the Trees, together with her crying out for help, made them who had most passionately fix'd their eyes upon the Queen, to change their object; and though the admirers of Rosamond took no small delight to be near her Chariot, yet this accident made them all flie to the succour of the Queen of the Turingiens, so that there was none that stayed by the Chariot but Albifinda, and some few whose Duty it was not to stir. The Princes and all those that followed them, whom as well the Queen, as Albifinda encouraged to relieve their Friend, speeded after the Queen's Horse, but they had not gallop'd far before they found themselves stopp'd by a Ditch, which the great floods of water had widened in that place, so they were forc'd to turn back, and follow where the Queen's Horse had made way; but it was so long before they could find the way, that the Queen was quite out of sight, so that they could neither overtake her, or know what was become of her; nor could they tell which way the Horse had carried her, so that without the miraculous preservation of the Gods, they could not chuse but fear some fatal accident.

All the while the Queen was like one half dead; and her fear having taken away her senses, it was only the innate principle of self-preservation that made her keep her Seat, and hold down her head to avoid the Boughs, yet she could not prevent some part of her Cloaths from being rent by the Briars and small Branches, nor her beautiful locks from being torn, while they confusedly hung about her Shoulders not finding that respect among things insensible which was due to them. The Forest was of a very large extent, part level, part hilly, descending into some Valleys, covered with wood to the very foot of a Mountain opposite to the City of Segodunum. The scared Horse had taken the descent with an incredible swiftness, through a way quite distinct from that which all they that followed her took; and at length he came to a Valley, where were several persons a Horseback; but the Horse still upon his speed crossed the Valley, and was running up a little Hill where the Wood was thicker, and the danger greater than she had met with till then, when a certain Knight that saw her cross the Valley, and heard her outcries, guessing at the truth, ne're stood still to consider, seeing he had no time to lose, and for that he had not lost the sight of the Queen, and withal had a swift strong Horse under him, he flew after Amalazontha, and got luckily before her, and turning full in the Horse's way, he got hold of the Bridle, and by main strength stopp'd his carrier, yet not so but that the Horse mounting upright, the Queen had fallen backward, if the Knight, who perceiv'd it immediately, had not caught hold of her with his Arm that was free, and let the Horse go from under her, which being done, he set her down gently upon the ground; he alighted immediately, and seeing that either out of weakness, or by reason of the remainder of her fear, she had laid her self upon the Grass, he came to her and submissively ask'd her, whether she had receiv'd any hurt or no. The Queen for some time had not power to speak; for the very thoughts of the danger which she had escap'd, had so disturb'd her mind, that for a while she was not able to open her lips, either to return thanks for her preservation, or to enquire after Rosamond and Albifinda, but then she perceiv'd him not to be of her company: however, she remembred that she had seen him somewhere else, and by little and little calling his Physiognomy to mind, she knew him to be Prince Summon, who some days before had conducted her to her own Camp, and had held so long a discourse with her, that she easily remembred his face. Summon with less difficulty knew her again, for although in all likelihood, he could not have expected to have seen her again, and that such an accident could not but be very surprizing, and scarce to be believ'd by one that saw it not; yet the fair Pourtraiture of her whole resemblance which he carried in his Breast, had made a deeper impression in his memory, than to let him mistake but a moment. He was no less troubled than was the fair Queen, having more than one passion to turmoil him: joy to see what he lov'd, and what he lov'd a thousand times beyond his life, first appeared in his eyes; but the dread of so terrible an accident, though the worst were past, benumin'd his heart in an instant, while he had reason to believe by the looks and gestures of the Queen, that she was hurt. He had ask'd her several times, before he had observ'd her countenance; but knowing who she was, love had created another sort of fear, than only what meer compassion mov'd. She assured him in the first place, that she had received no hurt; and thereby his mind being now more at rest, he began to reflect upon the accident with less disturbance, and to give himself wholly up to his love without the mixture of

of any other passion. But if the sight of the Queen had put him into such a condition that he was not able to express his own thoughts, the sight of him wrought no less upon her heart, though the effects were different in relation to their misfortunes. And remembrance that it was upon the same day, the very same occasion, and almost at the very same hour that Sunnor, and that other unknown person had appeared before her eyes, and that it was on the behalf of Sunnor that he had shewn himself, this resemblance that every where followed her, began now to fix it self in her remembrance, and to possess it so entirely, that she had almost forgot Sunnor, and lost the memory of the condition she was in, or of the danger she had so lately escap'd.

The young Prince was upon his knees before her, and beholding her with eyes full of that fire which love had kindled; Is it possible, (said he, as it were in an extasie) that I am certain of what I see before my eyes, or is it some dream, or some illusion? Are the Gods so kind to afford me a happiness contrary to my expectation, a happiness that I would have purchas'd with a thousand lives, had I so many to lose? The Queen was a good while before she made answer; and casting upon him a languishing look, which was as much as to say, he was not the person whom she sought; at length she opened her lips, and began to return her acknowledgment for so great a piece of service: I believe, said she to the Prince, that I am indebted to you for my life; and though I had rather have owed it to any other person than to the Brother of Pharamond, yet permit me to assure you that I am more than sensible thereof; and that I well remember this is not the first obligation that I have received from your civility. I cannot tell, (said the Prince, whom the condition of his fortune, and so unexpected an accident did not permit time to speak, nor to observe those rules of demeanour towards a Queen as Amalazontha was, which he would have done at another time) *how you are any way engaged to me, rather I oblige my self so much by serving you, that I can hardly permit you to have any share. But if my light services may merit your remembrance, surely my misfortunes may likewise find some pity. However, if the unfortunate condition of a Prince undone and lost at the first sight, will not move your compassion, pardon however, mighty Queen, or rather most sublime Divinity, this passion that will not suffer me to keep silence, nor yet fully to express my self. I should have endured it till death without uttering a word, did not my miserable fortune deprive me of all other means to let you understand my sufferings, but by my discourse, and by an accident which I never ought to have expected from Heaven, considering the deplorable condition of my life. I am not ignorant of the Glory that accompanies my sufferings, it is a thousand times more dear to me than the repose which I have lost. That death which I ought to suffer for you, shall be more acceptable to me than the most happy life which the Gods can let me enjoy: but must I die without letting you know the cause, and shall I not be permitted upon so fair an opportunity as this, to say I die for Amalazontha?*

The amorous Prince, whom the violence of his passion, the opportunity so little expected, and so difficult to have been found, had emboldened beyond what he would have been at another time, thus spake to a person that patiently hearkened to his discourse. But alas, some minutes after she was no longer capable of hearing more, who had now no more eyes, nor no more ears for him, being wholly attentive, wholly fix'd, not only upon the resemblance which continually haunted her, but taken up with the real sight of that substance whose image she carried in her heart, and which she beheld then approaching toward the place where she lay, in a condition almost as bad as she had appear'd in at first. Sunnor admired to see her colour come and go so many times in so few minutes; nor could he divine what conjecture to make of that change, when on a sudden he heard behind him the trampling of a Horse, and turning about with no small vexation and impatience to find himself so cruelly interrupted, he saw King Pharamond, who from another Valley, though at a greater distance had beheld the fury of the Horse that carried Amalazontha: He stopp'd his Horse at some few paces distance from them, casting his eyes upon the Prince his Brother, and the person with whom he was in discourse; or rather the person whom he was adoring; for he was kneeling at her feet in a most submissive posture. But at the same time the fair Queen, who from the time that she first discovered those features that were so dear to her, had not all the while removed her own eyes off from them, seeing his person so near, was so moved at the sight of what she both loved and feared at once; that by reason of her late affright, all her strength was too weak to support her: so that her cheeks growing wan and pale, she sunk down without sense or motion. Pharamond suddenly alight, and running to the intranc'd Queen, whom he rather knew by the discourse and gestures of Sunnor, than by her countenance, especially in the condition she was in; he endeavoured with all his care to recover her to life: but after he had for some time laboured in vain, he sent the Prince to fetch a little water, from a Rivolet that run at the foot of the Valley, and was but a small distance off. There was no need of importuning Sunnon to make haste, how unwilling soever to absent himself from what he loved, and yet not so unwillingly neither, when he considered in what safe hands he left her: but he was not gone far before Amalazontha opened her eyes and recovered her senses: She presently looked carefully about, for fear any other person should be near her but he whom she desired. Fortune was so favourable that she saw no person but whom she loved, and in such a condition near her, that she might easily perceive, how much he was concern'd in her misfortune. This second view had been as fatal as the first, had not the Queen made use of all the courage she had, to support that feebleness which it had caused; or that she had not summon'd up all the powers of her soul to defend her in a time of necessity. However she could not cast her eyes, upon the King of the Franks without trembling, mov'd by a constraining power which she could not resist: And the discontent which she had to be forced to love, what she ought not to have loved, (seeing she could not love what she ought to love) made her behold that object of affection, as the occasion of a crime for which she condemned her self, or rather as a Tyrant who had violently enthralled her heart, and together with her liberty had taken from her the repose of her life. The officious King stood by her in a posture little different, from what he had seen his Brother use, and she observed in him neither less submission nor less readiness and forwardness to serve her, though in his eyes she could not discern the same marks of vehement love. What unlucky fortune, said the King to her, could reduce so great a Queen to this condition, wherein we see her? And what a happiness had Prince Sunnon and myself, so fortunately to be in the way to serve her? Be pleased however not to trouble your self (so continued he observing the agitation of her spirits) nor to mind your present condition, though you be alone, or with men whom you look upon as your Enemies, for you shall not find less respect among them, than among the Turingiens: and you might have perceiv'd but now a passion strong enough in one of us, to let you understand that you can want nothing of honour, service or attendance: Though Pharamond in all places and upon all occasions, spake and acted with a grace beyond all the people in the world, having nothing in him common to other men, by reason that the Princess was prepossessed with such an affection for him, to her beholding and hearing him, he appeared yet more than it was possible for him really to be. For she was of opinion that in the air of his aspect, in his behaviour, in the accent and sound of his voice, there was something supernatural and more than humane. Her eyes were so fixed upon their beloved object, that she never took thought of making any answer: And it was a long time, that the King having spoken several times to her, before she opened her lips to return him any reply. But at length with some disorder very easie to be observed, and as it were labouring for words to express her self; I cannot tell, said she, what fortune means, by thus her sending you these two times to my relief, in my greatest necessities; nor can I tell why she suffers me to fall rather into your hands, than into the hands of some one, of whom I would more gladly lose the remembrance. I know not who you are, though I behold in you something more sublime than in other men, which gives me the greater desire to inform my self: and yet I feel something, I know not what it is in my heart, that makes me afraid to know. I am, replied Pharamond, an unfortunate person, whom you would pity would you do him justice: but one who through his unhappiness, to be concern'd in the interests of your Enemies, would be more hateful to you were he better known. It is hard for you to be more concern'd in the interests of Pharamond than Sunnon, replied Amalazontha, yet I cannot hate him: and though I had other far greater reasons to hate you, I do not apprehend, that what you urge would ever make me do it.

All the modesty of Pharamond could not hinder him, but that by the discourse of Amalazontha, by the trouble that appeared in her eyes, and by the reflection he made of what had fallen out at their first meeting, he clearly suspected the truth, and that with no small grief, the rather for the fair Queen's sake, to whom it was impossible for him to return an affection answerable; as also in regard of Sunnon, who by reason of her being thus prepossess'd, would himself be miserable. However, he did not declare what he thought, but as well to change the subject of the discourse, as because he was obliged for Sunnon's sake to let her know the reason why he was absent from her, while she was in her swooning fits, he gave her to understand how he was gone to seek for some fair water to cast in her face; to which he added that finding the water of no use when it was brought, he had sent him to give order for a Chariot to carry her out of the field into his Camp, or else to her own company if they were to be found. The Queen hearkned to this discourse with much impatience, so that hardly staying to hear it out; I am extremely obliged to Prince Sunnon (said she to the King) but I am better contented to find that you have not left me, and I shall be very glad to stay a while longer with you, in expectation of the rest of my Company. Prince Sunnon said said Pharamond, (desiring to do his brother a kindness now it fell in his way) will envy my happiness: for if he have had so much confidence, to discover what he suffers for your sake, I dare assure my self that you will have compassion upon him. I must pity Sunnon, said she, if he have any love for me; in regard he will the more deserve it, by how much the more unfortunate it will make him. You tell me sad news, replied Pharamond, since I must declare that you pronounce the death of Sunnon, if it be impossible for him to hope that his fidelity, may merit some acknowledgment on your part. He may deserve it, replied the fair Queen, and it may be that my affection may be indebted to him: But he will be never the more happy, for if you understand the cruelty of my Stars, you would find that I am never to love where I ought to love, and that through my misfortune I love where I should not.

Thus discoursed the Queen, and for that passion overcame her reason, she was in danger to have farther betrayed her self, if they had not beheld Prince Sunnon returning, and with him two of the Queens pages; who as they were searching for her through the Forrest as others did, had met with Sunnon at the Rivulet where he went for water, and who followed him having heard tidings of the Queen from his own mouth. She knew them afar off, as she did Sunnon also, when turning her self toward the King; "I see Prince Sunnon", said she, and two of my pages following him, and I must now suddenly leave you without either the knowledge of your person, or any hope ever to see you more. Saying these words she rose from the Bank where she had sat ever since, when Pharamond giving her his hand to help her; "'Tis our unhappiness", said he, that we are denyed the honour of seeing you, though we shall not despair, so you will but be pleased to give us leave. For your self, hastily replied the Queen, I shall with joy admit your welcome: And yet, said she, I shall not, for it is not convenient that I should see you. All this disorder both in the discourse, and in the behaviour of Amalazontha, sufficiently confirmed the former suspicion of the King: But the arrival of Sunnon and the Queen's Pages, hindred him from making any farther reflection upon it: And Sunnon being glad to find the Queen in such a condition, though all the pains he had taken had been to no purpose; and perceiving that the King had no mind to be known, he behaved himself before him as if he had not been present, lest the respect which at other times he was wont to shew him, should have made any discovery. But as he was about to speak to her, as a companion of the King, who to favour his design and the better to conceal himself, had let go her hand which he had taken before, and was asking the pages several questions, in reference to the accident that had fallen out; they discovered the Princes and Knights who were in search of the Queen, spreading the adjacent wood, and by and by casting their eyes right forward into the valley, they discovered the Chariot of the Cimbrian Queen, and all the rest of her train. Pharamond's colour changed, and to Amalazontha's Pages he look'd like one forlorn, when he understood from them, that Rosamond was in the Chariot which they shewed him. And though he verily believed that it was not without her, that the Queen of the Turingiens was come abroad to take the Air; he was not able to hear her name pronounced, or to understand that she was so near him, and that in a place where it was not impossible for him to see her, without being capable to entertain any other thoughts, than what his love inspired into him. He continued some time in a deep study what resolution to take, but soon after judging that all those persons whom he saw coming, and whom the accident which had befall'n the Queen of the Turingiens, had put into that disorder wherein he perceived them, would in the end all flock to her. He made no question but while they were busied with her, to find an opportunity to see the Queen of the Cimbrians, if he could but get near her Chariot, before she came to that place, where the croud began already to gather together about Amalazontha. And for that Arderic, Humbert and others were already come in, he took his time while they were employed about the Queen, to set her upon another horse; knowing well that Sunnon would delay her departure as much as he could: and that the Truce together with the duty which he came to pay, would secure him from any danger of his Enemies. Thereupon he rode with full speed toward that part of the Valley where he saw the Coaches: but he had not rode above two hundred Paces, before he met Marcomire who was in search of him, and not questioning but that he would be glad to accompany him upon this occasion; "Follow me, Brother", said he, and I will shew you Albisinda: Marcomire needed neither his persuasion nor promise, to urge him to follow the King his Brother, wherever he intended to lead him, had it only been for the hopes that he gave him of seeing Albisinda: For that news transported him with so full a measure of joy, that he spur'd after him with no less speed, than that which the King his Brother made. Though the Truce which lasted yet for some days; might easily dispense with their going arm'd, that continual use which Pharamond and his Brothers had accustomed themselves to, during the war, made the weight thereof so light, that that day, whether it were out of any mistrust of meeting some encounter or other, or the design they had to conceal their faces upon any occasion that obliged them to it, they had not left off theirs, (no more than the Princes who accompanied the Queens abroad to take the air) who (notwithstanding the security of the truce) thought it not inconvenient to be prepared for their defence, should any dangerous accident oblige them thereto. So that Pharamond and Marcomire pulling down their Visers all the way that they met any of those persons that were hastening to the assistance of Amalazontha, pass'd by unknown, till they came to the very Chariots themselves. Fortune, favourable to their attempt, had so ordered it, that in the way which the Queen's Chariot took, being full of stumps of Trees, one of the wheels brake; so that while they were endeavouring to refit the Chariot, the Queen, and Princefs who had quitted her Horse, was sitting by the Queen in the Chariot, where both alighted near a pleasing Brook that ran down the Valley, whence all the Princes, and all the rest of the company were sent in search of Amalazontha, except some few of the Queen's Guards, and some Footmen who attended the Chariots, and where the Queen and Princefs stayed full of perplexity, to hear what news they brought back. But the King of the Franks having told the news to them that were before; and having shewed them the place where he had left the Queen of the Turingiens safe in the hands of her own Officers and Servants, by the advice thereof, which was speedily given both to Rosamond and the Princefs of Suevia, soon freed them out of that trouble under which they laboured.

When the King and Marcomire drew near, they were fate down more quiet in their minds upon the Bank of the Rivolet, from whence they had sent away a Chariot to Queen Amalazontha, not being able to wait upon her in their own: the Ladies that attended, were sitting in the same posture, but at a distance, out of respect, and the custom which they had for some time used, not to interrupt their discourse: the men also kept aloof off at a farther distance, part a foot, and part a Horseback. As Pharamond was not at all prepar'd for this encounter, so he was puzzled in what manner to accost the Queen: and as he had reason enough to think that she had no great prejudice against him, so there was nothing more terrible to him than the fear of displeasing her, so that he was not more bold in fight, than he was timorous upon these occasions. However, he thought the opportunity was too favourable for him to lose it; and therefore because he knew it was not easie to find such another, he embraced it without farther consultation. But not deeming it convenient to mix himself with the rest of the company, that she would take it well for him to accost her on foot: finding her therefore sitting upon a rising ground with her face toward the Rivulet, and that by crossing the stream, which was very narrow, he might have a full view of her, and speak to her with more advantage, than on that side where she sat with all her train attending, he cross'd the stream a little above, and so keeping along the Bank till he came just opposite to the Queen and Princefs, he stopp'd and saluted them both, bowing down to the very pommel of his Saddle. They were immediately surpris'd at the sight of two whom they knew not to be of their company: but before they saw their faces, the proportion and Royal Deportment of the King of the Franks had almost discovered him; nor did Albifinda doubt but that it was Marcomire that was in his company, and so well they were both convinc'd before hand, that they were hardly better inform'd when they lifted up the Visers of their Helmets, and let them see those faces they could have no reason to hate, though they were not permitted to love them: Rosamond could not determine whether in this meeting she apprehended most joy, or most sorrow; for if on the one side, those Maxims of policy which so cruelly restrain'd her inclinations, made her apprehend more inconvenience than pleasure in that meeting; yet on the other side, the powerful oratory of acknowledgment and tenderness, against which she could make no opposition, perswaded her to the contrary, insomuch that she could neither be troubled nor provoked at the sight of Pharamond. However, she devoted her first words, and perhaps her first thoughts, rather to Duty, than to inclination; so that while the King wholly transported, fed his eyes with the sight of an object so delightful, without being able to find words to express his grievances; and perhaps not having courage enough to speak to her whom he fear'd as much as he lov'd, casting a look upon him possibly less terrible than what he expected: Oh, Pharamond, said she, since I am not permitted to see you, how comes it to pass that you presume to appear before me?

She said no more than these words, letting her head gently fall upon Albifinda's Shoulders, who beheld Marcomire with less reluctance, or at least with less restraint; when the passionate King, whose eyes spake more eloquently than his lips, in answer to the Queen's words: 'Tis not I, Madam, said he, 'tis fortune that presents you Pharamond; and therefore since she is so favourable to me this day, would you hate me more cruel to my self, than that same fortune which hitherto has so cruelly tormented me, and that I should refuse the only happiness which she has vouchsafed to me, since I first began to die for love of you? The fair Queen then lifting up her eyes, which for some time she kept downward fix'd upon the stream, and turning them sweetly towards Marcomire: And you, Ericlea, said she, come you to see us too, knowing what a cheat you put upon us? I come, said Marcomire, to deliver the deceiver up to your justice; and to beg a pardon of you, which the just anger of the Princess does not indeed permit me to desire. You are not much afraid of that anger, replied the Princess, and I see well enough, that I should be more terrible than I am to make you fear it. Alas, replied Pharamond, that the condition of my Brother and I should be so different, seeing that if he be not so happy as to be lov'd, at least he has some reason to hope that he is not hated. Ah Pharamond, replied the charming Queen, you know that it is not in my power to hate you, and I have discovered to you too much the knowledge thereof: on the other side, you know that it is not permitted me to love you, and that if I have any other thoughts than those of hatred for you, I can make no other use thereof than to render my self absolutely unhapp'y. No, Pharamond, no, all misfortune belongs not to you; and therefore while you complain of your own miseries, do not believe mine to be more easie. I have explained my self enough already; in the name of all the Gods, do not urge me to say more, but retire your self from an unfortunate person who cannot behold your face but to her own undoing, and who cannot behold you without some displeasure, though she sees you without any reluctancy. You shall suddenly be delivered, sadly replied Pharamond, for though I am able to defend my life against so many thousand Swords which assault it, it is impossible for me to preserve it from the cruelty of my sufferings, more cruel than that death which only can put an end to them. You abuse my weakness, replied the Queen with a discontented aspect, nor would you threaten me⁷ so often with your death, did you know how impossible it is for me to desire it: you may, and must defend your life against your enemies, and against all the sufferings whereof you complain; and to oblige you to defend it, I will once more tell you, that it is not hateful to me, since hitherto I have let you know it in vain. She uttered these words after such a manner, that the King was fore afraid he had displeas'd her, and being therefore willing to appease her by his submission, Pardon, Madam, said he, pardon a miserable creature whom love has depriv'd of his reason. I will endeavour to live, that I may obey your commands; and if I may be permitted to make a favourable conjecture of what you have impos'd upon me, I will not only defend my life against all my Enemies, and all my misfortunes, but also believe, that nothing how terrible soever, can render it unfortunate, so that it be not odious to you.

While Rosamond and Pharamond thus unfolded their thoughts one to another, talking so low as not to be over-heard by any other persons, except Albisinda and Marcomire; and that Albisinda and Marcomire keeping silence out of respect to them, discoursed only with their eyes, speaking with their looks part of what they thought in their hearts, they beheld Amalazontha returning in the Chariot which they had sent to her; and at the same time all the Princes and Knights who had dispersed themselves in the Wood in search of her, making haste from all parts, as it were to the general Rendezvous; wherefore Rosamond, being unwilling to be surpris'd in discourse with Pharamond, with a behaviour full of all the marks of grief, made a sign to him to retire, and rising in haste from the place where she sat, she turn'd toward the company who began already to environ her, and walk'd toward the Queen of the Turigiens, embracing her with much affection. While they embraced, and that Amalazontha received from her two Friends the testimonies of their friendship, so far dear and precious to her, as that passion with which her Soul was wholly taken up, would permit, and while the King of the Franks, not being able to quit the sight of Rosamond, followed her all the way with his eyes, forgetting, through the force of his love, to obey the sign which she had given him to retire, the King of Suevia, with Martian, Briomer, and a great party of other Knights were come up also to the place where the Queens were, when Briomer, having learn'd by some of the Cimbrians, that that Knight so remarkable for his Stature, and his Arms, who appeared on the other side of the Brook, was King Pharamond, he could not withstand the violence of his hatred and anger, but that running to the King of Suevia in an agony: How comes it to pass, Sir, (said he, pointing to Pharamond with his finger) that you suffer the murderer of Vindimir so insolently to shew himself in your sight; and that we lose this fair opportunity to revenge the blood of so many Princes that have fallen by his Sword. The King of Suevia had no such need of arguments to incite him against Pharamond, so that he was no sooner shew'd the King of the Franks, but that anger awaking at a sight which he so much detested, caused him to lay aside all considerations of Honour, and had fill'd his Breast only with a design to destroy his Enemy.

Yes, he shall die, said he to Briomer: and at the same time, with his speech, and by his gestures encouraging the Knights to follow him; he was in haste to be gone, when the Queen of the Cimbrians drawing near him, upon advertisement of his design, layed before him the inconveniency, telling him withal, how without dishonouring himself, and making Constance his Enemy, he could not violate the truce which he had made; and at such a time, when those Enemies whose lives he aim'd at, had sav'd the life of Amalazontha. But the King blinded with passion, had scarce the patience to hear the Queen speak; and looking fiercely upon her, The truce, said he, though it does not permit us to assault the Camp of our Enemies, yet it gives no security to the murderer of my Son, your Brother, nor so many other Princes who have lost their lives in our quarrel, if he will be so insolent as to shew himself in our fight. Concluding these words, without hearkening to a farther reason, he crossed the Brook, and taking a Lance from one of his Knights, he flew with all the fury imaginable against the King of the Franks, who was beginning to retire, yet not without turning his eyes every moment toward that object which he could not forsake. Sunnon, who observed the motion of the King of Suevia, ran to the King his Brother, and with a loud voice gave him notice; so that all he had time to do, was only to turn his face towards his Enemies, and oppose his Shield to the Lance of the King of Suevia, who had out-rid his own company, out of hope to dispatch the murderer of Vindimir: Briomer followed him close, and would have gone before him, had his Horse been swift enough to revenge the death of Theobald. The King's Lance brake in several pieces against Pharamond's Shield, without moving him, no more than if he had been a Rock; and Marcomire preventing Briomer's blow, being clos'd with him before he could reach Pharamond, lent him so heavy a stroke upon his head, that he tumbled quite dizzie to the ground. The valiant King of the Franks provoked with so much dishonourable foul play, drew his Sword, which the Cimbrians nor Suevians ever saw glister without growing pale for fear; and reproaching the treachery of his Enemies in threatening words, with a brush of his Horse, and a blow of his Sword, he beat to the ground the two first that he met, the one stark dead, the other so crush'd with the fall that he could not escape, being trod under foot by the Horses of his companions: Marcomire cleft the head of one Sueve; and Sunnon run another quite through the body, so that he fell backwards over the Crupper of his Horse.

The King of the Sueves took breath for some time, being amazed to see so bad a beginning, but his astonishment soon gave way to his anger, and causing him to contemn all things, made him come too near the King of the Franks, who not knowing him for any other than the chief Leader of those that assaulted him, gave him a blow so terrible, and so home, that he cut his Shield in two pieces, carried away one part of his Helmet, from whence his Sword lighting upon his Vanbrace, cut the Buckles, so that it fell off his Arm upon the ground, whereby the King disarmed in his head, and part of his body, was in great danger of his life, had Pharamond redoubled his blow; but Marcomire being near his Brother, knew Albisinda's Father by many signs, and putting his Buckler before Pharamond's Sword, Oh, Sir, said he, spare the King of Suevia. The anger of the incens'd King did not hinder him from understanding what his Brother said, nor from granting his request; and so turning his fury another way, he left the King amazed, and in great perplexity; and rushing in among the thickest of his Enemies, he made a way large enough to have made his retreat, had he so design'd. The two Princes his Brothers seconded his valour to admiration. However, they were in no small danger, through the great number of their enemies, and the fury of the King of Suevia, who not considering the courtesie, nor the mercy of Pharamond, nor perhaps minding it, had by the assistance of his own Attendants got another Helmet, and encouraging his followers with all the words that boiling choler could put in his mouth, was returning to the charge more furiously than ever, when the Princes who were with the Queen, condemning his rashness, made haste to hinder any farther mischief: Martian, who was with him, but could not dissuade him from his purpose, refus'd however to second him: and Humbert, though tyed to his interest for the love of Albisinda, and engag'd particularly to revenge her Brother's death, who was slain by Pharamond, yet fear'd too much the dishonour that might accrew from such an action, and therefore would not engage: Ardaric and Godegesile disapproving his intention, endeavoured all they could to have stopp'd him; but Balamir and the Prince of Persia coming in just as the Combat began, and understanding the business, enraged to hear of an action so dishonourable to their whole party, they flew with full speed among the Combatants; Balamir making his way like Lightning through all opposition, and getting before the King of Suevia with a behaviour that denoted his choler, after he had

frighted those that followed with many and loud threats, “What Sir, said he, is it thus that you honour our Arms, is this the care you take, to preserve the renown of those that fight in your quarrel? It so far misbecomes a great King, that it is base in any person of noble blood: and do you think that we will be so accessory to your treachery, as to suffer it?” The King of Suevia rather provoked than appeas’d by the words of Balamir, and chafed by Briomer, who was by that time remounted, persevered in his attempt, and encouraged his men, not being able to open a passage to the King of the Franks himself; when the Prince of the Huns, disdainful farther to entreat or seek to withhold him, quite left him, and clapping next to Pharamond; “Behold what part I am to take, (said he with a loud voice) and in fighting for vertue’s sake, you shall know that I have no share in your treachery. I question whether the King of Suevia would yet have given off, had he not been withheld by the Prince of Persia for whom he had a particular esteem: and if Arderic, Godegesile and Martian had not threatned to charge the Suedes if they did not retreat, which they were well able to do, by calling to their assistance the Knights that were of their own Train. Hereupon the King of Suevia full of rage, confusion, and it may be shame to have attempted an enterprize, wherein he had so ill prospered, after he had expressed his malice in words full of fury, at length he desisted, and not enduring the sight of those that had disturb’d him in his wretched purpose, he left the company galloping full speed over the valley, without enquiring whether it were the way to the Enemies or his own Camp. They whose charge it was to attend his person, took the same way: but he rode at such a rate, that not above five or six could keep even with him. After he was gone, and that Briomer and the rest that had assaulted Pharamond were marched off, the Queen of the Cimbrians not judging it convenient to speak to the King of the Franks, nor to make any longer stay in a place where he was before so many witnesses, who might have made a bad interpretation of things; She together with Albisinda, went into the Chariot where the Queen of the Turingiens rode, and commanded the attendants to drive back to the Camp, but not without often casting her eyes backward, upon the Camp which she was leaving.

Pharamond with his two Brothers stayed with the Princes, who had opposed themselves to the bloody intentions of the King of Suevia, not willing to take his leave till he had let them see, how apprehensive he was of what they had performed in his behalf: but because he had formerly observed Balamir’s deportment, and that the person of that Prince was very remarkable, for his graceful proportion and lofty aspect, easily discern’d him from the rest, and accosting him with a charming aspect which surpris’d, or rather enchanted all them that beheld him, I am not a little sensible, said he, of what you have done in my behalf: and by that action and all that vertue which accompanies your person, I make no dispute but that you are Balamir. The Prince of the Huns charmed at the sight of Pharamond, as he had been at the report of his fame, and by these acts which he himself had seen him perform, beheld him with admiration: and making answer to his sincere expressions, with a grace little different from that, which the other was always accustomed to; I am assuredly Balamir, said he, but I had rather that by other occasions, than what you have seen me this day perform, it had been my good fortune to merit the esteem of the greatest person in the world. Pharamond was about to reply with his wonted modesty, had not the Prince of Persia prevented him with a graceful address: “As for my part, said he, I cannot come into your presence without being ashamed of my self: For as you obliged me to be your friend the first time I saw you, to which you engaged me by a particular favour; so I cannot tell how I can presume to beg your pardon, for so unfortunately adventuring to be your Rival. “That is certainly to me a real misfortune, (replied Pharamond, yet with a countenance that shewed little of resentment) But this is not the first misfortune that has befall’n me, that I have not inconsiderable Rivals to deal withal, in the contest for Rosamond. “You have others also here, (replied Varanez shewing him Arderic and Godegesile) and we have left one behind in our Camp, who hath not the greatest kindness for you in the world. Pharamond was very well contented to see Arderic and Godegesile, though they were his Rivals and his Enemies: and those two Kings beholding him with admiration, lost perhaps no small part of their hopes, by the sight of him. Godegesile who was of a close and fierce humour, and who could not be the Rival of any person without mortally hating him, beheld him with an angry countenance: but Arderic who always honoured virtue, and saw nothing in his person which did not attract love and respect, freely paid him what was his due. Marcomire and Sannon passed many complements from one to another, nor was Marcomire whose valour had been tryed by many signal proofs, but very little less esteem’d and admired by the Rivals of Pharamond.

The Prince of Persia who had been an eye witness thereof, in the combat between him and

and Constance, and had seen him acquit himself with so excellent a grace, in the contest which they had both together, notwithstanding the natural fierceness of his nature; applyed himself with an extraordinary civility to him: and the Prince of the Franks, to whom the dignity of his person was not unknown, paid him all manner of respect imaginable. But while Marcomire entertained Varanez, and that Sunnon discoursed with Arderic and Godegeste, Pharamond and Balamir, who had mutually conceived an esteem each for t'other, answerable to each others merit, being at some distance from the rest, and beholding one another with an admiration more than ordinary; "How comes it to pass (said Pharamond to Balamir) that Vertue and Fortune are so much at variance in the choice of my Rivals, or to put it into better phrase, How comes it to pass that fortune stirs me up Rivals, that vertue will not suffer me to hate. "All your Rivals, said Balamir, might with better reason ask this question than you: for there is no vertuous person, who ought not rather to give you all respect, than bear you the least ill will. But for my part I shall never complain, that it is not in my power to hate you, because I cannot find that I shall ever have any occasion so to do. "If you cannot hate me, (replied the King of the Franks, with his accustomed charming familiarity) what reason is there that you should contribute, more than any other person to make me miserable? For the hatred of others is less formidable to me, than the mischief that you do me by loving me. "I am of opinion, replied Balamir, that neither those others nor my self, will ever be able to do you any harm: for I find that by your valour and by your merit, you will easily defend your self against us. But seeing that the love which I have for Rosamond, is that which gives you some kind of trouble, I will only beg your favour to justify my self, by desiring you to resolve me this single question: whether that love which you your self have for her, be an effect only of your will? "I understand you (replied the King of the Franks) and I must confess that not only my love was no effect of my will, but that my will made the most powerful opposition it could to my love: and that to my lives end I had strove against it, had Gondioch permitted me to continue his friend. "I ought to have paid the same respect to your high worth, replied Balamir, and had it been known to me otherwise, than by the sole report of your fame, I had certainly opposed my passion, at a time when I sought in vain to overthrow it, with the remembrance of a beauty that ought to overcome it, had it been to have been vanquished. And I will add, that it was the good fortune of your Rivals and not yours, which I only thought I might have the happiness to cross: and that through the hard fortune which you had to spill the blood of one, that hinders Rosamond from declaring in your favour; I thought I could do you no injury in aspiring to those hopes, which in all likelihood were denied you ever to expect. Without this consideration I should attempt yet farther, and perhaps should do too much for my honour, being engaged to preserve it against a person, whose transcending fame might cause such an interpretation of my intentions, which they have not deserved. "This very reason, said Pharamond, which among men like our selves, is sometimes thought to be over nice, hinders me from any longer disputing upon this subject: nor will it permit me to make use of any opportunity, which in a soul like yours I sufficiently perhaps be assured of, to make use of your Friendship. Balamir seemed something troubled at these last words, and instead of making a reply, he stood viewing him several times from head to foot in a perfect silence, and such a behaviour which made the King of the Franks suspect that he had spoken too much. And because he was not disposed to explain himself farther, as perhaps he might have been obliged to do, to avoid the telling of an untruth had the conference continued, he turn'd toward the Prince of Persia and the other Princes, and accosting them together with Balamir, who followed him without speaking one word, he besought them to excuse him, if the particular thanks which he owed Balamir for his kindness that day, made him separate himself from them for so short a time. Varanez and the two Kings hearken'd to him as became them, and the Prince of Persia whose great and fierce disposition, could not dispense with a true respect for Pharamond, which his deserts exacted from all the world; and which the majesty of his presence particularly infus'd into all that saw him, was about to excuse himself for that force, which the beauty of Rosamond had put upon his inclination which was otherwise to have always continued his friend, when the King of the Franks interrupting him; "I hope, said he, that your sufferings will so sufficiently punish you for the injustice which you have done me, that you need not wish a greater or a more rigorous correction. Nor should I have any comfort in my self, said he, proceeding in his discourse, and turning himself to the rest, if I did not think that I should find more than one Rival, as unhappy as my self. "That may be, replied Godegeste, for where only one can be happy, it follows that all the rest must be unfortunate. But let it be as it will, you have “no Rival but what has a great advantage over you, because they are not denyed those “hopes, which you are forbidden to expect. “If you have this advantage over me through “my misfortune (replied the King of the Franks) It is not impossible but that I may have some “other over you, nor have you leave to hope, but on conditions too hard for you to pre“sume to say, that you shall obtain the happiness which you aspire to, without purchasing “it at a rate dear enough. The chance of war will decide that, replied the King of the He- “rules, and then we shall see to whom fortune will be favourable: Fortune does not al“ways determine all things; for if it should be our hap to encounter in fight, I my self “might perhaps be so fortunate as to let you know, that in attempting the life of Phara- “mond, you have not undertaken a slight enterprize. It is not of a slight enterprize, said

 “the King of the Alains, that Rosamond ought to be the Guerdon; so that they who devote, “their blood and their lives to such fair hopes, can never more gloriously employ themselves.
 “I am of your opinion, said Pharamond to them, but come what will, I advise my Rivals
 “not to neglect, any opportunity to deprive me of my life; seeing that in forbidding me “to hope, however they forbid me not to oppose the good fortune of others: in which “opposition, there are few persons in the world that, while I live, can assure themselves to “possess Rosamond. “All your Rivals, sincerely replied Varanez, cannot contend with you “for Rosamond with equal forces, though there is one not far off, can hold you as hard to “it as any Prince in Germany. “I know, (said Pharamond without any alteration at all) that “my power is not equal to that of the King of Persia, though I have not feared the puis“sance of the Romans, which was no less formidable: and partly by my courage, partly by “the assistance of friends that will not forsake me; a Prince of Persia shall be no more ter“rible to me, than a Prince of Germany. Varanez was about to have replied, and from a familiar discourse begun in civility, it might have come to be a hotter dispute, had not Balamir, quitting his converse with Marcomire, interpos’d to prevent the danger, and chang’d the subject of the discourse by enquiring after Constance, of whom they had not heard a word in the Camp since his departure, though they expected to see him again by what he had said, and by the opinion they had of his negotiation. Varanez was already inform’d by Marcomire, and he had heard it from his mouth, as Balamir had been told by Pharamond, that this great personage, after he had by the force of his courage, a long time resisted that tormenting grief, under which he laboured for the loss of Placidia, could not prevent his body from sinking under it, though his mind remained always firm and constant: so that since his return from the Camp, he had been taken with a Fever, though not violent, but that by the nourishment which it received from his grief, it was likely to prove fierce and dangerous. That the first day he had neglected it, and would not take his bed, but that Pharamond at length had over perswaded him: and that the next day, finding his distemper increase, and fearing that in the Camp, where by reason of the long continuance of the Army the Air was not so wholesome, he should with more difficulty recover his health than in another place: and that he should be attended with less inconvenience, and less safety, in a place where the various accidents of war might occasion various changes, he had with great trouble caused himself to be convey’d in a Litter to Frankfort, there to be more carefully looked after. That he had accompanied him good part of the way, and that he had not left him, but upon the pressing necessity of the war, and that he had committed him to the care of Prince Priam, with strict charge not to stir from him, and to give him daily advice of his health. Varanez, Balamir, and Ardèriè, though he had been his enemy, testified their great sorrow for Constance’s being sick, and would every one have offer’d to serve to the utmost of their abilities, had he not been under the care of Pharamond, who neglected nothing, either for the recovery of his body or the ease of his mind. While they were thus tending their service to Constance in Pharamond’s behalf, Prince Marcomire held his eyes fixed upon the countenance and person of Balamir, finding in his proportion in some part of his face, majesty enough to breed suspicions which produced the same effect which the last words of Pharamond to Balamir had produced in him. Both the one and the other, appeared so intent upon what they had in their thoughts, they gave no heed to the discourse which passed between the rest: But they neither of them had time to be satisfied of their doubts; for the Queen of the Cimbrians being gone, and by that time a good way in her return homeward, the Rivals of Pharamond considering what had befall’n Amalazantha, fearing what might happen to Rosamond, had not patience to stay any longer: and therefore taking leave of the King of the Franks civilly enough, and yet with no small appearance of inward rancour on both sides, they turn’d their horses head, and gallop’d after the Chariots with all the speed they could make.

All this while the Queen of the Cimbrians and the Princess of Suevia, sitting by the Queen of the Turingiens, had been sadly employed. They beheld in the countenance of the Turingien Queen all the signs of discontent, which hardly permitted her the use of her senses, much less of her reason. At first it was attributed to the impressions of her affright, by reason of that unhappy accident that had befallen her; so that they us'd all the words they could to recover her, and to make her understand that a danger which she had escap'd, and to which she could not in all likelyhood be again expos'd, but by her own will, ought not to give her any farther trouble, by renewing it in her memory; but finding, after the great pains which they had taken, that she made no answer to all their persuasions, but with sighs that continually issued from her Breast; and that during this silence, that portended some fatal misfortune, she sometimes cast her eyes towards Heaven, and sometimes look'd upon them with tears that rush'd down her fair cheeks, which she could by no means refrain, in such a posture that would have mov'd Souls to pity, less sensible than theirs, they began to suspect the truth, and out of the effects of this supposition, casting their eyes one upon another, thereby to explain each others thoughts; the disconsolate Queen observed them, who notwithstanding the disturbance of her mind, too sadly perceiv'd the confirmation of her misfortune: Ab, 'tis enough, (she cryed with the saddest accents in the world) I see you understand too well my misery; but I cannot tell whether you have that compassion which you ought to have for me. " We cannot tell that, said the Queen of the Cimbrians, though having that confidence in us which you say you have, I know not, Sister, " why you should conceal any thing from us. Alas, (replyed Amalazontha, with many sighs) I should in vain conceal my woes, for it is easie for you to know, that there is no misfortune equal to mine, if it be true, what I can doubt no more, that this so remarkable a person for his deportment, and for his noble proportion, whom the King of Suevia assaulted, was Pharamond King of the Franks. Neither the Queen nor the Princess could then deny the truth; so that the afflicted Queen having read it in their eyes, and in their silence; Oh! Sister, (said she to Rosamond, fainting in her Arms) 'twas not without reason that I dream'd that you were to be author of my death, but I pardon you with all my heart, for it is not for the miserable Amalazontha to contest for a heart with you. She could hardly utter these last words distinctly, so that as soon as she had done speaking, her eyes clos'd, and she swooned away in the Arms of a Rival that beheld her ill fortune with more pity than jealousy.

The Seventh Part.

BOOK I.

IN the mean while the King of the Sueves transported with that boiling choler, which made him possibly forget the Laws of Honour, rid full speed through the Valley, and fled from the sight of his fair company in such poste haste, that he was soon out of sight, by reason of the Trees and windings of the Valley. And for that he had no other intention than to shie the sight of those persons that oppos'd his fury, he rode on without regarding whither the way carried him, either to or from his own Camp; and this was the reason that by meer accident he kept the Bank of a Rivulet till he came to the very head of it, which was about two miles off in the wildest, yet most delightful part of the Forest. The Spring of the River was a Fountain that rose with a noise to be heard at a good distance, among a knot of Trees, and among the sharp tops of certain Rocks covered with Moss; from whence it ran between others that gave it no disturbance. The water that issued out in large bubbles was very clear, which after it had glided a little way upon the green sod, by the help of other little Springs grew to be an indifferent stream, which winding it self through the Valleys of the Forest, emptied it self into the Segua. The great and old Trees which nature had there bestowed for ornament, in a more delightful order than art could have planted them, made a most pleasant shade, that invited all that pass'd that way to make a stop; so that the King of the Sueves being chafed and heated either by the fire of his anger, or by his hard riding, or else swelter'd with the weight of his Armour, which that day he had put on, as the rest of the Princes did, he made a stop for some time to view the pleasantness of the Spring, and presently after, either to quench his drought, or to rest himself a while, he alighted from his Horse, which he gave to one of his Pages among the rest of those few that followed him, (who kept aloof off, knowing by his countenance, that in the humour he was in, solitude would not be a thing unacceptable to him) and seating himself upon the brink of the Fountain, he took up some of the water in the palm of his hand and drank it, and then stretching himself upon the green Moss, he lean'd his head against a point of the Rock which was covered with the same: there it was that he vented his anger mixed with sighs, and the sorrow which he felt to have lost so fair an occasion to revenge the death of his beloved Son.

His hatred against the House of France was much increased by the injury which he believ'd he had receiv'd from Marcomire and Polixena; for as he look'd upon the love which Marcomire had for Albisinda as an attempt against his honour and repose, so was he enrag'd against the fair Princess, for having deprived him of Viridomar. He puzzled his mind with several different thoughts, which notwithstanding tended all to the same end, seeing that none of them had any other object than revenge. But scarce had he time to give them but a short freedom; for he was interrupted by the coming of three Ladies, who, after they had walked by the River-side came to the Fountain, and rested themselves under one of the great Trees, about five or six paces from him. They were very richly habited, wearing upon their heads little Hats covered with plumes of Feathers, which very much added to the beauty of their faces. Nevertheless they were extremely beautiful, though in their beauty there was no small inequality; for she that walk'd in the middle, and who by many other signs seem'd to have other advantages beyond the rest, besides that of beauty, seem'd to the King rather to be something of Divinity than a mortal creature. Her black eyes, but full of a fire, the most lively and sparkling in the world; her lips, the shape, colour and motion whereof had a particular charm, the features of her face so delicately proportionable, whose tincture dazzled the sight with the whiteness thereof, her deportment so graceful and so free, compos'd a most admirable creature, and presented so fair a figure to the eyes of the King that beheld her, that all the fierceness which for some time his grief had caused to reign in his Soul, all the fury that disturb'd him, could not hinder him from fixing his eyes upon this fair vision, and in an instant to lose the thoughts of all other things that so employed his mind but a few minutes before. In short, he minded neither his anger, nor his revenge, nor his rage against those that had prevented their fatal effects, nor could he hardly think upon Pharamond or Vindimir, and though 'twere very improbable that the sight of a Beauty could astonish him, who saw every day in the person of Rosamond all that nature ever produc'd of perfection in this world, either through an effect of sympathy, or of his misfortune, or of divinè justice, now found work enough for his sight, and for his thoughts, and soon after to fetter his heart with those charms that were to endure as long as his life. He had time enough, and too much to contemplate that fatal beauty which produc'd this great change in his Soul, for being hid by a part of the Rock, those three fair persons were not aware of him when they approached the Fountain. So that having seated themselves upon the Grass, she that sat in the middle resting her self against a great Tree, at the foot whereof they had taken their places, divertis'd herself in listening to one of the rest that sung, and had a most incomparable voice, and warbled forth most passionate notes. But it was not she upon whom the King of the Sueves had fix'd his eyes and his thoughts, and therefore little minding either the tune or the words, he only took notice of the last, being repeated at the end of four Stanza's.

*Loves great power no more despise,
Though your beauty tyrannize.
Now insensible, yet know
You may one day feel his Bow.*

That which may happen, does not always happen infallibly, (replied the so much to be admired person to her that sang) nor have you had so much reason as you thought for, to change these words as you did, since you begin the contest with me. I have not, said the other that sang, so much as I could desire; but I shall be loath to believe that you are too unjust to afford it me; and it is rather upon the grounds of reason, than for any signs that you make appear, that we must accuse you of this change. There is a great deal of reason, added the other that had not yet spoken, and as I conjecture a great deal of truth. We are often deceived in our judgments, (replied the other that seemed to excel as well in quality as in Beauty) and though you are the two persons to whom I disclose my heart the most freely, I cannot tell whether you find in it all that you imagine, or all that you would persuade me that you see there. If I do not perceive it, said the latter, I will add to what we have spoken concerning reason, 'tis my desire that reason will let me understand it; and as I look upon my self to be very grateful, and not to do you any injury by my acknowledgment, I must confess, Madam, that there is nothing which I have more desired than this change. You understand not what it is you wish for in my behalf; (said the charming person that was unknown) however, because your intentions are not amiss, though your wishes are unjust; and I find also, Cousin, (said she, leaning her head towards her) that I shall pardon you this injury more readily than any other. This is to say something, (replied she to whom the address was made) but this is not to say enough, and you must give us leave to imagine somewhat more. Divine what you please, (said the other with a charming languishment) but take heed of thinking amiss, and doing injustice to a person that loves you well, instead of making a right censure.

While they were talking in this manner, and that by these discourses they engaged themselves in a larger dispute, the King who heard them, beheld this admirable unknown person with a transportation of mind, that would not permit him to think or remember any thing besides, and notwithstanding the charms that so lately disturb'd his mind, he felt the poison, poison, which through his eyes distill'd it self into his heart. At first he felt it with delight, at least with a kind of sweetness, and by reason of an object so fair and pleasing to the eye, he could not perceive in himself any thing more besides a flattery that pleasingly surpris'd his senses, and sweetly insinuated its self: and at that very instant giving himself entirely up to the charms that seduc'd him, and freely yielding to his first thoughts, he lent his helping hand to his own self to sink the farther progress thereof into his bosom, through the indulgence which he had for the birth of his mischief, or at least through the consent and agreement which he could by no means refuse it.

In this interim remaining fixed to the sight of the fair object which enchanted him, and knowing the force thereof by the effects which he felt: Now I repent, said he to himself, that I have hitherto so severely condemned those who at the first sight permitted themselves to be surpris'd by love; so that if the Sister of the King of the Franks be but like her that now appears before my eyes, I shall easily pardon Viridomar the weakness with which I have upbraided him, and with which I have been so much displeas'd, such a reason would make his fault excusable; for I perceive that at those years that should in all likelihood better defend themselves than his, from the violences of beauty, I can hardly protect my self, nay, I have hardly the will to undertake it. Oh, Love! (continued he) is this an effect of thy revenge? And to punish the severity of those that live under thy Empire, wilt thou subject me to it at a time when that wisdom which attends my years, the perplexity of my important affairs, and so many passions opposite to the pleasures of thy charms, ought to defend me against thy power? Then for some time he chafed at the complaisance which he had for this growing passion, hastily recollecting in his mind what ever he could to oppose it: How! (said he, with a kind of shame that cover'd his face with blushes) shall I permit my self to be vanquish'd by love, at a time which I have altogether devoted to my hatred? And after I have had so little indulgence toward those persons, whose youth render'd this passion excusable, shall I submit my self to it, so far advanced in years, and expose my gray hairs to the laughter of the world? By and by he thought he had strength enough to oppose this hostile passion, that came to overturn the order of his designs, and perhaps all the repose of his life.

But at the same time willing to find the relief which he sought, he endeavour'd to take off his eyes from the sight of that face that had charm'd him, and to seek a victory which he could not hope for, but by flying from his Enemy; but it was impossible for his eyes to obey his reason, and his heart that would not longer acknowledge that subjection, abandon'd it self entirely to that sweet violence that claim'd Dominion over it; yet could he not choose but grieve to see himself fetter'd in chains so unsuitable to his years, his deliquis and the condition of his life, so that he breath'd toward his beloved object certain sighs which despite and love parted between themselves. He had but even now heard the Song which one of the three persons had sung, and had lent his ear to their discourse, by which he understood with a jealousy that already began to torment him, that they contended with that admirable person about some certain affection, and he perceiv'd that she defended the argument but very weakly. But while in all likelihood he was listning to understand more, and that to inform himself of what he was yet ignorant of, he bent his ear with greater attention to their discourse, he was discovered by one of the three that shew'd him to the rest. Upon that they rose with no small surpris'd; however, like persons little affrighted, and such, as it appeared, were not far distant from the rest of their company. The King of the Sueves also seeing himself discovered, rose also from his Seat, without considering what resolution to take, and as he was naturally very bold, and one that by reason of his high quality did not think himself oblig'd to any severe constraint before persons that were apparently inferiour to him, he hearkened only to his passion, and the desire he had to make himself known to her that caus'd it, and so advanced toward that place where she staid, with a deportment that might easily distinguish him from the common sort, though with a behaviour sufficiently submissive: It is not fitting, said he, that any person should drive from this place a celestial beauty, to whom the Gods themselves would pay their homage: I cannot tell whether you will not disdain to receive it from men, yet is there no person in the world that would more willingly pay it you than my self, nor over whom the sight of your person has produc'd a more strange effect. "I cannot tell, (replied that divine person very fiercely) what effects I may have produc'd; but if it were the repose that you sought near this Fountain, I am sorry to have interrupted it. For a repose of so short a continuance as that, replied the amorous King, you might have interrupted it without doing me any great injury; but in taking away all the repose of my life, you make me lose enough to give me a just cause of complaint. The aspect of the King of the Sueves, and what besides appeared in his person, shew'd there was something more than ordinary, which was not slightly to be contain'd. But the person son to whom he address'd himself, was so little accustomed to suffer the liberty of such a discourse as his, without being more than ordinarily mov'd, nor without being vex'd to find her self compell'd to behold with disdain a person toward whom she could no otherwise shew her displeasure: and therefore looking upon him with an eye, whose cold looks might have caus'd a greater frost upon his hopes, than they had kindled fire in his breast: You are too wise, said she, to have lost in so short a time the repose of so many years, but as I have disturb'd yours against my will, so will I take as much care as I can that you shall not disquiet mine. "And if any one do come to disturb it, (said one of those fair Ladies, whispering in her ear) we know a Knight who has far more reason to hope well. She spake not these words so softly, but that the King heard something of it, and being nettled at the severe answer which he had receiv'd, his lofty spirit could not have contain'd it self, had it not been entirely under the yoke: it was sufficient that he knew where he was by this experiment, and he sigh'd for madness, that his resentment would not serve him for a remedy; but though he kept himself within bounds before her whom his love caus'd him to respect, yet could he not dissemble his resentment of the contempt, and beholding her more boldly than he had till that time done; I am not, said he, perhaps so contemptible as you take me to be; and it may be I may appear before you in such a condition, that you will not be sham'd of this conquest, which among many others you have made. "Whoever you are, (replied the other, looking upon him more seriously than she had done before) I promise you I shall never boast of the conquest which I have gained over you; but you may boast, that you have made me endure a discourse longer than I intended, which few persons durst have continued. It is but just, replied the passionate King, that for sufferings that must endure till death, you should suffer only the trouble of a little discourse; nor is there any law so severe, that forbids the miserable to complain. "Either you are a person much above all other men, (replied the fair Lady, blushing withal) or else very presumptuous. Or else very much in love, (replied the King of the Sueves) which is that which you may more rationally conjecture; though as for my quality it is not so low, but that persons of the highest extraction may look upon it without debasing themselves: however, let it be what it will, there is no degree of Honour which I do not submit to your beauties; and having given you my heart, I have no more to preserve for you. "Do but preserve the respect you owe, (replied the fair unknown, beholding him very sternly) and I shall restore you both your heart and your Dignities: and I find, (said she with a smile) that I shall be better satisfied with your respect than with your love. Al! for my respect, said the King, I cannot think that I have transgressed it; but if you are a Goddess———"I am no Goddess, (said she, interrupting him very smartly) but I am Polixena, and I am the Sister of King Pharamond. The fair Princess discovered her self to him in this sort, probably contrary to her first intention; but besides that Artesinda and Laomira, the two Ladies that were with her, shew'd her about a hundred paces off some eight or ten Horsemen, who were of the King of the Sueves train, and whom she knew not to be of her own; she moreover perceiv'd something in his eyes that she had some reason to fear, which oblig'd her to let her self be known, to keep him in awe with the name of Pharamond: it caus'd an effect which she desired, or rather a greater than she look'd for, though in a different manner; for if the two famous names of Pharamond and Polixena wrought not a sufficient respect in the King their Enemy, yet they strook him with an astonishment so great, as if he had seen Thunderbolts fall at his feet; so that for a while he look'd like a person altogether dismayed and forlorn. In fine, he could not apprehend, that this beauty which he so passionately lov'd, was the Sister of that Enemy against whom he had arm'd so many thousand Soldiers; nor that that beauty which in so short a time had engag'd his heart, was the same that had depriv'd Viridomar of his, against whom for that very cause he had been so highly offended, without feeling a grief hardly inferior to his love, and without seeing at the same time added to that grief the shame of being fallen into that misfortune, and the fear of being justly upbraided with a weakness which he had so severely condemn'd in persons of an age more suitable to Love.

All these passions crowded together; but neither his passion nor his shame could cancel his love; and though she were the Sister of Pharamond, and the Mistress of Viridomar, notwithstanding Polixena seem'd no less charming, nor was his heart the less engag'd for that. His different thoughts disorderly assailing him, made him pause a long time without speaking, and almost without knowing what he did, for he had a great deal of matter to ponder upon, before he could recover himself from the trouble, whereunto so surprizing an accident had plung'd him. During which time the fair Princess had left him, and was walking between Artesinda and Laomira toward certain Chariots and Horse-Guards, which he discovered among the Trees, and which in all probability stay'd for her return, but because cause she was not gone far, and because he could not forsake her till he had seen her again, though irresolute as to those thoughts which this knowledge had infused into him, he followed her a good pace, and seeing her turn her head as he drew near her, with a behaviour that testified his fear: Stay Princess, said he, and flee not from a person that can no longer remain your Enemy: one moment has deprived him of that enmity which he thought to have preserv'd to his dying day, and his hatred and his anger throw down their Arms at the feet of your beauty. The Princess stopp'd the more willingly at the words and behaviour of the King, in regard she saw he had quitted his company: and while in the amazement which these last words produc'd, she kept her self silent, the passionate King resuming his address, I do not wonder, said he, that you have so easily found out the way of my heart; it is by vertue of that predominancy which you have over my Soul, that you have so easily overcome me, and that I am not the first of my Family that upon the first sight you have fettered in your chains. Triumph, Princess, triumph over an illustrious Family which you have reduc'd from hatred to love, and from Sovereignty to Servitude. But know that your Chariot will be more honour'd by a captive King, than a fetter'd Princess, and that it will be less your glory to have a Subject than a Sovereign for your Slave. I pardon Viridomar for having forsaken my Arms, and my interests, but I do not pardon him for being my Rival, so that if he prove more happy than I, either by his good fortune, or the advantages of his youth, I must of necessity look upon him as my greatest and most cruel enemy. Thus spake the King of the Sueves. And certainly his passion was so violent, that it had troubled a great part of his reason, seeing that at those years which ought to be accompanied with wisdom, and in the condition of his fortune, it caus'd him to utter with so much vehemency whatever came into his thoughts, and had in so short a time shut his eyes to all considerations that ought to have made him act with more reservedness, especially at the first sight, and with the Sister of Pharamond.

The fair Princess, who was not a little astonish'd at the beginning of this accident, seeing the pursuit of it so disagreeable from what she thought could have succeeded; and not doubting, after the last words which he gave her to understand, but that this her new Lover was the King of Suevis himself, and the Father of Viridomar, look'd upon this last effect of her beauty as one of the strangest accidents that fortune could have produc'd; and by vertue of the short reflection which she made upon it, she was more astonish'd at this than all the accidents that had befallen her all her life time, and look'd upon this capricious humour of her destiny, as the most surprising thing in the world; she never had heard the King of the Sueves otherwise spoken of, than as the most implacable enemy of the King her Brother, and of all his Family, and for that reason he could not be but hateful to her (so far as her virtue, and the sweetness of her disposition could admit of hatred) however, he was the Father of Viridomar, whom she had no cause to hate, nor whom she did hate, but rather lov'd more than she was willing to do, and more than she was willing to shew; he was the Father of Albisinda, whom Marcomire adored, who lov'd Marcomire, and had no hatred against Pharamond. For these reasons she was oblig'd to have a sufficient esteem for him; and knowing that she could well enough conceal it under the respect due to his Dignity, she easily conform'd her self to it, by vertue of that lively courage which accompanied her upon all occasions, and unlocking a silence which so strange and extraordinary an accident might readily excuse, Had I known you to be the King of the Sueves, said she, I had pay'd you the respect due to your Dignity, with which, the hatred that you bear the King my Brother and our Family, cannot make me dispense. "I cannot tell, said the King, whether it be to Viridomar, or to Albisinda, that I owe this kindness; though if my fortune would so please, I would not willingly be engaged for it to either of them. If the King my Brother were here, replied the Princess, I know that he himself would pay you the same respect; and as I have no other motions to follow than his, when I act not by my own proper directions, you may be sure that you owe the entertainment which you receive at my hands to no other person than either to him, or to my self. "I will owe nothing to Pharamond, (replied the King very angrily) and being that he is not beholding to me, for not having satisfied this day some part of my resentment, you will not find him it may be so moderate as you have known him, against such an enemy as my self; neither is it for me to be beholding to him for my happiness; and I must seek out other means which my fortune shall provide without engaging my self to love him, or forbearing to hate him. Having spoken these words, he beheld two Knights coming from that part where the Chariots stood, who proved to be Ibere and Moroves, and casting his eyes the other way, he saw three others at a good distance off, galloping toward the Chariots; and not questioning but that the three last were Pharamond and his two Brothers, whom he desired not to see, nor be seen by them if it were possible, he made a sign to his Esquires to advance, and turning himself toward the Prince, with a behaviour that denoted the trouble of his soul; Farewell Madam, said he, I intend to see you again when fortune will permit me, but I will love you till I dye: If Viridomar be more happy than I, I shall endeavour to disturb his repose, since I can never hope to trouble yours. He uttered these last words, remembering what the Princess had spoken to him, with sufficient disdain, and when he had done, he retired to his Esquires, and those other persons that had followed him, who being got about him, he took horse and parted from the Princess, and that fatal place with extraordinary speed, avoiding as much as might be the rode which he saw Pharamond take. If in going to the place which he left, he had been assail'd with so terrible a passion; at his return he was assaulted by another, which though it were more pleasing; yet was it such a one as gave him greater trouble, so that he experimented in one day, the highest extremities of love and hatred: a change in his condition, so unexpected and so far from probability, rendred him hardly capable of any discourse. All his contemplations were taken up in thinking, that he who but an hour before was free, was now become enamoured in love with the Sister of Pharamond, not considering it as an effect of divine justice, which so ordered it that he should be always a slave to his passions, who had not vertue enough to master them; seeing that after he had allowed more to his hatred than was reasonable, he had yielded to love more than became him, at those years when in all probability he might think himself free from his Tyranny. He endured this change very impatiently; for besides his shame to be enslav'd to love, at a time when he ought to shew more prudence, and a courage sufficient enough to defend himself from it, and at these years when, to outward appearance, the dalliances of love were no way proper for him; he considered with an infinite sorrow, what person among all others in the world, his cruel destiny had forced him to adore: the Sister of Pharamond, the Murtherer of his dear Vindimir, against whom he was then arming both the Heavens and the Earth, having surpassed all the bounds and limits of a most cruel hatred. The Mistress also of Viridomar, whom, endued with so much vertue and excelling worth, he had used like a most cruel Enemy, because he lov'd that beauty which he was going to submit himself to: And he called to mind with so much shame, that it was impossible for him to overcome it, the severity that he had used toward his children, for a fault into which he now saw himself running headlong: a fault that was of another nature in him than in Viridomar, and which in the opinion of men would not be found so excusable, as the passion of a young man. In brief, to reduce the condition of his fortune into few words, he saw himself in love at those years that he was ashamed to confess it, in love with the Sister of his enemy, and the Rival of his own Son: And reflecting upon these three particulars of his adventure, he found therein so much mischief to himself, that it left him no hope of any consolation. What wilt thou do, he cryed, *enamour'd old man, the lover of thine enemy and thy Sons Rival? wilt thou dare to appear among men loaden with the fetters of a young beauty, thou whom thy years ought to have supplied with wisdom, sufficient to resist this idle passion? Thou who by reason of thy severity, known to all persons, art deprived of all excuses which thou canst study for thy folly? Wilt thou, to satisfy the curiosity of thy love, forsake this great enterprize, in the pursuit whereof thou hast engaged the Heavens and the Earth, and armed so many thousand men? Wilt thou renounce the revenge of Vindimir, for the Sister of his murtherer? and instead of pursuing that detestable Enemy to his grave, to which thou art bound by so many solemn oaths, and by a resolution publick to all the Earth; wilt thou cowardly and basely seek his friendship, and flatter him perhaps in vain, to seek his alliance? Or if thou couldest resolve thy self as to all these questions, wilt thou contest for this Mistress with thy Son, with a son more worthy thy affection and esteem, than the crosses with which thou wouldest perplex him? against a Son whom a fair and flourishing youth, a merit vying with that of the most renowned persons, and a hundred other amiable qualities both of body and mind, give advantages above thee which thou canst not but acknowledge, if together with thy liberty thou hast not lost thy reason? Alas! added he presently after, I know too well that I have lost my reason, for had I preserved it, I had not been reduced to this condition wherein I find my self. I also am not ignorant of the cure which reason offers me, I see the shame which my foolish passion may cause, I see the obstruction of my hatred, of the performance of my oaths, and of my resolutions, and I see that I must contend with Viridomar for Polixena, with little honour and with less success: Yet knowing all this, I perceive I must love Polixena till death, and that through a misfortune which I have perhaps deserved, this passion, which the Gods have inflicted on me for my punishment, will endure as long as I have life. He continued a long time fixed in this contemplation, combating his passion with all that he could oppose most powerful against it, wherein he employed the greatest part of the time which he had, to get to the Camp. But perceiving that his endeavours were all in vain, and that that imperious resemblance that so tyrannically reign'd in his soul, seem'd to establish it self more strongly,* by the resistance which he made against it, he sought for other resolutions, wherein after he had spent some time; "Let the incensed Deities, said he, and my hostile destiny, dispose of my fortune as they have decreed, I will love since they constrain me, and I will seek for ease if I cannot find my cure. Many other men, many other Kings more advanced in years than my self, have been enthralled to love, yet could not Love eclipse the glory, either of Anthony or Cesar. For my hatred, to which hitherto I have sacrificed all things, I will preserve it as entire as my love, and instead of reconciling my self to Pharamond for the love which I bear his Sister, I may perhaps make use of my love to help me to my revenge: nor do I despair to find in my love, opportunities to perplex my Enemy. And for Viridomar, (concluding with motions of anger and jealousy) if he be so confident, said he, to be my Rival when my love shall be discovered; he shall know that I have over him some advantages, which may counterbalance those that he hath over me: and that though he be more youthful, more fair, and more capable to create love in others; however 'tis I that reign and keep him imprison'd, which I am able to do so long as his obstinacy shall continue to cross my affection. Upon the conclusion of this resolution, he came to his quarters about the time, that day-light began to give way to darkness.

The two Queens, the Princess and their illustrious life-guard, were got home a little before, but with disorder enough by reason of the trouble, which Amalazontha, long lying in a swoon, had given to her two diligent friends. They had laboured in vain all the way to bring her to her self, nor did she open her eyes or recover her senses, till she was just coming out of the Chariot. All the rest of the fair company, except the Queen of the Cimbrians and the Princess, attributed the cause of this accident, to the fright which her horse had that day put her into: nor did they wonder at the effect, who knew the cause to have been so terrible. The two Princesses to whom the true reason was only known, confirmed them in their opinion, and having accompanied the Queen of the Turingiens to her Apartment where they stay'd with her, they gave the Princes to understand, that their presence, considering her condition, might be inconvenient: who thereupon retired, leaving the Ladies alone all the rest of the Evening. Immediately Amalazontha threw her self upon her bed, and after she had told the women that crouded about her, that now the worst was past, and that she had no more need of their help; they departed and left her alone with Rosamond and Albifinda, who sat by her, and by their expressions and by their caresses so full of affection and tenderness, made it plainly appear to her, how much they were themselves concerned in her misfortune.

The first part of their discourse was very much discomposed, through the disorder which they discern'd, as well in her mind as in her body: insomuch that the fair Queen of the Cimbrians, seeing that she made no answers but with sighs and tears, that continually flowed from her fair eyes, laying her cheeks to hers and tenderly embracing her; For the love of the Gods dear Sister, said she, give not your self over to a grief that may prove your ruine, and for which I find no new cause, in any thing that has befall'n you. True it is that it was a misfortune great enough for you to love against your will, and to endure a mischief for which you could find no remedy: But methinks your condition was not better in loving an apparition, or an unknown person, who might be altogether unworthy of your affection; than in loving a Prince whom all the world esteems for his merit: and that when you understand that it was to King Pharamond that you had given, what you thought you had unworthily bestowed, you have no reason to accuse your self for so doing. "Ah Sister, (replied the fair Queen of the Turingiens) surely you speak not according to what you think, for though your pity makes you say something to flatter my grief, yet you know full well, that there is no greater misfortune in the world, than to love that person whom we ought chiefly to detest, a person I can never hope to enjoy, though it were permitted me to love him, a person who has other where bestowed all that is for me to desire from him, though my fortune and his condition gave us leave: no Sister, neither is it for me to love Pharamond who hath slain my Brother, nor can I be beloved of Pharamond whose heart is engaged, or though I might hope it, 'tis not wish you, dear Sister, that I am willing to dispute. "Ah! for me dear Sister, (said the Queen of the Cimbrians blushing) fear no obstruction on my part, rather believe that there shall be nothing wanting in me to make you happy. I will not tell you that Pharamond does not love me, since he perswades all the world to the contrary, and that by all his actions he makes me believe the same: nor will I tell you that I hate him so much as I ought, or at least so much as I am bound to testify; for that sincerity which I owe to yours, permits me not to use any dissimulation with you. But I will assure you that all the reluctancy I have to hate the King of the Franks; serves me to no other end than to make me unhappy: And though I had as great an inclination for him as I manifest hatred,

" that shall never make me go beyond those reasons, that oblige me now to make war a" gainst him, and to look upon him till death as an Enemy, and not a lover of Rosamond.
 " By this resolution of yours, replied Amalazontha, you teach me what mine ought to be,
 " for seeing Pharamond did no more kill Amalaric than Theobald, and that I have no other " reason but what is common with yours; 'tis certain that that very reason overturns all
 " the hopes that I can conceive. " I told Albifinda yesterday as I will tell you now, replied
 " the Queen of the Cimbrians, that though we all three make war upon Pharamond, we are " not equally engaged: for that together with a brothers death, which I am to revenge, I " have also to perform, the last will of a Father dead in your quarrel, to acquit my self of " those solemn oaths which I have taken, and to keep that union with the King of the " Suedes, which I have sworn to observe not only with him, but all those other Princes,
 " who are link'd to my interests. These invincible obstructions to any pretence that Pha-
 " ramond may have to me, shew you plainly, dear Sister, that it is not by me that you will
 " any way be injured: so that as we can never oppose one another, you may believe that
 " nor only Pharamond, will easily forget his unprofitable affections to give himself to you:
 " I say to you, who merit his love far beyond me, had he seen you first of all; but that also I " shall joyfully behold that change, and that I can never be more perfectly glad, than to see " you enjoy what I cannot possess; besides that I thought it a thing always worthy of my self,
 " though my fate had not opposed it, not to shake off my own fetters but only to put on
 " yours, nor to have been wanting to an unfortunate person like my self, with whom it is " impossible for him to be happy, but to render fortunate a person whom I love, equal to " my self. " I no way deserve, said Amalazontha, these inestimable marks of your friend" ship, and I must tell you also dear Sister, that it is hard for me to comprehend them: nor " can I believe that any other than your self, could ever patiently endure to see the per" son whom she loved, in the possession of another. " I have not told you, replied the " Queen of the Cimbrians, that I loved Pharamond: but I must tell you now that though I " loved him, so well as you by your confession do, his condition would be never the more " fortunate, nor should I pretend that you were ever obliged to me, for yielding that to you,
 " which never could be mine. " I hope, replied Amalazontha, that I shall follow the fair
 " Example which you set me, and that if I cannot like you, find my cure in my courage " and my vertue, I shall at least meet my remedy in my death. My relief will be to me " more just and more assured, than that which I shall receive from your obliging and gene" rous offers, and which I hope my unfortunate passion, will never reduce me to the ne" cessity of abusing. In the mean while Sister, (so she continued a while after looking upon " Rosamond with a sigh) see now whether my dream did not tell me the truth, and whe" ther it were without reason, that I accus'd you of my death. " I confess (said then the " Princess of Suevia, who during the dispute between the two Queens, had not spoken a word)
 " that the relation of your dream, raised in me a great suspicion of the truth, and after" wards by the description, which you made us of the person of Pharamond, my suspicion
 " turn'd almost to certainty. " You see then, replied the Queen of the Turingiens, that not" withstanding the prepossession of my soul, that I did not flatter him in the description,
 " which I made of him, and that he is altogether such a one as I retain'd him in my me" mory. It would be a hard thing, replied Albifinda, to flatter King Pharamond, for in " speaking of him there is less danger of saying too much, than of not speaking enough.
 " But well you see now Sister, that it was not without reason that I told you, that you would " be less eager after Pharamond's ruine, than you appear'd to be if once you knew him so " well as we. " Alas, innocent as I was, then said the fair Amalazontha with a sigh, it was " against my own life that I was unfortunately incens'd, and my heart ought to have told " me out of its own foresight, that I was not to turn my arms against him: but I shall for" bear any farther enmity: and in this dear Sister (continued she turning toward Rosamond)
 " I confess that my vertue is inferiour to yours, in not being able to make war with a passion
 " so opposite to hatred: and that instead of sending the Turingiens to the field; I will first
 " present my own bosom to the points of their swords, rather than permit them to turn " their steel against him. Pardon, Amalaric, pardon my passion stronger than our relation:
 " and if thou wilt that I should revenge thy life, raise me up other Enemies than this belo" ved adversary, who by vertue of a misfortune far more terrible than thine, has at the same " time infused death and love into my breast. That violent passion which was become Mi" stress of the Heart of that fair and unfortunate Princess caused her to express her self in " this manner, and had caused her to utter more, if she had not used her utmost endeavour
 " to moderate her self, and had not found within her self sufficient help, to stop the violent " turning,

turning her eyes upon her compassionate Rival, Oh, Sister, (said she, slowly taking off her eyes from their fair object) what opinion will you have of me? In the name of all the Gods, I beg you to believe only that I have lost my reason, and am grown void of sense.

These words and some others little different, nearly touch'd the Queen of the Cimbrians and the Princess of Suevia with so much compassion, that they could not forbear to accompany with their own, the tears which they saw drop from the eyes of the fair Queen; and this compassion also so strongly mov'd the Soul of the generous Rosamond, that for some time she desired that Amalazontha might be happy, and that the heart of Pharamond might change in favour of her affection. But when she consulted her own, she recall'd her wishes; or rather, she perceiv'd that she had only endeavour'd to wish, but could not wish indeed. However, she left nothing unsaid, that she thought might conduce to her consolation: nor was Albifinda wanting to do what lay in her power; and having spent in this manner a good part of the Evening, Rosamond changing the subject of the discourse, mildly complaining to Albifinda of the fury of the King her Father, who contrary to his faith engaged to Constance, the Laws of Nations and of Honour, would have slain Pharamond, giving so little heed to whatever was urg'd to him to divert him from his design. Albifinda shrunk up her Shoulders at this discourse; and instead of justifying what her Father had done, she only gave the Queen to understand what she suffered, and what she expected to suffer from his severity. After they had spent the rest of the Evening in this discourse, Rosamond and Albifinda retired to their Apartments: but the Queen of the Cimbrians, as she was going towards hers, whether by chance, or whether out of any design of the Prince, met Balamir, who mov'd toward her to bid her good night. Though it were not her intention to see any person at that unseasonable hour, yet Balamir's virtue gave him a privilege; and that very day she was so particularly satisfied with him, that she willingly permitted him to accompany her to her Chamber, and to tarry there for some time. They were hardly over the Threshold, when the Queen beholding the Prince with a very obliging aspect; It becomes me not, said she, to thank them that do any kindness for my Enemies; but all the desire that I have for their ruine cannot hinder me from telling you, that you are always Balamir; and that in what happened to day between the King of the Sueves and the King of the Franks, you have appeared what you ever shewed your self to be. "I never thought, replied Balamir, that the interest of your service led me to follow the motions of the King of the Suever; or that, though you desired the death of King Pharamond, which it may be he has no way deserved at your hands, yet I know you never desired he should lose it by foul play, and to the eternal shame of all that take your part. I did then sufficiently testify to the King of the Sueves, replied the Queen, that my thoughts were no way agreeable to his, but he gave little ear to what I laid before him, either in relation to his own, or my Honour, or the esteem which we owe to Constance; so that had it not been for your generous resolution, and timely rescue, 'tis very probable he might have satisfied his revenge. "I cannot tell, replied the Prince, whether the success might have answered his expectation; for notwithstanding the advantage he had in the Combat, it would have cost him a great deal of labour, and a great waste of blood, ere he could come the end of so great an undertaking: I likewise understand, that in the heat of the Combat Pharamond had a respect to the Father of Albifinda and Viridomar, of whom Marcomire gave him the knowledge, and that the King had been in great danger, but for the esteem which he had for him. I easily believe it, replied the Queen, and by the fair example which you set, I am of opinion that we are not forbid to praise those deeds, that merit praise, in our very enemies.

Balamir then appeared more pensive and serious than he was ordinarily accustomed to be; whereupon the Queen desiring to know the cause, as a person that was much concerned for him. Pharamond, said he, has done many noble actions, the same whereof rings through the whole world: but if my suspicion be true, he has done one noble deed, which he conceals from the whole world; and if I am so unhappy as to discover this truth, I shall have but small comfort in my life. These words begat a curiosity in the fair Queen, and though she avoided all occasions that tended to the discourse of the King of the Franks, she could not refrain from making it known to the Prince, who accounting nothing so precious as the opportunities of pleasing her, related to her all that had passed after her departure between King Pharamond and his Brothers, and himself and his Friends, declaring word for word what discourse had pass'd between them; but he paus'd particularly upon what the King of the Franks had spoken to him, of a way which he had to gain his friendship; and finding the Queen to be as deeply concern'd as himself, If your Majesty, said he, calls to mind the accident that befel me in the Forest of Lisurgis, and of the assistance which I received from the most valiant person in the world, in the greatest danger of my life, you cannot forget what I related to you, concerning what discourse pass'd between my noble Preserver and my self; and that by what he said to me, I had some reason to take him for one of the Brothers of Pharamond, or some other person highly engaged to his interest. It was neither Marcomire nor Sunnon that I discovered from under his Arms, but by his deportment and his comely grace on Horseback, and by what I guess'd by his voice through his Helmet, it was very probable to be Pharamond himself. He resembled him not more by his valour than by his words, such as methought could not issue from any other lips than his; and the more to strengthen my suspicion, by what I afterwards recollected in my mind, I understood that King Pharamond was at that time in that part of the Country, and two days after he gave you a visit. All these circumstances almost convince me of a truth which I fear to find out; or rather, I see nothing which does not confirm me in this opinion more than I could desire. "Since you have this suspicion, said the Queen, there will be now no danger in telling you that I had the same, ever since that day that Pharamond arrived at Lisieux, or rather that Albisinda and my self made no doubt thereof: and that we had revealed our thoughts to you, (continuing her discourse with a smile) had we not been afraid of doing you a discourteous, by letting you understand the obligation you had to your Enemy. No consideration, (replied Balamir very pensively) can disengage me from your service: But if it were true, that I was beholding to King Pharamond for my life, it is impossible for me to assail him, without being detestably ingrateful, which is a vice I do not find my self too much inclin'd to. This it is, Madam, that makes me find so great an unhappiness in that adventure; for if I really owe my life to Pharamond, I must either renounce the fairest hopes in the world, or preserve them with that ignominy which no passion can deface, or at least, discharge my self from so great an obligation, before I am in a condition to have anything to dispute with him. "You have not long waited for that, replied the fair Queen, for besides what you have performed this day in Pharamond's behalf, which merits a sufficient consideration, my Sister and I knew, (though we have hitherto preserv'd it as a secret) that you have prevented him in what he did for you, by what you did for his Brother some days before, and these two obligations added together, are not of so small a consequence, but that they may counterbalance the obligation which you have to King Pharamond. Ah, Madam, said Balamir, be pleas'd not to make any comparison between things that are not capable to bear it. I owed to my Honour all that which I performed to day; and for what I did in Bohemia for the liberty of Marcomire, besides what I owed to the request which your self and the Princess of Suevia made to me, I put my life at that time in no danger, nor did I meet either with an Enemy or a Rival in the person of Marcomire: I had probably done as much for his Brother, as I did then for him, but my fate would not permit me that happiness, for it belongs to none but Pharamond to meet with opportunities to exercise and signalize his virtue. "You have sufficiently made yours known to the world, replied Rosamond, not to have any reason to envy the Renown of another; so that if you are not satisfied with yours, it may be affirm'd that you are unreasonable. Such as it is, replied the Prince, it behoves me to be contented with it; and I ought more choicely to value it, if it has been the cause that I have acquir'd my esteem in your thoughts. But I too plainly perceive that it is not sufficient to make me happy; for though it were neither defaced by that of Pharamond, nor clouded by that of Varancz, Gondioch, or Ardric, yet have I not as they, either Armies at command, or a Crown to wear. And while I can only prostrate my self at your feet, Varancz, together with a merit probably greater than mine, presents you a Throne hardly inferiour to that of Theodosius or Honorius. "I had thought, replied the charming Queen, that I had sufficiently explain'd my self upon this difficult argument; and that I had as often let you understand, that besides that in the condition I am now in, it is in my power to espouse a Prince that has no Crown to wear, without degrading my self, a virtue like yours is of greater value to me, and more esteem'd than the Crown of the Persians with all the merits of their Prince. But I must tell you moreover at this time, that it shall not be for any defect in your person, or in your fortune, if you find any obstacle in your pretences; for if my Fate in conformity to the intentions of my deceased Father, were so relat'd that I must surrender my self to any of those Princes that fight in our quarrel, there is not one that I would flick to prefer before your self. At these obliging words, Balamir fell upon one of his knees before the Queen, but being immediately rais'd by her command, I am not worthy, said he, of an honour and a happiness which the chiefest of the Gods would bestow with envy; and I have something in my heart that tells me too severely that I am not born to enjoy it. But, Madam, if I may be permitted without injuring your goodness, to bear in my memory this glorious advancement with which you honour me, I will be bold to tell you, that among all the Princes that adore you, they that fight in your quarrel are not the persons persons whom I fear, and that Pharamond as unfortunate as he is, has always been to me more formidable, than either Gondioch or the Prince of Persia. For Pharamond, replied the Queen blushing, you know he is our Enemy, and an enemy that may fall by our Arms, if fortune be not our adversary: besides that if it be true that you are obliged to him for your life, it is not probably with him that you would be willing to dispute his pretences. I very well know, replied the Prince, that I ought not so to do: so that if my passion causes me not to lose my reason, it never will permit me to forget my duty: But Madam, since his misfortune will not suffer him to preserve his pretences, it is not with him that I believe myself concern'd to contend. Then you have nothing to fear, replied the charming Queen, and I shall not forget that I have promised you, the precedency before all others: But in truth Prince, (added she a little after, casting a most obliging look upon him) I bewail your destiny, if you tie your affection to a person, more unfortunate than you believe her to be: and I judge you worthy of a better fortune than you can hope from me. She accompanied these words with a deep sigh, and the Prince instead of making an answer, remained like one fix'd upon some peculiar thought that perplexed his mind: and which it is very probable, deprived him of the liberty to explain himself. The Queen made no wonder at it, having before perceived him in the same posture, and having more than once observed in him, that he did not speak to her over confidently of his passion, though he were naturally courageous, and seem'd to be most highly concern'd: nor did it appear that he sought the occasion himself: for that time therefore they said no more, for the Prince perceiving it was late, and not being willing to abuse the esteem which the Queen had for him, bid her good night and retir'd.

The next day several of the Princes went to visit the King of Suevia, to consult about what they had to do, before the eight days of the Truce were expired, at which time they observed in his countenance, a change sufficient to make them judge, that he had but ill retir'd that night, and that his mind was perplexed with some new disturbance. To them however he dissembled the cause, for though he knew it was a difficult thing, for him to keep his passion from being known, yet he thought it was not then seasonable to declare it, in regard it behoved him to keep it as secret as he could, to the end he might bring to pass a design, upon which he had been pondering in his mind all the night long. He could not however retain some certain sighs, that in despite of all his endeavours, forced themselves from his breast: But he had this advantage that they rather interpreted the meaning of them, according to his desire than according to truth; there being few persons who believed that in a breast so overswayed by hatred and rage. Love could find any retreat. Among the Princes that came to visit him Balamir was wanting: For that Prince whose virtue acted otherwise than in common souls, could not behold him without reluctance; since that fact which he had seen him guilty of the day before, and perhaps not without some resentment, of the little repentance that he saw in him for what he had done. The King of the Suedes, though he could not blame him, was nevertheless nettled at his proceeding, nor could he without something of anger, but remember that he had seen him take Pharamond's part against him. But because he infinitely esteem'd him, and for that he knew himself in an error, he did him justice at that time, and willingly hearken'd to the discourse of Martian, and the King of the Basternes; who advis'd him to shew him some more than ordinary civility, and not to persist in any coldness, which might make any farther breach, and deprive them of the assistance of so valiant a person.

The King of the Suedes had a very great reverence for the counsel of Martian, whose virtue he much respected, and therefore having promised him, whatever he desired in that particular; in a short while after he found an opportunity, to be as good as his word: for going to visit the Queens with the rest of the Princes, he there met Balamir, and he no sooner saw him, but moving toward him in a very obliging manner; Sir, said he, this is not the first time, that I have found your virtue to be above ours, but besides the advantages which I here confess it gives you over us, if you knew the grief of a Father, such a one as is conceal'd within my breast, I assure my self that you would excuse a great part of the faults, which it might cause me to commit. Balamir received this complement of the King with an admirable grace, and therefore not being willing, to pay him less civility than he had received; It lies on my part Sir, said he, to beg pardon of you for hindring you from executing a design, which you your self would have condemn'd, had your passion let your virtues have born the chiefest sway: For now that it has reassum'd its power, I am assured that you are thereby convinc'd that I had no other intention, but to serve you. They had some other expressions equally full of honour and respect, and a little after they all went to visit the Queen of the Cimbrians, to confer with her about the affairs of the war. It behoved her to put a very great constraint upon her self, to behold the King of the Suedes as she was wont to look upon him: and had it not been for those cruel reasons, by which she was tyed to an interest that was common to both, she would not have concealed the least part of what she had in her mind. He made her allow some excuses, not for having assaulted Pharamond, against whom he thought it behov'd her to be incens'd with a hatred sufficient to desire his death, but that he had not quitted the discourse of him, by reason of certain words which she had spoken to divert him from it, laying the fault upon the violence of his grief, of which he was not Master upon the sight of the person who had slain his Son. He express'd himself so discomposedly, and with so much trouble, that could the fair Queen have divin'd the cause, she might possibly have known that she was as well reveng'd upon him as she could desire. She hardly vouchsafed to give him an answer, contenting her self only to tell him, that she had no cause to blame him, and that not having any other reason to divert him from his design, but only the confidence she had that he could not execute it without doing an injury to his own, and the honour of all those that took their parts, she might possibly be deceived in things which she was rather to learn of him, than to teach him.

Afterwards they fell into discourse about Constance's Sickness, for which, unless it were Gondioch, there was none in all the company that did not testify a very great sorrow. The Queen was of opinion, that it behov'd her to send some persons to visit him at Frankfort, questioning when the Truce was expir'd, whether Pharamond would give leave, and there were few of the Princes that were not resolv'd to joyn one of their own to the person whom they should make choice of. But the Prince of Persia, who had a very great esteem for the generous Constance, was resolv'd to visit him himself, with whom, Martian, who had a particular value for him, would needs go along, intending to set forward the next day, to which purpose they sent to the French Camp to get leave. Varanez very joyfully accepted of Martian's company, with whom he had entred into a particular friendship, nor was it without reason, seeing that it was a hard matter to find a person so considerable for his merit, not only in that fair company, but also over all the world beside; nor more worthy the high Dignity, to which some years since his own virtue had advanc'd him, though he were neither King nor Prince; and that he only serv'd in the Army as a private person, for no other advantages than the purchase of Renown; yet he was look'd upon by the Kings and Princes who were there, as if he had been their equal in Dignity; for besides what they owed to the Glory of many great Actions by which he had signaliz'd himself to the whole world, and that they were not ignorant of the great Rank he held with the young Theodosius, and of his high employments in the Eastern Empire, they might behold in him all the marks of a true, fair, shining and sublime virtue, to which they could not deny their esteem, their affection, and their respect: of valour and prudence he had an equal share: and so great a lover he was of equity, that in the meanest things, and things of the smallest concernment he could not endure the least appearance of injustice; which was the reason he would not over-zealously engage with a party that did not seem to have the greatest right on their side; so that when he believ'd himself convinc'd of the injustice of the cause, as courageous and gallant as he was, when they ask'd his advice, he counselled them rather to peace than war. He had a most excellent disposition; haughty, yet courteous and moderate; and besides that he was naturally eloquent, he had enrich'd his natural parts with all sorts of acquir'd knowledge. He was well proportion'd in his Body, and very nimble and expert in all exercises both of body and mind. But as there were few persons that were ignorant how highly he was advanc'd, and what splendid Offices he enjoyed under the young Emperour of the East, together with his great and important employments, of which he always honourably discharg'd himself, it being never known that he fell into any disgrace, they did not a little wonder to see him so far absent from a Court where he had always liv'd in such high splendour; and as it were an Exile in a Camp, where, though his Train and Equipage was sumptuous and magnificent enough, yet it was no more than the Equipage of a private person. Many of the Princes, by whom he had made himself worthily honourable, endeavoured to oblige him to tell the cause; but they found him little inclin'd to content their curiosity, so that perceiving his design to conceal it, they press'd him no farther. Only Varanez, betwixt whom and himself there was more than an ordinary familiarity, during the time that he abode at Constantinople, and to whom he was more particularly tyed by the bonds of friendship would not be put off, so that he press'd him one day after another to make him discover what he kept secret in his Breast; Martian, who discern'd in that Prince a very strong affect on toward himself, and who for the knowledge he had thereof, and of his great virtues together, preserv'd a very high esteem for him, took in good part the prosecution of the Persian Prince, which he made use of to get this secret out of him; however, he had not discovered it to him, still finding out obliging excuses, cuses, though with all the marks of reverence and esteem. But that very day after they had din'd together (as they were often accustom'd to do) finding themselves private or at least without other company than their Domestick Servants, whom they could easily send away, the Prince of Persia renew'd his importunity, and embracing him with a behaviour full of all the marks of friendship, Will you be so unkind, to bid me, as to let me see that you put no difference between your old and true friend, and persons whose acquaintance grew but of yesterday? Will you be so cruel to let me languish so long, out of a desire which I never had conceiv'd, but for the esteem and affection which I bear you? Are you ignorant how far I am interested in your fortune; or if there be any thing that deserves to be secret, as I believe this does, think you me unable to keep it at a time when it concerns the interest of a friend so considerable to me as your self? No, generous Martian, be not so cruel-hearted towards me, who would willingly trust you with whatever happened to me important in this world, did I not know that you understand every particular from the beginning; but in laying up in my Breast that which you conceal from all others, give me an experiment of your friendship, which shall be ever dear to me; and of which I will make such an use, that you shall have neither cause to complain, or repent. Martian found himself somewhat perplex'd with this adjurement of the Prince whom he so truly lov'd, and who did not so eagerly press him, but for the interest which he took in his fortune, so that for a long time he kept silent, without returning any answer; but Varanez adding to his words most obliging Careffes, with the best grace in the world, he could defend himself no longer against his request, and lifting up his eyes towards his face, which till then he kept fix'd upon the ground; I find, Sir, (said he with a sigh) that I can no longer deny what you request of me; and that I must now disclose a secret to you which I keep concealed from all the world, and which is sufficiently to me considerable, and to some other persons concern'd therein, to deserve to be lock'd up in silence until death. You will understand as much without doubt by the discourse which I shall make you; for in learning news of me, you will perhaps hear news of others, to whose interest you are otherwise engag'd. And I hope you will keep this secret better from all the world than I can keep it from you, especially as to what you think most worthy of being conceal'd, in regard of your promise that I shall never have cause to repent. But for that in declaring to you the cause of my absence from those places where you have seen me, it will not be from the purpose, that to satisfy your curiosity yet a little further, I should make you a short relation of what has happened of most importance in my life, and that I add other things which happened to me at Constantinople since your departure thence, sufficiently deserving your attention, I find my self engag'd in a long discourse which I shall not perhaps have the liberty to finish, if we do not take some care to hinder our being interrupted, and that you do not give order that we may be left free to our selves for some part of the day. That will not be difficult to do, replied Varanez, to which purpose, having confirm'd to you my promise to keep your secret inviolably, for the performance whereof I will refuse you no oath that you shall require, we will shut our selves into this Chamber, leaving first, word at the door, for the Servants to tell all those that come to see us, that we desire not to be molested for some few hours, being to dispatch some important affairs; which reasonable request I suppose there will be none so cruel to deny us, or to deprive me of the satisfaction which I expect from your discourse. Varanez did every thing as he had contriv'd it, to the end he might be private with Martian, and after that lock'd the Chamber door, at what time both being late down, Martian began as follows.

The History of Martian.

MY Ancestors have always gloried to themselves to have been descended from the noble Family of the Martians, who from the beginning of the Roman Republick began to make themselves known, as well in the person of the Renowned Coriolanus, who was the first that made their name famous, as of many other illustrious persons, who there held and exercis'd the chiefest authority. Their fortune has not been so flourishing in these latter ages, either through the revolutions of Fate, that permits not Families themselves the most advanc'd, to remain in the same condition, after such a number of years, or through the disgraces into which ours has often fallen, in the great change of Masters, which either through fortune or by chance of war, or through the fickle humours of men is become subjected to. My Grandfather however was in high esteem with Constantine who forsook Rome to keep his Court at Constantinople, and my Father who had been well known known to the Emperour Julian and Valentinian, was highly favoured by Gratian, and received many great benefits and advantages from the great Theodosius, whose memory remains so glorious among us; it was in the Court of this great Prince that I had the honour to be bred up, sometimes at Rome, sometimes at Constantinople, according as the Emperour resided either in the one, or the other of those Cities, being the Metropolitan Seats both of the East and West, where I spent my youthful years with the famous Constance, who had there his education also, though he were more particularly oblig'd to wait upon Prince Honorius, with whom he liv'd at Rome after the death of Theodosius, and the partition of the Empire; whereas my Father following altogether the Emperour Arcadius, remained always at Constantinople. My Father made it his chief study to give me a noble education, sparing for no cost or means, either to frame my inclinations to virtue, and the knowledge of the best things, or to fit my body for the most noble Exercises. And he was incited thereto, not only out of his own proper inclination to virtue, and a natural desire in Parents to testify their affection to their children by a generous education, but out of a hope that he had conceived from the vanity of certain Prophecies, that, through the propensity which we have to flatter our selves, had possess'd his mind that I was destin'd to some extraordinary height of advancement. He had understood from Tatian, and some others, under whose care I was brought up, that an Eagle made a low stoop over me as I lay one day sleeping in the Sun, and had a long time continued upon the wing, hovering over my face as it were to defend me from the Beams of the Sun, hardly leaving me at their approach; whereupon consulting the ancient Presidents of Prophecies little different, that had portended Sovereign Dignity, his head was so fill'd with Chymera's, that one day being with the Emperour, (the great Theodosius, who was then alive) and being by him put to read some part of the History of his Ancestors, the Emperour made a stop at one particular passage, where Galba was said to collect the Prophecy of his future greatness from a prediction of Augustus Cæsar, who in his most tender infancy clapping him upon the Shoulder said these words to him, (And thou also Galba shall taste of the Empire) foretelling him by these words, as the event made it afterwards appear, that in his old age he should attain to the Empire; and because I was then standing by chance near the Emperour, and that the Emperour out of the delight which he took in that part of the History, clapp'd his hand upon my Shoulder, repeating the words of the Historian, (And thou Galba shalt also taste of the Empire) my Father presently laid hold of that action, and those words of the Emperour as a presage of a fortune that was to befall me, equal to that of Galba, wherein he was the more confirm'd, for that the Emperour died some few days after; and there is generally something more than humane in the last words of great Personages. I do not tell you this that I had ever any confidence in these vain predictions, to hope from thence any extraordinary Grandeur, to which I never bent my thoughts: for though it were more excusable in our Empire, where we have seen so many examples of the advancement of Fortunes far more improbable than mine to attain the supreme Dignity, than in Kingdoms, where by a legitimate succession the Crown is perpetuated to particular Families, not to be forc'd from them without overturning the whole frame of Government: I for my part have been always contented with my condition, and have endeavoured to make my self happy by doing my Duty, and seeking in the exercise of virtue, what perhaps is not to be found in the possession of a Throne: nor had I made mention of these hopes which my Father had so lightly conceiv'd, but to let you understand the reasons that oblig'd him to give me a more than ordinary education: I was bred in the Court of Arcadius after the same rate that I had been in the Court of the great Theodosius; and it was my own fault that I made no more of those many fair examples, and noble precepts which ought to have compos'd me to virtue, not only by means of my first breeding which I received in the Court of my Emperours; but from the experience which I ought to have drawn from my several Travels through the Empire, both in Europe and Asia, whither my Father sent me to see all that was remarkable, as soon as I had strength to sit a Horse; nor did he recal me back, unless it were to send me to other places, till I was of ability to bear Arms. This happened to be in the first war, when Alaric with his Goths invaded the Territories of the Empire; and although I was not then above eighteen years of age, I was sent into Thessaly with a noble Train, and such fair recommendations to those who had the command of our Army, that some slight actions that my fortune gave me opportunity to perform, were cry'd up more than they deserv'd, and gave occasions to those that wish'd me well, to advance me to employments conformable to my years, and by step and step to raise me to Dignities and Offices, far more considerable than it became me to hope for.

About this time I lost my Father, who died, as I since understood, not losing the hopes which

which he had entertained of my great fortune, though he could not live to see the event. However, though his death most sensibly perplex'd me, yet did I not for that leave the Army, where, by the favour of our Generals, and the kindness of fortune, I had farther hopes to advance my self. Nor was I deceiv'd in my expectation; for with a small party of Horse, of which I had then the command, I performed several enterprizes so fortunately, as thereby to obtain a greater employment, being chosen by the consent of the Emperour, to march into Epirus with a body of four thousand Horse, with a farther Commission to command what Forces should be rais'd in that Country, whither Alaric had sent a part of his Army, that made a strange havock where e're they came. About this time also it was that Radagaisus invaded Italy, where he perish'd with an Army of two hundred thousand men by the good conduct of Stilicon, and the valour of Constance: Nor was it long after that Alaric having pass'd through Ilyricum and Pannonia, was stopp'd by the same Stilicon, who oppos'd him with a victorious Army; and that after several Battels wherein fortune seem'd to favour neither side, the war seem'd as it were to be lull'd asleep, and all acts of Hostility were forborn, there being a truce made for four years. In the mean while I had been sufficiently successful in Epirus by defending that Country against the Goths, which Alaric had left there with all the good fortune that I could desire: For besides that in several signal Encounters, wherein the advantage was generally on our side, they were so weaken'd in one Battel which I fought near the City of Nicopolis, that they were constrained to quit Epirus, having lost above eight thousand upon the place, to rejoyne themselves with Alaric, for fear of greater damages in their retreat.

About this time it was that the Emperour Arcadius dyed, a Prince much lamented for his goodness and affability, yet one that overswayed by the softness of his temper, had put the government of all his Empire, into the hands of two self-interested favourites; Entropius and Ruffinus: who had altogether ruined it, if that death which they had abundantly deserved, had not prevented the evil effects of their treacherous intentions. You know Sir, that the Emperour dying, declared the King your Father Guardian to the young Theodosius his Son: who most nobly acquitting himself of that trust, which his friend repos'd in him, sent the vertuous Antiochus to Constantinople, who not only educated the young Prince with a most admirable diligence, but also governed the Empire with great prudence, and with all the good success that could be desired. As for my self though I lost by the death of the Emperour Arcadius, who testified so great a kindness for me; yet in that change of affairs, I was not altogether laid aside: for by the advice of the young Emperour's council, wherein the sage Antiochus bore the greatest way, the government of Epirus which I had defended against the Goths was bestowed upon me, besides many other considerable employments, more favourable to me far than I deserved. They gave me also the command of those forces which they sent against the cruel Carroc who succeeded Radagaise, predecessor to Godegesile, whose memory is detested for his horrible cruelties: and although Maximus reaped the honour of his death, and of the last defeat which he received, by reason of a desperate wound, which hindred me from compleating what I had so happily begun: 'tis well known that I had no less a share therein than himself, and that that Barbarian was ruined by several advantages that I obtained over him, while Maximus was absent with another part of the Army. In all the trouble that afterwards befel the Empire, I was honoured with the same employments, and I was so fortunate as to give daily proofs of my fidelity, in the service of my Prince, and to take away all suspicion of my being slack, in the performance of my duty. I shall make no farther mention Sir thereof, but shall come without any farther stop to tell you what has befall'n me of late years, since it is that which you chiefly desire of me, and which it may be is most worthy your attention. I have nothing more to tell you, concerning the disposition of the young Theodosius, which you understand as well as my self; and whose name is enough to make you sigh, were you not by another passion cured of that which so long tormented you: You know that with him were bred up the three young Princesses, Pulcheria, Marina, and Flaccilla his Sisters. That Marina and Flaccilla, though they had merit enough to give them the hopes, of leading a life in the world conformable to their dignity; especially Flaccilla who was a most beautiful Princess, forsaking the love of the world for the love of heaven; devoted themselves to God, and renounc'd marriage: and that their eldest Sister Pulcheria had the same inclinations, and had perhaps preceded them in her purpose, if the affection which the young Emperour had for her, had not kept her always with him, contrary to her first intentions: and had not obliged her to tie herself altogether to his concerns, at that time when the wonders of her courage and wisdom, which are still the astonishment of the world; began to render her famous in our Court, and by little and little to discover those lamps of prudence in her, which have confounded the most cunning Politicians: and the greatest part of the Empire believe, that they were not given to a Princess, and a Princess that was enclined to renounce the world, but as a supernatural succour which heaven owed to the decaying government, the felicity of the people, and happiness of the Empire. The murmurings which were heard at first, and that ill opinion which people had of the spirit of the Emperour, for yielding to the counsel and will of his Sister, vanished in a short time, through the good effects they found thereof: And if at first my judgment failed among the rest, I was one of the first that submitted to those wonders that surpris'd me, and perfectly agreed with all the rest of the Court; that not only the Emperour, could not have made a better choice of a person, so intelligent and affectionate to the welfare of his Dominions, but also that this choice had repaired the error which the Emperours, his Father and his Uncle in the East and West, had run into by the choice of Ruffinus and Stilicon: though the last were a most excellent person, and worthy his great fortune, had he been as faithful, as by his wisdom and courage he was capable of the government. It is not necessary Sir, that I should rehearse to you what already you know, what method this admirable Princess took, to manage the most important affairs in the world, or with what prudence she governed the Empire, the Court, and family of Theodosius: only give me leave to tell you, that after I had beheld her for the first years without giving my judgment; through the experience which I had of the latter years, I admir'd her: and joyning other thoughts to those of admiration; they caus'd me to take up a particular interest in every thing that concern'd that Princess, and fix'd me to it at length in such a manner, that neither process of time nor any change of lite, could separate me from it. Here Sir it is, that I am beginning to manifest to you, the duty that I owe to your commands, by making a confession that I never yet made to any person living, and which perhaps I never ought to have done; but I will go now a little farther in complacence to your desire, and out of the confidence of the promise which you have made me. The Beauty of Pulcheria is none of those Beauties, as well you know, that surpris'd and dazle; however, she has not so little, but that persons the least passionate, cannot deny but that she is a comely personage, and before the appearance of that Athenais, that so often made you sigh, and who is now our Empress Eudoxia, there were few Beauties in our Court that excelled Pulcheria's; and that which Heaven has adorn'd her with, is accompanied with a Grace so little common, both in her behaviour and discourse, with an aspect so lofty, and a Majesty so commanding, that few persons among those whose Beauties are more resplendent, are capable of working those great effects upon the heart, would she make use of all her advantages, which yet she never practis'd. And if either her Devotion to Heaven, or her intent care of the Government of the Empire and the interests of the Emperour, have been the cause that she has always neglected it, and contemn'd those advantages as things unprofitable and beneath her courage, and her virtue, which others studiously make use of to render themselves amiable, yet is her disposition tender, her inclinations virtuous, her natural wit most excellent, and it may be truly said of her, that there is no person in the world that has a greater esteem for virtue, nor more free, or more capable to acknowledge it.

As I became wholly her creature, by the obligation which I received from the liberality of the Emperour, particularly the Government of Epirus, which I owed to her recommendation, I waited on her every day, and by the effect of that good opinion which she had of me beyond my deserts, I had the happiness to see my self honoured with many marks of her esteem, and finding in my heart too free a disposition to receive them at their full value, it wrought that effect which the Princess did not perceive, and which I my self did no way desire. However, I did not oppose it at the beginning, but flattered my self with some opinion of virtue, out of the inclination which I had to respect it in her; so that believing my self to be rather smitten with her Virtue than her Beauty, I did not believe that any thing would come of it that might trouble my repose, nor that any ill effect could proceed from a cause so excellent. But when I understood that this effect, as just as it was, did not stop within those bounds which my reason ought to have prescrib'd; and that instead of doing justice to the merit of Pulcheria, I beheld her with an affection that tormented me, and made me feel that which I had too little feared, I endeavour'd to suppress that which rose in my heart too vehement for my repose, and to reduce my thoughts within those limits which it became them not to exceed. And I believe it might not have been impossible for me to have attained my end, had I at the same time employ'd all those remedies which might have serv'd my turn; and if I had sought in absence the cure of a distemper, which a continual presence, and a presence that more and more discovered to me the wonders that I began to adore, render'd in process of time too desperate for me to hope for any other relief than death.

That

That day that the two Princesses Marina and Flaccilla publickly abjured the world, as they had renounc'd it long since in their hearts, and putting on habits suitable to the condition of life which they embrac'd, were shut up in a Cloyster of Virgins consecrated to Heaven; all the Court attended the Emperour and the Princess Pulcheria in the Temple, and assisted at that solemn and remarkable action, by reason of the Dignity of the persons that devoted themselves to the service of the God whom we adore; so that being plac'd behind the Princess, at a little distance from the Emperour, I saw, as all the rest of the Assembly did, that during all the time of the Solemnity, the Emperour and Pulcheria wept, bathing their eyes in tears, while the two Princesses that quitted the world, manifested in their looks, and by their behaviour, all the cheerfulness and constancy imaginable. That example so softened my heart, that I could hardly preserve my eyes drye to behold a sight that so tenderly mov'd all the congregation. But at the end of the Ceremony, the Princess Pulcheria turning toward the place where I stood, to wipe away those tears that had all bedewed her Cheeks, and seeing me behold her with an aspect, by which she judg'd I was nearly concern'd: Martian, (said she, with a sweetness unexpressible) it may be you may laugh at my weakness; but you see that the Emperour's constancy is not greater than mine; and perhaps it may be pardonable in both of us, what we cannot refuse to love and consanguinity. I received these expressions with that respect which became me, and looking upon the Princess with an eye that discovered how much I was concerned in her tears, Do not believe, said I, that either Martian, or any other person in the world can condemn either in you, or in the Emperour those marks of your good disposition: but be pleas'd to give me lieve to tell you, that if the Emperour be as much displeas'd with this days action as he seems to be, he might easily have contradicted it. Ab! Martian, replied the Princess, whatever you say, you know better, that in things of this nature, it is not for the Emperour to make use of his power; and that though he might defend his Sisters from the violence of any men that should have gone about to have ravish'd them from him, he could not deny them to Heaven, that required them at his hands, and has called them to its service: Nor are you ignorant, Martian, that both the Emperour and all the world must submit to the will of God. So that it is not for the condition of our Sisters, which is the best and most happy in the world, that we shed so many tears; but we cannot refuse them to our natural affection, which is more prevalent than our reason, and which our reason does not deny us upon such a separation. As I never look'd upon the Princess Pulcheria, replied I, but as something celestial and divine, rather than a mortal creature, I must confess, I did not think her subject, like our selves, to those passions that constrained tears, and which produce other effects, and which instruct us in our infirmities. Either you too much flatter me, replied the Princess, or else you do me a very great injury; for as I believe that you think me able to resist any thing of passion or vice, either by my prudence, or by the assistance of Heaven, I would not have you think me insensible of that which reason does no way condemn: and that you may know me better than you have hitherto done, I will inform you, Martian, that I am sensible both of joy and grief, when I find a lawful cause, that I am sensible of merit, of obligations and good turns; and that I am not so insensible of friendship, but that I could tenderly love too, if I were as tenderly belov'd. These words, though I could not rationally draw from thence any advantage, besides, that the Princess did not utter them with any thoughts that I could lay hold of, did not leave me however without feeling something of sweetness and flattery, which till that time I had not experimented, so that reserving a good part of what I thought, and what I had opportunity enough to have said, had I spoken to any other person but the Princess Pulcheria: Did I but know, said I, any person in the world worthy to make use of your good inclinations, I would be the first messenger of these happy tydings to make him truly fortunate; but as there is no person under Heaven that can merit your affection, so I believe it will remain in your Breast, without finding any object upon which to employ it self. Hitherto, replied the Princess, smiling, I never knew any affection for my self, but the Emperour's and my Sisters, and I assure my self that they cannot complain that I have been wanting to answer theirs. That which was lawful for the Emperour and your two Sisters, replied I, is not lawful for any other persons; and indeed there are few in the world that have the liberty to let you see the reverence which they have in their hearts for your person. Though there were, replied the Princess, I have never yet had any occasion or leisure to extend my kindness to any other but they; but yet if any such accident should befall me in my life, you should find that I should more esteem merit than Dignity. I could not understand any thing more pleasing than these words, though as well as those which she had spoken before, they were uttered without any relation to my self. But to make me wholly lose my reason, the Ceremony being fully concluded, the Princess did me the honour to give me her hand, to lead her to the place where she was to take her last lieve of her Sisters, and from thence to her

Chariot, that which I undertook with so much joy, or rather with so much transportation, so that if the Princess had never so little minded it, she might easily have made a discovery.

By means of this conversation, and proceedings of the Princess, I found something in my heart which possibly by that time was grown to be great enough to be called Love, which still increased from day to day; and out of the propensity which we have to flatter our selves, believing that I might make an advantage of what she had spoken about preferring merit before Dignity, I thought that when she understood the strange effect which her admirable Beauties had wrought in my heart, that she might be induc'd to pardon me, and to look upon it with some kind of favour: I waited so continually and so diligently upon her, that I was absent as little as possible might be, which, in regard of the power that she had over the Emperour, the whole Court imagined to be rather an effect of my ambition, than of any other passion, and that I endeavoured to insinuate my self into the favour of the Princess, for the sake of such advantages as I might make thereof: I cannot tell whether at first she were not of the same opinion her self; but soon after, had she pleas'd, she might have been of another mind, and might have perceiv'd, that it was rather the honour of her esteem which I sought for, and not for any advantages that I expected by her recommendation. In short, she took notice in a little time, that I not only ask'd for nothing for my self, nor for any of my Friends, but also refus'd great part of what was offer'd me, so far as I durst without offending the Emperour, a thing which often happened, and without giving him reason to think that I undervalued his favours. And when he ask'd my advice, as often he did, as to the bestowing any honourable place of preferment, he always perceiv'd, that without any partiality or self-interest, I gave my voice for those that I judged the most worthy, and the most capable to serve the Empire. And to this purpose I remember, that being once offer'd a place of very great importance, where, together with an immense profit, there was honour sufficient to be obtain'd: after he had told me all the advantages which he that enjoyed it would meet with, he commanded me to name that person whom of all the men in the Court I thought most meet for it, I acknowledged the Honour which he did me, with that respect which became me; and after I had studied for some time, I named Maximinus, a person of the greatest quality, and the greatest merit of any that you ever saw in our Court, where he always held one of the most eminent degrees: Pulcheria smil'd, and understanding that I had nam'd Maximinus, look'd upon me with some signs of amazement; not but that the quality of Maximinus was suitable to the employment, but for that she knew well, and so did all the Court, that there was no great correspondence between Maximinus and I, and that upon all occasions we oppos'd one another; so that after a long silence; And how long is it, said she, that you have been reconciled to Maximinus, to recommend him to such an advantageous employment? Had you commanded me to name the best of my Friends, said I, I had not nam'd Maximinus; but it being your order that I should tell you who it was, that of all the persons in the Court I judged most worthy of that employment which you propos'd, and the most capable to serve the Emperour, unless I should deceive you, I could not name another before Maximinus, who notwithstanding he is no friend of mine, is nevertheless never a jot the less qualified to discharge his trust with Honour. He has not all those perfections, reply'd the Princess, because he wants your friendship; and therefore it is not upon him that the Emperour bestows that place, but upon your self, who better deserves it upon all accounts, especially for that excellent virtue of endeavouring to advance your Enemies. As the employment was noble and great, and that I had no reason to refuse it in favour of Maximinus, I did not at all oppose the good intentions which the Princess had for me; but I had then other thoughts than to advance my self by charges and employments; and I saw that this employment would separate me from the Princess, than which, I feared nothing more; so that keeping close to what I had said already, with a resolution to fix there if it were possible; in answer to Pulcheria, As it is more Honour to have merited something by your judgment, said I, than to obtain it by my good fortune; permit me, Madam, to be contented with my share, and not to give anyone an occasion to think that I have made any advantage of your goodness to the prejudice of a person, who by reason of his ripe years, and his longer experience, is certainly more meet for the employment with which you would honour me, though he cannot have a greater zeal and fidelity for the service of the Emperour and your self. There are meaner employments more sitting for me; and in whatsoever quality I may serve the Emperour and the Princess, I shall esteem my self highly honoured and satisfied with my condition. 'Tis true, reply'd the Princess, we may find out others more worthy your acceptance, and I shall endeavour it for the good of the Empire: I shall propose Maximinus to him on your behalf; and I am perswaded that I shall persuade him to accept what you so generously bestow upon him, but it shall no otherwise be his than as received from you, to whom he shall acknowledge himself obliged for the favour. She was as good as her word; and the next day Maximinus came to give me thanks for the good office I had done him.

Upon several other occasions the Princess manifested the esteem which she had for me, and particularly one day I went to wait upon her, when she gave audience to certain Ambassadors from the King your Father, at what time I saw her deport her self with an unexpressible Grace and Majesty: upon that account I heard her discourse so prudently of the interest of the Empire, which she accompanied with such an extraordinary knowledge of other things, that the Persians, as well as other Nations, were astonish'd at it, yet with such a down-right and charming modesty, that after the Ambassadors were departed, I could not retain any longer what I had in my heart; so that I gave my self wholly up to set forth all her praises, which could not be denyed her, and that in a more passionate manner than I had ever done before. Ordinarily she did not love to hear them repeated: but at that time it could not be perceiv'd, but that the praises which I gave her, were acceptable to her, so that after she had given me liberty to continue my discourse, Hitherto, said she, I not only never sought for praise, nor could I endure to hear my self extoll'd, fearing that I had never deseru'd them, and as it is the Emperour's will, who orders me by his power to take upon me the management of affairs far above my Sex, my Age, my Humour, it is impossible for me to discharge my trust so well as to deserve that approbation which several persons have publicly given me, whose sincerity I had great reason to suspect, finding little justice therein, and the misfortune to which we are expos'd, seldom to be inform'd of the truth among persons, the variety of whose interests force them to be in various Tales. This made me to aim no farther, than only to discharge my Duty as far as in me lay, and to answer the trust which the Emperour repos'd in me with an entire and faithful diligence to serve him without expecting any applause, and indeed without deserving it: but though the applause of other persons never yet mov'd me, I must confess, Martian, that I cannot look upon those praises which come from you, with indifferency; for as I highly value your merit, there are few persons in the world, whose approbation I more value than yours. She spake to me many more obliging words, and gave me to understand more than she had ever done before, that she had a great confidence in me, and a very good opinion of me: I answer'd her with all the marks that I could possibly give of a most profound respect: but although there was something that appeared more than ordinarily passionate both in my discourse, and in my behaviour; yet I kept my self within the bounds wherein a true knowledge of my condition ought to restrain me; so that I gave her no cause to search into the true dissembler of my heart.

For a long time after, these thoughts of her, afforded me nothing but a pleasing content, and I found a real pleasure in loving and esteeming that which to me seem'd to deserve the greatest love and veneration in the world. But these thoughts at length becoming more violent, began at last to torment me, and to disturb my sleep, and to produce the true effects of love; then it was also that I endeavour'd to reduce them to more reasonable bounds, so that I might leave nothing in my heart but respect and admiration; and to this purpose, calling my reason to my assistance, What is it, Martian, that thou ponderest upon? (said I sometimes to my self) And into what an Abyss of evils art thou headlong thrown, by a silly complacence with thy vain and peremptory thoughts? O, Martian, know Pulcheria no more, no longer mind her; for though thou art sprung from a Descent sufficiently noble, and mayst flatter thy self with a favourable report of fame, canst thou hope that that Pulcheria that disdain the greatest Kings in the earth, and whose thoughts are only fix'd upon Heaven, and the Government of the Empire, will humble her self and look upon Martian, and change her resolutions publick to all the world in favour of him? No, thou hast not been so hardy as to hope it yet, nor canst thou hope it whilst thou livest, and yet thou hast not been so wise as to put a stop to the growth of those thoughts which from admiration chang'd into affection, and thence degenerated into a violent love: you ought to have respected and admired Pulcheria, but you ought to have look'd upon her as something divine, and to have kept your self within the bounds of veneration, without venturing so far as love; so far there was full liberty, all was well; and thou hadst the Honour to behold and understand the wonders of the divine Pulcheria more than any other person in the world: but to suffer thy self to be surpris'd with the love of Pulcheria, is not only unworthy the favour of thy providence, with which thou hast hitherto been flattered, but it is enough to make thee ridiculous through the whole Empire, and to expose thee to the contempt of the Princess, who without doubt never thought thou wouldst have so far transgressed the bounds of Duty, whom she has honour'd with such particular marks of her esteem. Without question, either her disdain or her anger will punish thy folly, when it shall be discover'd to her, and then neither the one nor the other will be less supportable to thee than death.

For some time I remained wholly taken up with these thoughts which incens'd me against my self, though to no purpose; so that having examined whatever my reason could represent to me, Oh, my Reason, said I, you blame me for loving Pulcheria, yet you do not enable me to resist my passion; you should have done better not to have let me know her admirable virtues, that I might not from admiration have run headlong into Love. However, I am not the first person in the world that has lov'd without hope, nor the first that ever conceal'd his love to the end of his life. When Pulcheria her self shall happen to know it, she will perhaps see nothing to merit her anger or contempt; and as she can have no reason to despise me for loving the most amiable, and most noble person in the world; so neither can she have any reason to be displeas'd at an affection altogether conformable to the Duty which I owe to the Sister of my Emperour: however, I shall learn to suffer, and to be silent; and yet I find that I must love Pulcheria till I die; and I am also sensible that whatever else shall make me suffer, will be to me more pleasing and more acceptable than the greatest happiness that my life can offer me of greatest value or advantage. Thus I talk'd to my self, and I found arguments on both sides both to oppose and encourage my passion; and when I disengag'd my self from these contests, I was either in the same condition, or else more passionate than before. The Princess might well observe in my diligence, in my care, and in the passion which I manifested for her interests upon all occasions, the particular devotion which I had for her; but I prohibited my eyes from speaking, as much as lay in my power, and from many other actions whereby Lovers are wont to discover themselves in their discourse, and which I knew I was not to put in practice, having to deal with such a person as she was.

About the same time the Emperour would have had me married the Daughter of Saturninus, the President of the Senate, and one of the greatest persons for wealth, and for authority in the Court. His Daughter was very beautiful, rarely deserving, and indeed the prime Lady of the Court, but I had no inclination to love her; so that after I had manifested to the Emperour my acknowledgment of his Favours, I begg'd of him to let me remain at liberty in the same condition I was in. The Emperour admired, and so did all the Court, at the little regard I had for such a match, to which few persons in the Empire durst aspire, which caus'd him to make several conjectures upon it, but though several endeavour'd to seek out the reason, I believe there was not any that found it; so that they satisfied themselves in concluding that my small inclination to marry, was the only cause wherefore I did not listen to so advantageous a proposition.

This was my condition when the charming Athenais arriv'd at Constantinople with the Philosopher Leontin her Father, and I was in Pulcheria's Chamber when she was brought thither by Atticus. I confess, Sir, that I was surpris'd, and that my eyes were dazzled at the sight of that celebrated Beauty; and certainly more it had been, but that I was otherwise prepossess'd before I met with her, and that I could not fix my eyes upon any other object, than that to which they were already engag'd: I was also present at the converse of those two most excellent persons; and I found no less cause to admire the Wisdom, Eloquence and Behaviour of Athenais, than her Beauty. The Princess who was strangely taken with her, made her a thousand Caresses, whereby she manifested that affection for her, which has since produc'd those effects so advantageous on her behalf; but after she was departed, carrying the Idea of her virtues in her mind, she talk'd of nothing but of her all the day after, and directing her speech particularly to me, she demanded of me in a very passionate manner, what I thought of the Wit and Beauty of the Greek, Athenais. I coldly made answer, that truly she was very beautiful, and had a good wit; but the Princess not being satisfied with my reply: How comes it to pass, Martian, said she, that you give me no better answer, and that you do not extol the beauty which you have seen above all that ever you yet saw, or could imagine in this world? I did not believe, (said I, as coldly as before) that I did her any injustice, in saying she had a great deal of Beauty and wit; but had I known what I ought to have said to please you, I had express'd my self in another manner. Pulcheria beheld me very seriously, and for a good while without speaking; but at length resuming her discourse with a smile, I am deceiv'd, said she, if your slighting Saturninus's Daughter, and the little notice you take of Athenais's Beauty, do not proceed from one and the same cause; and I believe, that should I tell you, you are in love, I should speak truth. I had not confidence to keep my self from blushing, at these words which I so little dream'd of, and therefore holding my hand before my face for some time to hide the alteration of my colour. That which you tell me, Madam, is not impossible, said I, for he that has a heart and eyes, is not exempted from love. Had I thought, replied the Princess, that I had spoken so true as your behaviour now makes me judge, I had not perhaps utter'd my mind with so little caution: but however it be, if you are in love, you keep it very secret, since we that see you

every day did no way suspect it. I can be in places, said I, where I am not obliged to retain a secret: and I can be in others where I can keep a secret more charily than my life. I make no question, said the Princess, but that you would discharge your self exactly of such a trust, and I have that good opinion of you, that you have not plac'd your love upon a mean object. But I should have a better if I thought you did not love, for there are so few women, worthy the affection of men of merit, that I should esteem you much more, had you not yet found one that could merit yours. It was not for that only reason, that I have liv'd till now without loving: for though the wonderful advantages which you have above all the rest of your sex, cause you to speak slightly of others; there are few that deserve not services, of greater value than those of Martian. I can hardly believe you to speak sincerely, said she, since you have so slighted Athenais, at least since you have spoke so faintly of her: for if I were a man and were to love, I would never love any other than Athenais. That fair Grecian is more happy, said I, in having so well gained your affections, where by you make the condition of her good fortune, more envied than for all her advantages of wit and beauty. If they have not appeared to you as well as me, replied the Princess, I shall return to my former opinion, having no reason to believe otherwise, but that you are in love. If that misfortune be befall'n me (said I changing colour withal) I am surely to be pityed: and as I am sensible that I shall never love, but where there is an infinite merit; I am in great danger of being miserable as long as I live. But Martian, (said she beholding me with a smile) do you find in your self a disposition to love, as well as others are said to do? Madam, I replied, do you not remember that you did me the Honour once to tell me, that you your self could love tenderly. There is a great difference, replied the Princess, between the tenderness that I meant, and the passion which we now speak of, which as I look upon as a weakness, I could wish you were not guilty of it: and as I have no more inclination to marry than you have shewn, so I was mightily pleas'd to hear you refuse Marriage. "As for me, said I with a sigh, 'tis not material whether I have any inclination to marry or no: But for you Madam there is not the same reason, and for many weighty considerations, there is a necessity that you should change your opinion. I cannot tell (said the Princess with a careless look) whether you believe as you say, but I dare presume that you are not so well resolv'd as to wager, that you will not be married sooner than I. "I dare not be so bold as to lay any wagers with you, said I, but if you will give me lieve, I will boldly promise you what you have done me the honour to propose, and I engage my self so solemnly from this very moment, that I will not break that promise, though with a wife they should offer me the Empire. "That's too much, said the Princess, and for such an advantage I would release you of your promise: but though I am not bound to make you the same, and perhaps you neither require it of me. "I do not think I should run any hazard, should I engage the same thing to you, and you will find it may be, that I shall keep my word as well as your self.

We had had a farther discourse, had not the Emperour entred the Chamber, when she began to entertain him with the wonders that she saw in the beauty of Athenais. She told him nothing but the truth, and she made him understand it so effectually by her discourse; that the young Prince had a very vehement desire to be inform'd by his eyes, and to see whether the Princess had not flattered her in the Relation. He satisfied himself the same day, he saw Athenais, he found her more charming than the Princess had represented her, and became desperately in Love with her: so that from this time forward he laid that design, so fatal to your repose, and created you such a Mischiefe, of which we have little hope that you should ever be truly forgetful. About that time you arrived at Constantinople, to whom I was sent before hand with the Complements of the Court. You know Sir how I endeavour'd to acquit my self, and as I at the first sight conceived a very great respect, for you, you were not behind hand, in honouring me with particular marks of your favour. You remain'd in our Court above a Month, before you understood any thing of what had been discovered concerning Athenais, who at that time renounced the worship of your Gods, to serve the Deity whom we adore, and changed her name from Athenais to that of Eudoxia, which name the Emperour gave her out of the respect which he bare to the name of the Empress his Mother. But in a short while after you understood all: you saw the fair Eudoxia, you told your mind both to her and to the Emperour, and you left us the day preceding the solemnity of the Marriage. All our Court that was highly honoured with your stay therein, lamented your departure, as also did the Emperour who was much afflicted for your misfortune: so that his joy for the possession of what he loved, was not a little curb'd by his grief. But in truth there was no person more concern'd therein than my self: nor was there any so apprehensive of your absence, and the little satisfaction you would receive in your Travels. As you were the best friend that I had in the Court of Theodosius, (replied Valereus, in answer to Martian's civility) I could not believe but that you were the most concern'd concern'd in my misfortune, and such a one it was at that time, that I deserv'd far more pity than they imagin'd. I cannot tell whether my present condition be better, but besides the small perplexity that remains for having lost a happiness to which I might have so easily attain'd, as it happen'd to me in my love for Athenais, I do not find any of my Rivals so free to take my place, and by their own good fortune to render me as miserable, as I was when I parted from Constantinople.

This great Marriage, said Martian pursuing his discourse, was solemnized with a Pomp, answerable to the dignity and magnificence of the Emperour: And the admirable Eudoxia appearing pulchrically both to the Court and people, was look'd upon like a glittering Star, when first discovered in our Hemisphere, displaying her beams with so much lustre, that the choice of the Emperour was confirm'd by the general applause: So that there were few persons, that did not affirm and openly maintain, that the fair Empress did more than deserve, the high fortune to which she was rais'd. They were the more confirm'd in their opinion, and all the Court acknowledged with delight and admiration, that it was not for beauty, for her great wit or her sublime knowledge, that the young Empress was so famous, but for her virtue, of which she gave such publick manifestations, that it appeared far transcending her beauty, or any other of her excellent endowments. Some days were spent in diversions and publick Spectacles, wherein was to be seen all that our Ancestors had invented of rarity in their Amphitheatres, unless the Duels of the Gladiators which our Emperour would never suffer, following the good example of the Emperour Honorius his Uncle, who quite put them down at Rome, as is well known to all the world. Upon one of these days and at one of these spectacles, or publick shows it was, that there befel me an accident too considerable to be forgotten, the cause whereof was sufficiently known to have come to your ears: for I make no question Sir, but you have heard of the accident that happened in the Amphitheatre at Constantinople, by the burning of one of the Machines, which set the whole Amphitheatre on fire, in which the Emperour and a great part of the Court had like to have been lost. For according to the common report and relation thereof, you cannot but have understood that the Emperour, the Empress, the Princess Pulcheria, and all the most considerable persons of the Court, being pleas'd to grace with their presence, the publick solemnities, that lasted two Months for joy of the Marriage, the fire took in one of the Machines, that represented the Chariot of the Sun, which from thence lighting upon others, that were of a very combustible matter, not only consum'd the whole Theatre, but from the stage taking hold of the scaffolds, ran with that fury and violence where the Emperour sat, that in a moment he was in one of the greatest dangers, that ever he was expos'd to in his life. There was all the diligence imaginable us'd to quench it, and the people opened all the Doors and Windows to save themselves; but neither could the fire be put out, neither could they who were farthest off from the doors, hardly shift for themselves, by reason of the crowd that stopp'd them up, and who knowing nothing so terrible, as that death which they saw before their eyes, minded neither the threats nor blows of the Emperour's Guards; but crowding for their lives made it impossible; to open any passage through them. The affrighted Emperour together with his incomparable Spouse, the less concern'd of the two, and Pulcheria, who in that confusion behav'd her self with an admirable courage, had shift'd from their own scaffold to those that were nearest to the Doors, but notwithstanding all the endeavours of his Guards, it was impossible to get out, while the fire and smok increased in such a manner, that he was really in very great peril. We had all our share, and I was expos'd among the rest: But through the passion that reigned in my soul, I took little care for my self, willingly neglecting my own safety to preserve Pulcheria. 'Twas not enough to think of it, it behov'd me to take pains, to which purpose getting together, about a dozen or fifteen of the Guards; the most lusty and resolute I could pick out, I went my self foremost: and with much ado and no small labour, I at length cleared one of the doors and placed them there, and calling others, by the help of their Officers who gave me all their assistance; I drew them out into two Files, and in despite of all people's cries and all their crowding, I made a passage directly from the door, to the place where the Emperour was with the Princesses: but knowing that the Souldiers could not long resist the violence of the press, I ran with all the speed I could to that part; where I saw the Princess Pulcheria: and although the generous Princess, seeing me come with open arms to carry her from off the Scaffold, yet preferring the Emperour's life before her own, cry'd to me several times, Martian have a care of the Emperour, and perswaded me to succour him first, I gave no heed to her words, but out of my love forgetting perhaps my duty, I took her in my Arms, and carried her off through the lane of the Guards, which I had made to the very door, which they could no longer keep: As there were several persons that followed my example, the Emperour and the Empress received the same assistance, either from the most affectionate, or most fortunate of their own Attendants. But before they were out of danger, Pulcheria was safe; so that after I saw her secure, as I was returning to have carried them off, I met them coming forth by the way which I had opened. When they were gone, the Guards left the Gate free for the people, who tumbled out headlong: but in regard a great part of the multitude was got out before, and that the fire only destroyed the combustible matter, and that the arched Roof hindered the Building from falling, there were very few that miscarried, either by the Smoak, or in the Fire.

In the mean while, as I told you, Sir, I had carried Pulcheria in my Arms, and notwithstanding the dread I was in for her safety, I could not but be sensible of a real pleasure, that proceeded from the happiness of my employment, far greater than I can express. For through the felicity which I enjoyed to hold that in my Arms which I always carried in my heart, and which I could never hope for again, but by some such accident, I had prolong'd my good fortune to the utmost of my ability. Yet while it lasted, had the trouble she was in permitted her, I am confident she might have observ'd the difference between being in the Arms of a person that ador'd her, and one that had been engag'd to her relief, only upon the score of Duty. She ran so hastily to the Emperour and the Empress as soon as she saw them come forth, that she had no time to give me thanks for the service I had done her; but she let me understand by her looks, that she was not insensible of it, and that the general disorder did not hinder her from taking notice of the kindness which she had receiv'd. The first care of the Emperour, after he was out of danger, as also of the Empress, and of Pulcheria, was to send help to those who had not yet escap'd it; and when they had given all sufficient orders for that purpose, they return'd to the Palace, where, as well as in all the Temples, the Emperour commanded that publick thanks should be return'd to Heaven, for his own, and for the safety of all those that had been expos'd to the same peril. Immediately all the Court came to visit the Emperour, and as he had not forgot what I had done in that disorder, which had depriv'd of their reason and senses all those that had the charge of his person; and for that he knew also that it was I that had opened the way, though I gave my first assistance to Pulcheria, the remembrance of that service in an excellent disposition, and in an apprehensive judgment, wrought more effectually upon his gratitude, than the preferring his Sister before him, upon his displeasure, which perhaps in another person had produc'd a contrary effect. So that when he saw me among the rest, beholding me with a look full of mildness and courtesie, and of all the marks of a true acknowledgment; It is to you, Martian, said he, to whom next to Heaven we are oblig'd for our safety, and as there are some brave persons in every place, it was by your courage and vigorous activity that we had a way opened to escape so threatening a danger. It is very true, (added the fair Eudoxia) that without the assistance which he gave us, we had been in great jeopardy, and that a service of so great importance is most worthy all acknowledgment. Notwithstanding his great courage, (said Pulcheria, with an intention to excuse the fault which the Emperour might have accused me of) he confess'd to me that the danger wherein we were, put him into an amazement; and that by reason of that amazement he was mistaken in not assisting first those persons whom he ought to have succoured before me. This discourse of the Princess, instead of doing me a kindness, as she intended, plung'd me into a great perplexity; for as on the one side I was unwilling it should be known, that it was by any mistake that I first assisted the Princess before the Emperour, believing it beneath my courage, and unworthy of my love; on the other side methought it was very hard, if not very imprudent, to declare out of my own mouth, that the preferment of my assistance, so notoriously known, was real, which made me study how to save my self between these two extremes; nor was it an easie thing to find the way, when the Emperour observing my disturbance, was willing to assist me out of his own goodness, and preventing the bad Apology that I was meditating, with a look conformable to his words; Martian, said he, take no care to justify an action that needs no justification: you know well that the safety of my Sister was dearer to me than my own, and that you should serve me better in serving Pulcheria, than Theodosius: you must know also that I have look'd upon your intentions without envy; and that I am not less sensible of the good you have done my Sister, than if you had done it to my self.

This pass'd in the Emperour's Apartment; but being afterwards in the Princess's Lodgings, she took me aside; and after she had testified her acknowledgment in the most obliging expressions in the world, and with offers, which, considering the sway she bore, had found a more joyful acceptance in any other heart than mine, she put me upon the same discourse that had given me so much trouble before the Emperour, and press'd me to tell her whether it was not by mistake that I ran to her relief, sooner than to succour the Emperour; I stood, a good while without making any answer; but when I saw my self constrain'd, "Madam, said I, you put me once upon a necessity of making a discourse before the Emperour, "wherein I should have appeared rather a down-right man, than a good Courtier; and I "had begun it, if his goodness had not spar'd me the trouble which I should have found "in it. It had been a difficult thing for me to have told him that it was by mistake that I "address'd my self first to your aid, out of the reluctancy I have to tell an untruth: and "it would be a vain thing for me to tell you so, since you know too well, Madam, that "I could not fail by a mistake, seeing that you gave me notice sufficient, by putting me "in mind of the Emperour. "By what I understand, (said she, smiling) you were not so "much perplex'd, as I would have perswaded the Emperour in your excuse. But it is "that for which you have less reason, for I cannot apprehend why you should be more care- "ful of Pulcheria, than Theodosius. "That is apparent enough, (said I, making a ready "answer) for all that can be said of it, is, that the life of Pulcheria was dearer to me than "the Emperour's, though in truth the Emperour's life is dearer to me than my own. The Princess blush'd at those words; however looking upon me with a very serious coun- tenance, she did not seem to be any way displeas'd with them: "I shall be always glad, "said she, to have so worthy a Friend as Martian; and as I cannot have any other but such "as are real to the service of the Emperour, I am apt to think that I do him service in "preserving them and esteeming them as I do. However, you will please me better, not "to do at another time as you have done to-day. And if the Emperour have the first place "in your affection, I shall be contented with the second. "I cannot tell, Madam, (said I "in a most passionate manner) whether I have been so unfortunate to displease you in what I "have done to-day: but if to please you, I must prefer any person in the world before the "Princess Pulcheria, I fear I shall never please you as long as I live. You see, Madam, that "the Emperour has approv'd my Actions, and my Intentions. Since therefore he pro- "fesses those Services to be done to him, which are done for his Sister, permit me to pre- "serve my first Services for the Princess, and to pay them till I die. "And what know you, "(said the Princess, laughing) whether I may prove always faithful, whether or no my am- "bition may not make me forget my Duty, and whether I may not one day abuse the good "will which you have manifested for me, by putting you upon trials, which so nice a virtue "as yours cannot undergo, "That is a danger, said I, to which I am not likely to be ex- "pos'd, nor is it from you, Madam, that virtue can have any thing to fear: but should a- "ny such thing happen, I will never separate my self from your interest: and although hi- "thereto perhaps I never had a thought contrary to my Duty; I will never acknowledge any "one more powerful over me, than that of obeying you. I would not desire it of you, "(replied the Princess very seriously) and therefore to make use of your good intentions as "becomes me, I shall endeavour to employ them for the good of the Empire, for your "honour, and the satisfaction I shall find in acknowledging them as I ought. Concluding these words with a look full of Majesty, she return'd toward the company, and spoke no more to me in particular, but as to other persons that were in the Room. But the follow- ing days, methought she carried her self toward me with more reserv'dness, than she was wont to do; that she did not take me particularly aside; that she gave me fewer opportuni- ties to explain my self, though her countenance toward me was the same, and that she still procured for me all benefits and advantages from the Emperour: she also had the goodness to bestow considerable employments upon those that were related to me either in blood or friendship.

And about that time the King of the Vandals, that famous Gonderic whose Renown is so far spread, being come upon our Coasts with a potent Navy, and having put to flight cer- tain Ships that oppos'd him; I had the command of those Forces which were design'd a- gainst him, though probably there were persons near the Emperour, that for their years and their ability, were far more deserving than my self. I put to Sea with a very power- ful Navy, I went to seek out the King of the Vandals, who was cruising about the Islands of Archipelagus. And fortune was so favourable to me, that in two or three Engagements I beat and vanquish'd the Lieutenants of Gonderic, to their considerable loss of men and Vessels. At length coming to the main Engagement where Gonderic commanded in per- son, the dispute was very bloody, and if the victory were not entirely ours, yet the success was so little favourable to the Vandals, that they were forced to quit their design upon the Eastern Empire, and to turn their Arms against Spain, whence they had been expell'd by the great Constantine some time before. And because I had command from the Emperour to treat in friendly manner with Gonderic, if he desired it, about certain propositions which he had made. The King of the Vandals and my self put into a certain Island, where we had several Confe- rences, rences, wherein I found that it was not without reason that fame had numbered that Prince among the most renowned of the Age, as being inferiour to few for his noble Aspect, his Valour, his Wit, and many other Royal Endowments. But whatever esteem I had truly for him, my kindness inclin'd more strongly toward Prince Thrasimond his Brother, a young Prince, in his person admirably compos'd, brave and valiant as the God of War, and to be belov'd for all sorts of Noble Qualities. By my good fortune he easily took an affection for me: and because I could not agree upon certain Articles with the King of the Vandals, wherein there was something of difficulty, he consented that Prince Thrasimond should go to Constantinople, upon my faith and promise given that he should be there kindly received by the Emperour; thereupon the King allowing his Brother a Royal and Magnificent Train, ordered him to accompany me, while he steer'd his course for Spain. Thrasimond undertook this Journey very willingly, giving me to understand from day to day that he thought me worthy of his friendship by the proofs that he gave me thereof; and I was so apprehensive of them, and pleas'd with the knowledge which I daily receiv'd of his Virtue and admirable Endowments, that I return'd him all the affection that I could serve him withal, so that we easily entred into a strict amity, which made us live in an entire confidence one of another, and so link'd me to his interests, that I expos'd my self to several apparent inconveniences, as you shall see in the pursuit of my Story, for his sake. I would not enlarge my self upon the particulars of that War against the Vandals, so that I have only hinted them to you in a few words, what you ought not to be ignorant of for your better understanding those things which yet remain for you to know, not doubting but that I have been sufficiently tedious, and not judging it pertinent to the continuance of my Story to tell you any more.

You need not question, (then said Varanex to Martian) but that the report thereof has come to my ears; and that I have been informed of all those Transactions, and of your success both against the Lieutenants of Gonderic, and against himself in person. Renown has publish'd them in places where I was, and for the friendship that was between us, during my stay in the Court of Constantinople, I interested my self therein, as much as that passion which was then predominant in my heart would give me lieve. I am sensible, said Martian, how much I am indebted to that effect of your goodness; and to discharge my self of what I have undertaken, I shall rehearse to you things more worthy of your attention than what you have already heard, whereby you will understand the confidence I have in your promise, and my obedience to your commands.

The End of the First Book of the Seventh Part.

PHARAMOND.

BOOK II.

AT my return to Constantinople, I was received by the Emperour and the Princes, as one that brought along with me the Renown of many signal Victories. And through their goodnes they look'd upon the little which I had done, as if they had been the greatest Services that could have been performed for the Empire. The young Emperour testified to me in the most obliging language in the world, how much he was satisfisd in the management of the War and Negotiation; and gave me to understand by the good opinion he had of me, that there were few Employments or Dignities to which I might not aspire. The charming Empress, who studied all things that might please the Emperour, honoured me with many marks of her esteem; and Pulcheria, whose looks and thoughts I much more consulted, gave me to apprehend that I had lost nothing in her affection by my absence, and that she was not a little joyful for the good success of my Voyage. In the Evening she caus'd me to give her a long relation thereof in her own Apartment; and I inform'd her of all the most important particulars, except what I had suffered in my heart for her self, during my absence: and when I had satisfisd her in all that she desired of me, opening her lips with an extraordinary kindness and familiarity, You see, Martian, said she, that I have kept the promise that I have made you some time since, and that I employ your loyal intentions for your own honour, and the good of the Empire. In whatever you shall employ them, (I replied very readily) you shall find them always prepared to obey you, nor shall I ever question the end for which you make use of them. By what I see, (replied the Princess, smiling) your voyage has not chang'd your resolution. No, Madam, replied I, nor shall it ever change, so long as I live. Such obliging intentions of a person of your merit, are too considerable, added the Princess, that any alteration thereof should be desired: and as I am very well pleas'd that you should preserve them, I will assure you that I have no disposition to lose those which I have had hitherto, of prizing you according to the merit of your Virtue, and as you oblige me by your affection.

She stay'd not for an answer of these words, but concluding them; she went to meet the Emperess, whom she saw entering the Room. The charming Eudoxia, for she was no more call'd Athenais, kept an admirable correspondence of friendship with her; and as she was not ignorant, that she had a great power over the Emperour her Husband, and that it was chiefly to her that she owed the high honour which she enjoyed, she gave her that respect that the Princess was unwilling to take from the wife of her Brother and Emperour. So that the wife Pulcheria, far from remembering in what condition she had seen her, as the Daughter of Leontin, entertain'd her, as we plainly saw, with the same respect, as if she had been descended from the most ancient of our Emperours. They seem'd in all things to have but one heart and one will. But the fair Empress loving altogether a quiet life, took no cognisance of the affairs of the Empire, though Pulcheria understanding her miraculous wit, and believing her capable of all things, would sometimes oblige her to it. So that at those hours wherein she was not either with Pulcheria, or the Emperour, she would retire to the Princesses Eudoxia and Maria, and with them spend whole days in her Devotions. The Emperour, who was no less addicted to pious exercises than she, often went with her; and when the Princess had any leisure time, she willingly bore them company. Together with Religion toward Heaven, which was, and still is the best observed in our Court of any other that ever was in the world, all other virtues are amply exercis'd even in things of the smallest importance: and the least Licentiousness opposite to the fear of Heaven, and contradictory to good manners, which generally creeps into the Courts of Princes, is banished from thence with so much zeal, that it is not without reason that our Court is called the Holy Court, and a Court altogether celestial. Justice is there administered in those things, wherein the Emperour is no way concern'd even to admiration: nor is the course hindered by unjust favour, for Princes taking no care to prevent that inconvenience, pardon easily those injuries which they themselves have not received: and only mind a positive swerving from the Law. But in all crimes, where the offence particularly concerns the Emperour, which he can pardon without injury to others; he shews a clemency rather blameable for its excess, had it not hitherto produced good effects: so that at one time when he had received so great an injury, that the criminals were by the Judges unanimously condemn'd to death; the Emperour after he had interpos'd his Authority to save them, speaking to them who advis'd him to suffer execution; Would to God, said he, I could restore the dead to life. Here Sir I tell you those things of which you have seen the beginnings: and which I could not leave out speaking of Pulcheria, because that all the world gives her the praise, of having very much contributed to the religious manners of the Emperour, and of having established in his Court, that most excellent government so admired by all the world. But to make an end of this digression, and to follow my discourse, I must tell you Sir that the next day that we arriv'd, Prince Thrasimond as he had been ordered, went to pay his duty to the Emperour, as also to the Empress and the Princess. He was as well received as he could possibly desire, for by the Character which I had given him both to the Emperour and the Princess, I had easily prevailed with them, to give him all that was due to his Birth and Merit.

They lodg'd him in the Palace, and in all things treated him as the Son and Brother of a great King: but if at first he were only looked upon for his Birth, for the dignity of his Brother and his Ancestors, he was afterwards admired for the advantages of his person, for his resplendent merit that shone through all the Court, and made all the people cast their eyes upon him, not as a barbarous Prince or at least born among Barbarians, but as a Prince enriched with all those noble endowments, that render a man accomplished. His person as I told you is rarely well proportion'd, his courage great beyond the common rate, his wit pleasant, and all his inclinations virtuous: As the King his Brother had magnificently furnished him, and as he was naturally of a free and generous nature, he spared for no cost: spending at the same rate as if he had been heir to a Crown. His Train was stately and magnificent, and as he was very nimble, and experienced in all exercises of the body, and in all sorts of pastime, as riding, juggling, and such other sports as the Emperour loved; he appeared every where, with so much magnificence and with such a grace, that all the world was charm'd and admir'd, that among the Vandals should be found such a person, as had been hardly seen among the Greeks or Romans. Nor was his converse less delightful: For besides that he was very ready, in expressing himself neatly and eloquently; he spoke many languages, particularly the Greek and Latine, as if he had been bred up either at Rome or Athens. More than one Lady of our Court by what I understood, felt the effects of his merit: and there were few persons that did not envy the general advantages of his most excellent parts. As I was tyed to him by a sincere and faithful friendship, we were alway together: and though he were younger than I by five or six years, for he had not seen above two or three and twenty years at most, I refused him no courtship that he desired, being sufficiently enclined thereto by my own disposition.

Among the rest I consented to one request of his very willingly; for upon a day that the Emperour solemnized with several plays and shows, together with Horse races in the Hypodrome, a place as you know appointed for those kind of sports, being a festival celebrated in honour of the Empress, who precisely on that day, was a Twelve-month arriv'd at Constantinople, which day as it was very grateful to the memory of Theodosius, he resolv'd to observe it annually; he was sitting upon a scaffold in the great Piazza between the Empress and the Princess, where with the whole Court he beheld some that were casting Javelins, according to the custom of our Ancestors, others breaking Lances as was usual among the young Knights, when Thrasimond and my self entred, with several Trumpets sounding before us, magnificently arm'd, and mounted upon the fairest Horses in the world. It was not our purpose, to make our selves suddenly known: but because he did not see us among the rest of the spectators, where he knew we would not be missing, as well as by other marks which made us observable, we were presently discovered, so that we took no farther care to disguise our selves. After the Trumpets had sounded several times at our Entry, we proclaimed our design, which was in honour of certain Ladies, against all Knights that would venture, to present themselves within the Lists. As it was a thing commonly practised, there was no person that made any wonder at it: But while those Knights that were upon the place were making ready, and that others were gone forth to fit themselves, the Emperour call'd us to his Scaffold, and caus'd us to put up the Viscers of our Helmets, then did he and all the Court admire Thrasimond's noble aspect, and his becoming grace in sitting his Horse. In conclusion, after he had view'd our Arms, and our Equipage, and seen that every thing was sufficiently magnificent, I must confess, said the Emperour, that you are a pair of Knights, that for deportment and equipage suitable to your design, are not to be easily match'd: But you must not deny, but that you have committed the greatest error in the world, since it was never known that ever any Knight enter'd the Lists for the honour of Ladies without any impresse, or without some favour, and mark of particular affection for some Lady who had been the original cause of the enterprise. “Martian, (said Thrasimond, undertaking the answer) I have heard say, that he never had but a general affection, without any particular design: but for me, who perhaps have not so much power over my self, in another place I might probably have had some Lady that would have honoured me with her favour, upon such an occasion as this, and would have own'd me for her Champion; but in such a Court as this, being a stranger, or rather a Barbarian, whose favour can I demand, or by whom can I expect to be own'd? Thereupon the Emperour turning himself to the Empress who sat next him, whisper'd something to her in her ear, which made her smile; and when she apprehended his meaning, turning to the Prince of the Vandals with a charming Grace; It becomes us not, said she, to suffer the disgrace that you would put upon us this day; nor shall it be for want of a favour that you do not find a Lady that shall own you for her Champion. And concluding these words, she pull'd from off her wrist a Bracelet of precious Stones, and gave it him, which the young Prince receiv'd from her fair hands, bowing himself down to the Pommel of his Saddle, with the greatest submission imaginable, and seem'd to be so transported at the receipt of so high a favour, that he could not a good while find language to express his thanks: yet at length he perform'd it with such a deportment as shew'd him to be no Vandal; and before he tied on the Bracelet, kissing it with all due respect, For such an Honour, said he with a loud voice, as I have this day received, I will not only break a Lance, but I will fight the whole world: and I assure my self, that there are more persons that will envy this day's honour of the Champion of the Empress, than all the fortune of a Roman Emperour. I my self tied on the Bracelet, as being interested in his joy: and in performing that office, And must I, said I aloud, be unhappy in my own Country, where strangers are so courteously treated? And must I behold like a disown'd Knight the honour of my companion? The Princess Pulcheria presently look'd upon me with a smile, and believing there could be no bad interpretation made of what she did, either by the Emperour, or the Court, and that she was in a condition to do things more extraordinary, without running the hazard of being to be blam'd, she took a Rose of Diamonds from her head, and presenting it to me with a careless, yet pleasing behaviour, No, Martian, said she, you shall not be a disown'd Champion to day; and though your honour be not equal to your companion's, yet you shall be Pulcheria's Champion. I cannot easily express the joy that surpris'd me for a happiness so little expected; and as the Honour which I received, which coming from her was too great for me, was dearer to me for the love I bore the Princess, than for any other consideration: I had hardly power enough to receive it with moderation, and from manifesting those signs of a transportation which might have discovered the cause more than I intended; I drew back therefore as soon as I could, and bowing down to the Saddle Bow, It is in your power, Princess, said I, to do for us what you please, and as no power under Heaven could advance any man to a Glory parallel to mine, it shall be my care to endeavour that it be not unworthily bestowed.

After these words, Thrasimond and I enter'd the Lists, where we performed our Duty so well, that the two great Princesses had no reason to repent the Honour they had done us; and where fortune was so favourable to us, that of all the Knights that ran against us, there were few that kept their Saddles, and none that ran without some disadvantage. The Emperour, who is a great lover of that exercise, and who would use it oftener than he does, did they not persuade him from it, upon considerations of the danger which he might fall into, and the several disasters that attend it, seeing with what a grace and courage Thrasimond behav'd himself, was stirr'd up with a kind of emulation against a Prince of an age not much different from his, which made him have a great desire to break a Lance with him: to which purpose, while we were at some distance from the place, and otherwise busied, retiring privately from his Seat, and ordering his Arms to be brought him into a Chamber

Chamber not far distant from the Scaffold, and a Horse to be ready at one of the doors where he might mount without being seen by any of the Spectators, in a short while after he enter'd the Lists magnificently arm'd, and bravely mounted, and when he had done what he saw the other Champions do, he plac'd himself just opposite to Thrasimond with an intention to run against him: but he was hardly approach'd the Barriers, when it thought that by certain signs I should know him; and at the same time casting my eyes toward his Seat, and not seeing him there, only Pulcheria next to the Emperess, who gave me a sign with her hand, I made no more question but that it was he; whereupon turning my Horse as it had been only to make him fetch some curvets, I rode up to Thrasimond, and gave him notice that it was the Emperour that was to run against him: Thrasimond seem'd not to take any notice of what he was told, but being at the starting place of the Course, he made toward the Emperour upon the Signal given by the Trumpets, but before he came near him he let his Lance fall, and received the Shock of the Emperour's Lance upon his Shield: he was so near the Emperour at that time, that the Emperour had not leisure to observe what pass'd, so that he broke his Lance upon the Prince's Shield in a thousand pieces, though without moving him any more than a Rock. Thus they finish'd their Course, when the Emperour seeing what Thrasimond had done, and knowing that it was in vain to conceal himself from a person who had manifested by that very action, that he was known already to him, came toward him, and accosting him with a frank and pleasing behaviour. How, Prince, said he, did you not think us worthy one blow of a Lance, or did you think to dishonour your Arms in running against us. I laid them at your feet, said the Prince, out of that respect which does not permit me to make use of them against you. But you must give me leave to tell you, Sir, that all that we owe you, could not perhaps have made us dissent with your own self for the Bracelet of the Emperess, nor could you have a design to render me unworthy the honour which you had procur'd me, without some kind of cruelty. You have defended it, said the Emperour, against more worthy Champions than my self, only I was willing to make it more entire, by putting the Emperour among the number of those whom you had vanquish'd. Having spoken these words, they drew near the Stands; and we believing that with that course it became us to conclude the Triumphs of the day, were unwilling to proceed any farther. So that after we had heard our selves sufficiently prais'd by the Emperess and Pulcheria, who were no way dissatisfied in the Honour which we had done them, we quitted the place and went to disarm our selves.

That Evening there was a magnificent Ball in the Emperesses Apartment, and all the Ladies of our Court (among which you your self have seen many that deserv'd your observation, had not your affection for Athenia (but your eyes against all other objects) augmented there their several Beauties, with the lustre of their Ornaments and Attire. The Emperess, at the Emperour's desire, appeared there with all her charms; and the Princess Pulcheria, who was seldom present at such meetings, having her thoughts otherwise employ'd, did not refuse to be there also out of her love to the Emperess, and had accoutred her self much more sumptuously than she was accustomed to do: I accompanied Thrasimond thither, and as we omitted nothing in our Habits which we had also trimm'd over and above with those inestimable Ornaments that we had received that day, I was not the meanest among the rest; and as for Thrasimond, he appeared in the greatest Gallantry in the world, so that he drew upon him the eyes of all the whole assembly. Now for that by reason of what we had already perform'd, we were look'd upon as those who had the greatest share in the Solemnity of that day, all eyes were upon us more than they would have been at any other time, and every one courted us with applauses, testifying their gladness for our good success in that days enterprize. The Emperour in praising us, shew'd others the way; and after he had spoken several things aloud to our advantage, there was not any person throughout the whole meeting, who was not eager to testify the respect they had of his good opinion. When it was time to dance, Thrasimond took his place at the feet of the Emperess, very bravely telling her, that since she had that day chose him to be her Champion, he was so to continue all that day, and that no person was to dispute it. Eudoxia kindly entertained his discourse, and very civilly, and with all the marks of her esteem and consideration of his merit, return'd him an answer. So that he danced several times with her, and that admirably well, and did all things with such a becoming Grace, that to the shame of all our Knights, he carried away the honour from them all, both in the Tournament, and in the Ball. For my own part, when I saw that, I left them to dance who had more inclination to it than I had; I found my self more happy to stand behind the Princess's chair, and talk to her over her Shoulder, whereby I had the good hap to entertain my self with full liberty, and without being over-heard by any other persons. You may well imagine,

Sir, that I was not wanting to return my thanks, and that with all the respect and submission that I was able to express, for that inestimable favour with which she had honoured me, and to make ample protestation of my resolutions to render my self worthy of her kindness by a fidelity which she should find far surpassing what she could expect from any other Subject of the Emperour. And I am to add, that she not only listened to those returns of my acknowledgment, and the protestations which I made, with a great deal of tenderness; but that after she had let me say all that I had to say, turning toward me with a charming eye, Martian, said she, this is not the first time that you may have perceiv'd the value which I have for you; and I am to testify the esteem which I have for your virtue by more important and more remarkable testimonies than I have given you to day. “But, Madam, (said I with a transportation of mind, which somewhat disturb'd my senses) do you not fear that so great a happiness may blind my reason; and have not men of prudence greater than mine been distracted, inasmuch as they have not known themselves in the midst of less favours than mine? Seeing that I find all your thoughts governed by the dictates of virtue, replied the Princess, I will never fear that good fortune can puff you up, or evil fortune depress you; for as well in the one as the other, I know you will still be Martian. “For adversity, said I, I dare affirm that I could bear it with a great deal of courage; and by experience I am quite contrary to the opinion of those who believe that the greatest trials of virtue appear in adversity; for I have seen many persons suffer their evil fortune with an egregious constancy, but I have seen as few use their good fortune with moderation, and preserve their virtue in a long and continued prosperity, which I dare not hope to do, not having those assistances which are necessary in a fortune too glorious and successful; and I cannot tell, though I should be always Martian, whether I should always bear it in my memory. Should you forget it, replied the Princess, smiling, you might perhaps find friends that would put you in mind of it. “I stood in need of those Friends this very day, said I, for I had much ado to remember that I was Martian, when I saw my self honoured with the glorious Title of Pulcheria's Champion. Those two names are no way incompatible, replied the Princess, for I had not own'd you for your merit, had I not thought you worthy of the Title. “If it were so, (said I, charm'd with the sweetness of her words) I may as well bear that Title to-morrow as to-day; nor do I know any reason to the contrary why I may not keep this glorious Title which I prefer before the Empire of the Universe, as long as I live. You need not question, replied the Princess, but upon the same occasion I shall prefer you before all others: but as to-morrow I have no need of a Champion, so neither will you have any need of an employment which you cannot exercise. Though she smil'd when she uttered these words, yet she spake with such a Majestick Seriousness, that she repress'd my boldness, and made me tremble for fear that I had spoken too much: and therefore casting my eyes upon the ground with some symptoms of bashfulness, I desire your pardon, said I, for having spoken too much; but you see the truth of what I have said, since my good fortune already begins to blind my reason, and disturb my senses. I spake these words after so passionate a manner, that the Princess had some reason to suspect the truth of what was in my heart. And perhaps the jealousy which she had thereof, made her change the subject of the discourse, bidding me to observe Thrasimond, who danc'd with the Empress with the greatest grace in the world.

Thrasimond and I kept company the next day, and many other days following, in which I observed a change in his looks, and his behaviour, from being naturally jovial and merry, he became serious and melancholy; and he began to love retirement, though till then he had us'd to be never out of company: however, he did not shun mine for a long time, and I had this privilege above the rest of his Friends which his merit had procured in our Court, that when he could not endure theirs, he would patiently brook mine. But at length, he would be absent many hours from me; and I had much ado to find him out in blind walks where he hid himself. Sometimes I took the liberty to expostulate the matter with him, to which, though he made me very kind answers, yet he gave me no satisfaction, but only cause to suspect that he had something in his mind that he kept secret from me as well as other persons. He would sigh very often, and his eyes were heavy and pensive; and at length his whole countenance was covered with those marks that love is accustomed to imprint. I made no question therefore that in a person of his years, frolick as he was, and capable of the most tender impressions, it was only love that caus'd this change. But though I knew that he frequently visited the Ladies of the Court, who either for their quality or desert, could expect to be visited by him; yet I never perceived that he had ever any particular affection, behaving himself with so much freedom toward all, that denoted the liberty of his mind. At length, the marks of what he suffer'd were so apparent, that his Friends could not forbear to speak to him, and being I had the greatest affection for him, and the most oblig'd to the testimonies of his friendship, I gave him to understand how really sensible I was of the evil, which he conceal'd from me as well as from others: and one day looking upon him with an eye that seem'd to upbraid him for his distrust, while he beheld me with a languishing countenance, Ab Prince, said I, I believe you have now no more love left for me: When I shall cease to love you no more, (answered he grasping one of my hands, in a most passionate manner) I can assure you I shall forbear to love my self: but when I am not able to remember my self, my friends may easily pardon me if I forget them. You can neither forget your self nor your friends, said I, but through some great misfortune, or by reason of some violent passion: and you cannot suffer either the one or the other, and keep it secret from me, without cruelly wounding that friendship, with which you have honoured me, and which I look upon as one of the greatest happinesses of my life. Your friendship is infinitely dear to me, said the Prince, and whatever happens to me I will never break it: But in truth at this time, I see no occasion to give you any proof thereof, nor do I feel any thing, but what may proceed from an ill temper of body, or some other distemper of little Importance.

You may well imagine Sir that such an answer, was not sufficient to satisfy me: However I was forced to be contented for that and many other days after, during which time he very obstinately conceal'd his thoughts, from my continual importunity, though he testified how much he was thereby, rather obliged than disquieted: and though he did not question that my zeal, proceeded from the real interest that I took in his concerns, and not out of curiosity. But one day having surpris'd him in his Closet, where he had shut himself in all alone, nor would open the door till he heard my voice, and seeing his eyes red, and his countenance troubled; I had no longer patience: but conjur'd him by the power of that friendship which he had assur'd me of, not to make me miserable, by concealing his misfortune from me, which if it were to come to the knowledge of men, might as well be made known to me as others, without being obliged to a trust: But if it were always to be conceal'd, would receive no small ease and consolation from the Counsel, and perhaps the assistance of a friend, who in honour and friendship, ought to be no less obliged than himself to preserve the secret. And at length I so far urg'd him, that he could no longer resist the force of my importunity, and thereupon beholding me with a sad look, And well my importunate friend, said he, will you be satisfied, when I shall have inform'd you by word of mouth, what my countenance and actions make you suspect: that it is love which makes me the most miserable of all men? As there are few other accidents, said I, which could reduce you to this condition, considering your quality and your courage; I made no question but that only love was to be accused for this change: But seeing that a person like your self may be much in love, yet not be very miserable, and that if the pleasures of love belong not to you, there are few persons that can expect them; pardon me if I lament not your condition, so much as perhaps you desire, unless you shew me more particular marks of your misfortune. Is it not, said he; a very great unhappiness to love without hope, and to love without daring to make it known to the person, whom he loves? There are few in the world, said I, to whom a merit like yours may not aspire, and fewer perhaps, whom the knowledge of your love would displease: But as it is most probable, that you are in love with some person of our Court, seeing that here it is that you seem to have lost your mirth and frankness of humour, will you not tell me, whether you sigh for Marcella, Tiberina or Paulina? For besides that they are the fairest in the Court, they are they whom you most visit. Ab Martian, said he, my condition would be far more different from what it is, if I suspected what I now suffer, for one of those Ladies whom you name: For though they are Ladies of great merit, there is nothing there to deter my hopes. But do not expect that I should tell you more, for I know well that instead of being my friend, you will be my foe, when you know the cause of my misery.

These words made me think he was in love with Pulcheria, whose averseness from marriage, being publickly known to all the world, I took to be the reason why he had so little hopes in his Amours. And though I had never discovered to him, what I had in my heart for her, the proneness to be jealous in such occasions, and easily to believe that what appears amiable to our eyes, is no less lovely in anothers; cast a fear into my heart. He might have seen the effect which it produced, had he observ'd my countenance: especially when with a stammering voice I demanded of him, whether it were not the Princess Pulcheria, that had engrossed his affection. His eyes were then fixed upon the ground, but slowly lifting them up at those words and looking upon me; Were I in love with Pulcheria, I make no question, said he, that I should have sufficient reason to despair, either for my want of merit, the condition of my fortune, or in regard of her own inclinations: However neither my discourse would be forbidden, nor my hopes would be so desperate as now they are, nor would my misery have been comparable, to what I am now fallen into. These words opened my eyes, and wondering at my self that I had so long studied to divine the truth; Ab Thrasimond (said I all in an instant) I enquire no farther for I know now too well, that it is the Empress that you are in love with. And now that that misfortune is befallen me, (said the Prince crossing his Arms upon his breast) what can you say more, but that I am a person to be pityed. Without doubt you are, replied I immediately, and surely I find my self very unfortunate, to see so dear a friend fallen into a misfortune, wherein I can give him no assistance. Cruel friend, said he very sadly, make not your Apology so soon, nor believe that I will desire your assistance, contrary to the affection and duty which you owe the Empress. 'Tis not that fear that afflicts me, replied I, for as you are full of virtue in this as well as in other things, I will pay you all the service that you can expect or desire: but though I should for the friendship which I have for you, forget all that I owe to the Emperour; I know that my good intentions will signifie little: and I so well understand the disposition of Eudoxia, the Severity of her virtue, and the love she bears to her Husband, that I must tell you more than once, that all the assistance that your friends, the most affectionate in the world can give; is only to advise you eternally to oppose your virtue to this passion, and to seek out means to cure your self, by all that your reason and your courage can arm you withal. I may find my cure in my death, (said he, beholding me with eyes bedewed in tears) but other remedies I shall seek in vain: I have already made war against my love so far, with all the considerations that you can lay before me, and with what I have set before mine eyes; that I too well feel its power, which I assure you will last as long as I live. I know my life will be miserable, but I know it will not long continue, nor can I end it more gloriously than in sacrificing it, to her celestial beauty and most infinite merit. I need not desire you to keep it secret, for such a request would be injurious to your virtue and our friendship: as it is not for me to make any progress in my love nor in my designs, you shall not hear me desire for the future, any thing that may put your duty upon a greater tryal than that: However I hope it will not hinder you from lamenting my condition, nor from affording me comfort in my misfortune. I should be very miserable, (said I, with a countenance that plainly shewed how sensibly I was afflicted) if I could do no more for you; and more than that with a Friend so virtuous as your self, I am not so cautious as to deny you the service which is due to you. In the mean time endeavour to conceal the cause of your distemper as much as in you lies: and consider that however the Emperour is full of goodness, and has a great confidence in the virtue of the Empress; yet I know that he is so nice in this particular, that had he the least suspicion of your love, it would be a difficult thing for you to stay long in this Court. We had a great deal of other discourse, and indeed it took up the rest of the day, wherein I did not omit any thing that I could imagine or study, for to divert him from this passion: but though he were of a courteous disposition, and that he heard me without any contradiction, and without making any other answer than with his sighs; the beauty of the Empress had made so deep an impression, that I saw it was impossible to deface it, and despair'd of doing any good with no small grief to my self. After that day as he conceal'd nothing from me, so I found his distemper to increase and grow more and more incurable: so that several who did not understand the cause, could not chuse but perceive it, by the marks that they observed which he could not conceal. In short, not only his humour became absolutely different from what it was, but also there appeared so great a change in his countenance, that if he would not attribute it to the indisposition of his body, he was necessarily to confess, that his mind was very much out of frame.

As he was very much beloved, so every body enquired the cause of his discontent, nor was the Emperour the last, who earnestly shewed himself interested therein. The Princess Pulcheria who esteem'd him for his merit, was diligently pressed him to know the cause of his grief, offering all that lay in her power for his satisfaction: and the Empress her self, ignorant of the mischief which she was the cause of, had desired to know more than once, and had put him many times to very hard shifts, what answer to make to so nice a question. One day we were together in the Princesses Chamber, and had been there a good while, when the Empress at length came in: She no sooner entred, but Thrasimond's colour changed in such a manner, that had I known nothing of his distemper before, I might then have easily apprehended it. It made me so much ashamed that I blush'd my self, and I was about to have spoken something to the Princess to have amused her, and to have hindred her from observing the countenance of Thrasimond. But I thought of it too late, so that she discern'd that great change, and eagerly pressed him to tell her what he ail'd. Thrasimond seeing he could not hide that, which was plain to the eyes of all the world, told the Princess that he had been taken, with a very great pain in his heart, and fearing to discover more if he there made any longer stay, he took his leave of the Princess and retired: But the Empress

Empress who perceived him, turning toward him and looking upon him with eyes, that made new wounds in the bottom of his heart; "How Thrasimond, said she, do you flee from me too, as they say you flee from all the world. The Prince was stopp'd by his respect, since she had began to speak to him, and returning in despite of himself, to the place from whence he could not depart, without rudeness and incivility; "I would Madam, (said she to the Empress with a faint voice) I would willingly flee from my self if it were possible, although a man cannot absent himself willingly from hence, but he must be an Enemy to himself. "To flee company, answered Eudoxia, is no sign of being an enemy to a mans self: because in seeking retirement, he flies all others to enjoy himself: So that in effect, added the Princess, a man hates that which he flies, and not that which he seeks. "When a man avoids society, for that reason that makes me shun it, replied Thrasimond, he is not for that to be accus'd of hatred: and it is but little sign of love to a company, especially such a company as this, to let them suffer the trouble of a distemper'd person. "In truth, (said the Empress with a serious look) you cannot be ill without a great affliction to us, and we shall blame you if you use not your utmost endeavour, to recover your former condition that you were in, that day that you were my Champion. "That day was so kind to me, (replied the Prince with a sigh, which it was impossible for him to keep in) that I fear I shall never see the like again, and it were to be wished for me, (continued he as he began) that I had perished in that glorious enterprise. "We should have been very sorry for that, replied the Princess, and I assure my self that he who was your companion in Arms that day, does not wish as you do. Hitherto, (said I, seeing her address her self to me) I have made no such wish: for as I am not in a condition to give my wishes, those bounds which I ought to set them; I attend my good fortune from whence soever I am to look for it, without asking any thing: but I must confess with Prince Thrasimond, that I cannot dye more honourably, than in dying the Champion of Pulcheria. "You agree very well in your thoughts, replied the Princess, and by what I see, you do not repent you of an action which you perform'd with so much success. But (said she addressing her self to Thralimond) you are not gone as you were about to go, which makes me believe that the distemper which you felt is over. "If it be not altogether, replied the Prince, however I find some ease: and seeing that I know I shall not be much better any where else, if you have the goodness patiently to endure me in this condition, I shall very willingly stay here. "I am very glad, replied Eudoxia very obligingly, to find that it was not my company that drove you away: and if my Sister and I could charm your illness, (for I dare answer for her as for my self) you may be assured we would endeavour it with all our hearts. "If my evils were of such a nature, said the blushing Prince, as to be charm'd, I make no question but that your spells were sufficiently powerful: for if I could not find them here, I know not where to go to seek them. "You may find them, said the Empress, in those famous beauties that fame has celebrated over all the world: the Princess of the Cimbrians the chief of beauties, the Princess of the Turingiens, the Sister of that illustrious King of the Franks, and a Bellamira that makes so loud a report over all the western Empire. And think you, replied the Prince, that renown talks less of the Princess Eudoxia, than of those other Beauties? Or rather do you not think that she speaks more of Eudoxia alone, than of all the rest together? "I know, said the Empress, that my fortune has been very good, that gave renown any occasion to speak any thing of me. But those that know the truth, are not ignorant that I owe it to the decrees of Heaven, the goodness of the Emperour and the Princess his Sister, rather than to any advantages of my person. "They who will be just, said Pulcheria, will not hearken to your modesty, for there is no man but knows, that you might have been Queen of Persia before you were Empress of the East. Eudoxia was about to reply, so that there had been a pleasant controversy between the two Princesses, if the Emperour had not enter'd the Closet, followed by Lenon, Maximinus, Paulinus, and others the most considerable persons of the Court. He argued with Thrasimond about the change that he saw in him, but it was after a very obliging manner: And Thrasimond expecting no less, was the less troubled to disengage himself than at other times, for generally he made but ill defences for himself, in what he was urged to: For looking upon him as the peaceable possessor of that which he adored, he could not so well matter the cruel agitations, which the remembrance thereof inspir'd into him, to make use of all his wit and courage at that time, or to turn the discourse another way as he desired, which he had been able to do, had his passion been more moderate it was, as well you know, where you lay, and where now the Princess Pulcheria lies, having parted with her own to the Empress, as being nearer to the Emperour. You know there is also a long Balcony that runs all along the Front of the House, and serves to all the Apartments upon that Floor. Thrasimond, who out of his own Lodging might go into that Balcony, many times was wont to walk there in the evening, when every body else was retired to their rest, and when all the Court was buried in sleep which his love would not permit him to taste of. There he entertained himself with the Stars, and conversed with what the light of the night would permit him to see in the Garden, and discover of the Sea over the Trees, of which he had a large and free prospect. With these insensible objects he discoursed of all that his love made him feel, and out of the pleasure that he took therein he forgate himself sometimes, and walk'd there the greatest part of the night.

One evening troubled more than ordinary with these amorous thoughts, and being in a deep contemplation of those Ideas which employed them all the day, he began to walk at such an hour probably when all the world was drown'd in sleep, and fixing his eyes toward Heaven, he call'd the Stars to witness what he suffered, and with a thousand sighs which he breath'd from the bottom of his heart, he seem'd to crave their compassion, and to make them interested in his misfortune. The night was neither light nor clouded. However, being obscure enough to please the humour of a person who sought nothing less than light, it was not clear enough to discover objects at any reasonable distance. Thrasimond walk'd gently to and fro, making twenty discourses, (as is ordinary with persons in his condition) sometimes to the object of his love, sometimes to himself, sometimes to the senseless witnesses of his grief. He spake to his ador'd Eudoxia all that he could possibly imagine to say to her, in the discovery of what he suffered for her, and sometimes he thought he made some things known to her, that all her severity could not furnish her with reasons to accuse or blame him for; and while his imagination in complacency to his love, held him in this contemplation, he found such pleasures therein, that would not permit him to think upon any thing else; but when he awak'd out of that flattering dream that seduc'd him, and beheld the condition of his life without any dissimulation of the truth, he fell from the beams of hope that dazled him for some moments, to a night of sadness and anguish, and supposing to himself his Eudoxia as terrible as she had been pitiful, he became so lost and desperate in his own opinion, as if he had been really in her presence convicted of all that was hid in his heart, and expos'd to all the most terrible rigour of her fury: then he turn'd all his reason against himself, repeated all that he thought capable of affording him any cure, and fortified himself with all that his reason and his courage could infuse into him. But he found in himself no disposition to hearken to all that he was able to represent to himself; and thus giving a small check to himself, he pass'd from those severe and sad thoughts to others more sweet and flattering, and finding there more satisfaction, he gave himself over to them, not caring to interrupt them any more by any importunate reflection. All this discourse which I repeat not to you otherwise than as he told with his own mouth, he made silently to himself, not letting fall any words; but sometimes passion more strong than his reason, made him drop some words unawares, and that so loud as to be heard at some distance off. At first he walk'd only in that part of the Balcony which was near his own Apartment, without any intention to stray farther; but by little and a little being buried in his thoughts too deeply to mind what he did, he suffered his body to be guided by the passion that ruled his mind, and which without permitting him to take notice of one or t'other end of the Balcony, which you know, Sir, is about six hundred paces in length, lead him unawares to the end of the Emperour's Apartment, and just before that which belong'd to the Empress. He might have walk'd there often enough, without being taken notice of, had he made no noise: but being wrapp'd up in his amorous thoughts, and having his mind entirely possessed by his passion, they put into his mouth certain words of a passionate Song which he had made the day before, and which I had heard him sing the same day; for he sung admirably, and there are few persons in the world that had a better voice than he. Nor did he sing them only once over, for the disturbance of his mind, had so depriv'd him of all circumspection, that he repeated them often, and the Song consisting of several Stanza's, took up some time to sing it. As he was singing he made a stop also, without minding what he did, at one end of the Terraces, which is just opposite to the Empress's Apartment, with his face toward the Garden, leaning upon the Balisters. And by the same fortune the Empress return'd later to her Chamber that Evening than usually, having pass'd that evening with the Princess Pulcheria, at some sports that Thrasimond formerly took much delight in, and wherein he would not fail to make one still before he grew so melancholy. The Empress was just going to undress dress her self, when two of her Maids of Honour came and told her, that if she would go into her Closet, she might hear a voice that sung admirably, and which they took to be Prince Thrasimond's; the Empress, who as you know well, together with her skill in all other Sciences, is perfectly skill'd in Musick, and sings marvellously well her self, had heard Thrasimond sing before, and knowing the condition wherein the Prince then was and having a curiosity more than ordinary to understand what it was that the Prince at that time a night, and in his humour, should be pleasing his fancy with, she was easily perswaded to step into her Closet, where, opening the window softly, which was no farther distant from Thrasimond than the breadth of the Terrass, being about seven or eight paces, and causing the lights to be taken away for fear of discovery, she lean'd upon the window, and listen'd with great attention; but all the care she took not to interrupt him was needless, for besides that his face was turn'd t'other way, he was so buried in those thoughts that busied his mind, and so ravish'd with the words of the Song, that a small noise would not have disturb'd him; but by and by he made a small pause in the Song, which caus'd the Empress to think he would sing no more; but immediately after he had breath'd out some sighs, he began again in so passionate a manner, that thereby the true passion that made him utter these words was easie to be discern'd, and that he was touch'd to the very bottom of his heart with what he sung. The first Notes of the Song gave the Empress to understand, that her women had not been deceiv'd, but that it was really Thrasimond; and therefore listening with great attention, she heard these following Stanza's.

Himself to Hell thrown down beheld of old:
This Honour my disgrace repairs, he cry'd,
That yet my courage ventur'd once to love
The beauteous wife of the most Sovereign Jove.
And lest I feel the rigour of his pride,
Than that which from her eyes I prove.*

*Bold Lover, though, how fair thy Destiny!
A jealous God that will not let thee die,
Will keep thee here in pains without relief:
Yet 'tis my comfort, though she prov'd unkind,
That I with freedom told her all my mind.
And whereas others dare not tell their grief,
My death leaves none conceal'd behind.*

Ab Ixion! (said the Prince, having made an end of singing, and mov'd by a passion which he could not contain) I am more unfortunate than thou, since thou didst only suffer after thou hadst made known thy grief to the Goddess that caus'd it, but I must perish, concealing mine as long as I live. He accompanied these words with many sighs; and a little after he left leaning upon the Balisters, and turn'd his face toward the Empress's Closet. Till then he was not aware to what part his passion had lead him, contrary to his intention; but though the Tapers were remov'd, he saw the light of the Empress's Closet, and also perceiv'd the Empress leaning at the window. The fear which he then had for what might have happen'd, made him open his eyes to look about where he was, and certainly knowing that he was got before the Closet of Eudoxia, where he had often been, he made no question but that it was she her self whom he had seen look out at the window, though he thought she had been retired long before. However, he was uncertain what to think, and what judgment he ought to make of that accident, supposing it were the Empress that had heard him sing; and in this anxiety he was no less unresolv'd what to do, when the Empress, who had seen all the passages by a light sufficient to discover them, believing that he would sing no more, and not doubting but that he knew that she had seen him, and farther by reason of the words that she had heard him utter, being touch'd with a curiosity greater than ever, was resolv'd not to let him pass by without speaking to him, and without making him give her an answer to some questions concerning those things which she had heard, raising her voice to be well understood by him, Give not over singing, said she, the persons that hear you understand how to value the harmony which you make, and perhaps know something of Musick. The darkness was favourable to Thrasimond, in concealing the change that that accident might have discovered in his face by a better light, for his bashfulness did not in that obscurity permit him in a good while to find words to express himself.

However,

However, at last he drew near to the window with a profound reverence, and begg'd pardon of the Empress for the transgression which he had committed through the darkness of the night, that hindered him from knowing where he was, protesting that if he had thought he had been so near her Closet, he would have taken more care how he had made any noise to disturb her rest. The fair Athenais hearkened to him with abundance of sweetness, and making him an answer after she had heard his Apology, and that her women had brought lights, I shall easily pardon you, said she, the noise which you have made, which was a noise so pleasing; but I cannot pardon you for being sorry that you did us so great a kindness; for I must tell you, I took great delight to hear you, had not you by your Song given me to apprehend your misfortune. The night serv'd well to conceal the blushes of Thrasimond which these words caus'd in his cheeks; and the Prince giving the Gods thanks, for the happiness which he had thereby received; and with much trouble finding words to express himself as he intended: I cannot tell, said he, what knowledge of my fortune you may have gathered by the words which I sung; for as I neither made them, nor sung them but by accident, I cannot believe that they could make you apprehend any thing of my condition. "I do not question, but that you made them, replied the Empress, besides that you sung them after too passionate a manner not to have some concern therein: but though it were not so, those words which you added after you had done singing, sufficiently inform us that you are not so happy as you would be; for in regard you know that I have read the Poets, and understand something of their Fables, give me leave to tell you, that person must be very miserable that envies the fortune of Ixion.

These words augmented Thrasimond's confusion, so that he stood a good while without knowing what to answer, and without being able to find out a way to make amends for the error he had committed; but at length taking courage from the necessity that constrain'd him, seeing it was not for him to stand like a mute at a time that his silence might convict him of what he had a mind to keep secret, I cannot tell, Madam said he to the Empress, what words those were that gave you to understand my envy of Ixion's fortune. However it were, the honour to have perish'd for what he lov'd, and to have lov'd the greatest of all the Goddesses, seems to me a thing that deserves to be envied. "If you look upon his boldness as an effect of his courage, replied the Empress, you may thereby confound virtue and vice together; for all bold thoughts proceed not from the same principle; nor does the Fable give him that honour which you attribute to him; for instead of dying for what he lov'd, he died only being punish'd for his offence. But on the other side I am of opinion that you do not envy his condition chiefly, for that only you esteem him more happy than you, in regard he had the liberty to tell his thoughts, and declare his whole mind, while you are forc'd to keep silence. I confess, said the Prince, in that his fortune might be better than mine; for there is nothing more cruel than to suffer excessive torment, and to be forc'd to conceal it as long as a man lives. "If you will speak like Ixion, replied Eudoxia, by exposing your self to the same punishment that he deserv'd, I question not but you may have the same freedom as he had; for he that fears not to be strook with Thunder, may take to himself the liberty to speak what he pleases. The Thunder of Heaven, replied the Prince, is not always the most terrible, for that confidently may be out-brav'd by one that dares not resist those other Lightnings. "In short, said the Princess, we will no more endeavour to seek out the cause of this change in your humour, and in your person for some time since, so that when we behold you pondering and muttering to your self; when we perceive you sighing, and hiding your self in solitude, we will no farther question the cause that makes you sigh, and produces all those other effects. To tell you the truth, I had almost a suspicion of it before: and I am very glad that I find you labouring only under such a distemper which will less trouble your Friends, than any other misfortune more grievous, or more important, either in your person, or your fortune. I never thought, Madam, said the Prince, that I had discovered my malady so far, that you should speak thereof with so much certainty, but were it that which you imagine it to be, I know not, Madam, why you should esteem it less to be pity'd than any other, seeing that in losing the quiet of our life, our fortune cannot but be very miserable, and that no part of the body can have any health when the heart is wounded. "Time and reason, said the charming Eudoxia, easily cure those that are sick of these wounds; nay, there are some that have not need of so much assistance to recover their health.

It seem'd, Sir, that the Empress speaking in that mannner, foretold the change that was to happen suddenly after in your mind; or that the Philosopher Leontin had declared to her that which he foretold you; but the Vandal Prince who had often heard the discourse of your malady, but did not foresee your cure, and therefore thought it had been more easie, beginning beginning to talk like one that had no ground for what he said; In truth, Madam, said he, though other persons might make that judgment, we are not to expect it from your Majesty; for besides that you may remember that you have seen Princes lie prostrate at your feet, that will carry your wounds to the Grave; you are not to deny but that the same power may wound others not less incurably. “ ‘Twas not in expectation of this piece of flattery, said the Em-press, that I told you sincerely my thoughts; and I am well enough satisfied in having made one single wound, since you will needs allow me that vanity, so that it be the last that ever I shall make as long as I live. As you well know, replied Thrasimond, that it was not willingly that you made it, you are not to question but that you may make others contrary to your own intentions, and of which you may be ignorant as long as you live. “ I shall be very willing to be ignorant thereof, replied the Empress, for as the knowledge thereof cannot be pleasing to me, and very unprofitable to those that would teach it me, they can never more sensibly oblige me than in sparing me that knowledge as long as they live. But, Madam, replied the Prince, how can they oblige you, if you never know what they do for you? Or how will you know that they hide their wounds from you, if you never know that you have given them? “ To oblige me sincerely, replied Eudoxia, it is not necessary to know that they have oblig'd me; for you know it is generous to conceal a good turn when it is done, and that without the desire of acknowledgment, or seeking any other reward but that of self-recompence. But it is not concerning me that you speak, (continued she, with a smile) and therefore to return to the subject of the discourse, which is your self, as there is no question but that you sigh for some absent Beauty, and that you brought along with you in your heart an evil which time now makes you feel more grievously than you suffered at the beginning, methinks you should rather lament the evils of absence, and seek for a remedy of them, than complain of those that you suffer through a silence which you are constrained to keep. There may be reason for both, (replied Thrasimond very sadly) and you may judge by that, Madam, whether a person that is sick of several distempers at one time, be not truly miserable. “ I do believe, said the Empress, that you do not at this time desire that I should be your confidant; and because I will not be so whether you will or no, nor farther interrupt the hours of your repose, I leave you to your liberty; and advise you to give your self to your rest for the remaining part of the night. Concluding these words, she took her leave and retired: Thrasimond went away from that corner, but he walk'd a long time after upon the Terrats, employing one part of the night in pondering upon the adventure that had befallen him, and passing his judgment thereupon, and examining what he could find either harsh or advantageous for him, among all the expressions of Eudoxia. She had talk'd to him both as a person that blam'd him, and as a person that esteem'd him; but she had too far explain'd her self for his repose, when she declar'd to him the small inclination she had to know the wounds which she inflicted; besides that he found something in what she had said, that so nearly prick'd him, that he was in great fear lest he had spoken something which had given her a jealousy; and therefore he was glad, when he had not discovered himself against his will, by finding that he had followed the same track that she did; and that she made him believe, if she did really think so, that it was only for some absent Beauty that he sigh'd.

Next morning he repeated to me the whole story, in the same manner as I tell it you; and he hung upon every particular, like a person truly passionate. I was sensibly afflicted to see him, though I were my self in a condition, which probably did not permit me to interest my self so strongly: But though I believed my self not less in love than he, and that I had as little hopes; yet I found my self less disturb'd than he, and whether it were from the difference of our tempers, or of our thoughts, my mind appear'd in another condition than his, and methought that my fortune was also very unlike, who never could desire any thing more sweet and favourable in all things, than the kind entertainment that Pulcheria gave me. I thought also that I had done and said enough, to let her understand the difference, between my thoughts and those which other men had of her: and I was of opinion that she was not wholly ignorant thereof, though she would not testify that she knew any thing that passed in my heart, or that she was willing to know any thing more. In short she carried her self toward me in such a manner, which might make me judge that she was perswaded, of a good part of what I suffered for her: and that the signs which she had observed thereof, were not displeasing to her. But that she did not desire any more particular or precise evidences, and that she would not have been well pleased, had I more publickly made them known: However she still procur'd me the noblest employments, she discovered to me her secret counsels and determinations, and trusted me with affairs of greatest importance, and desired my advice in matters of greatest consequence. I was way how I abused her favours, and knowing they proceeded rather from her goodness than my merits, I did nothing that might give her the least opportunity, to think that my preferment made me presumptuous. She also declared sometimes, how much she was dissatisfied with the easie nature of the Emperour, to grant whatever she desired without any examination, and sign all sorts of papers without minding the contents: and I was privy to it, when she put that innocent deceit upon him, of which there has been so much talk abroad, when to make him sensible of the errors that he might commit, by signing papers without minding what they concern'd, she made him sign a writing by which he sold the Emperess at a certain price, which he confess'd himself to have received: and having shut up the Emperess in her Apartment, she suffered him to desire the writing a long time, nor would give it him till she had let him see, how he had sold her: and shewed him withal by what she had done in jest, what errors he might commit in earnest, by such an easiness of nature. The Emperour received it as a just correction, and the Emperess who at first knew not how to take it, followed the Emperour's example, out of her experience of Pulcheria's good intentions, and approved the Act of the Princes.

The same day Pulcheria having drawn me aside, as she was often wont to do, did me the honour to tell me all along, the reasons which had obliged her, to put this innocent deceit upon the Emperour, that he might be the better advised, of the faults which he had committed, and of those which he might run into by his easiness, and discoursed to me upon this subject, not only with the greatest judgment in the world, but as the most experienc'd and ready Politician could have done, joyning withal to the reasons of policy, those of piety and conscience: which in the management of all affairs, she preferred before the other. And because she commanded me to give her my advice, in certain matters which she propos'd to me; I was a good while delivering my opinion upon her proposition, and made her a discourse so conformable to her inclinations, that she not only hearken'd to me without interruption, but with a great deal of satisfaction by what she had made me perceive: but when I had done speaking, beholding me with an obliging look that denoted much of kindness for me, In truth Martian, said she, I am not a little confirm'd in the Good opinion, which I have always had of your virtue and your understanding: so that I do not only think you capable to govern an Empire, but I believe those people would be very happy, that had you for their Emperour.

This discourse was so obliging, that I did not look upon it as seriously spoken, but beholding the Princes with a smile, 'Twas not without reason Madam, said I, that my Father had some hopes that I should one day be an Emperour, and that he had so carefully observed those predictions which as his fancy led him to believe, seemed to him to portend me that dignity. These words, though uttered in a jesting manner, begat however so much curiosity in the Princes, that she made me rehearse to her, all that I have related to you at the beginning of my story, concerning those vain hopes that blinded my Father, and when she had heard me out; Your Father, said she, was not perhaps so much to blame as you believe, seeing that besides these favourable omens, there are other fairer grounds of greater hopes. Were you now under the reign of Valens your life would be in danger, who put our great grandfather to death only upon a prediction, of less importance and probability. But happen what will if you are not Emperour, you deserve to be one for your virtue: And if it should please God, added she smiling, that the Empire were to be translated into another family, if there wanted no other voice than mine for your election, you might assure your self thereof. "The Empire, (replied I with a confidence that her words had infus'd into me) would be more acceptable and dear to me from your hands, than from the election of the people: And I dare answer for my self, that no other Ambition than that will ever trouble me. But Madam as greatness blinds our eyes, and as the possession of one happiness infuses into us desires of a greater, I do declare that I would not accept the Empire, unless thereby I could attain to one happiness more, which would be of greater value to me than the Empire of the East." "And what great happiness is that, replied the Princess, which you prize beyond the imperial dignity. Were I Emperour, said I, it might perhaps be lawful for me to tell you: but since I am not so, I hope Madam you will do me the favour to dispense with my silence." "If I ever see you in that condition, (replied the Princess smiling as before) I suppose I shall know from your self, and if you ever see it in my power to dispose of the Empire; you shall then know of me what I forbear now to tell you. Though it were not fitting for me to build any foundation upon words so obscure and utter'd after such a manner, yet they made me feel something of a sweetness, and carried me to a persuasion for sometime, that it was not impossible for me, to be one day more happy than I expected. Thus the Princess brook'd those marks which I gave her, of a good part of what I conceal'd in my breast: but though she endured them without without any sign of dissatisfaction; yet she gave me to understand that she was unwilling I should farther explain my meaning, and only contented her self with letting me know by particular proofs, the good opinion which she had of me, and the trust with which she honoured me, provided I made no ill use thereof nor made publick the certainty of those things of which the bare suspicion did nothing offend her.

She spake to me one day concerning Thrasimond, well knowing the Friendship that was between us, and the interest which I took in all his concerns, and having a true esteem of his merit, she sought from me, as a person that was sorry for him, and was willing to shew him all kindness, the cause of that alteration which she observed in him; and having throughly divid'd into whatever might be imagin'd contributory thereto, at length the Princess of a sudden looking very earnestly upon me, I see, said she, that you do not deal sincerely with me in the affairs of Thrasimond; and though I have only tryed to hear what you would say, I make no more doubt than you, but that it is only love which had brought him to that condition wherein he now is. Your judgment may be very right, said I very faintly, for besides that I see nothing else in his fortune that may have produc'd any such effect, were it any other thing than love, I should not so obstinately keep his counsel. I do not believe, said she, that he has kept his own counsel from you, for you are such united Friends, that I doubt not but he hath made known to you both his love, and the person whom he loves. Were it so, Madam, said I, I were the more oblig'd to keep his counsel, than if I had learn'd it any other way; and you would easily pardon, Madam, my fidelity to my friend, which is a due debt to amity in such occasions. As you are my friend rather than his, reply'd Pulcheria, I cannot tell whether I ought to pardon you; and though I am not ignorant that we are oblig'd to keep religiously the secrets which our friends have trusted us withal, possibly there are persons with whom we need not to be so punctual; I believe there are none with whom we ought not to be very exact; yet I believe there are some with whom we can hardly contain our selves. And as it is an imprudence to trust a secret with one that is not in a condition to defend himself against all the world, yet I do find that he has not less to charge himself withal, who is not able to answer for his own ability. I have a desire to trie my power upon this occasion, and to put your friendship upon a proof, which may perhaps tell me how far I may confide in it at another time. These words made me tremble and change colour, for fear of being constrained, either to disobey Pulcheria or betray my Friend: and therefore returning an answer to the Princess with a guilty countenance; "There is nothing in the world," said I, "wherein it is impossible for me to disobey you, and I would sacrifice to the power which you have over me, whatever is more dear to me than my life: But if Thrasimond have trusted me with a secret, which is of that importance that I cannot reveal it, without casting my friend into despair; I had rather hope that you would have pity on me, and that you would not employ a power, to which it behoves me to submit all things, to make me commit an infidelity that will render me unworthy your esteem, and by consequence the most miserable among men." "No Martian, fear nothing," said she, "I will not make this tryal though I have put you into a fright: nor will I expose my self to this discontent, of knowing how little power I have over you, if you refuse me what I desire, or of making you do what you are so unwilling to do: but at least," continued she with a smile, "remember that you would not declare the distinction which you make between Thrasimond and my self." "Ah Madam," said I, "you see well there is no equality in the condition, and although I love Thrasimond as well as any man in the world, be pleas'd to believe me Madam, that had the meanest man living trusted me with a secret, I would never have told it to Thrasimond." "I will believe what you would have me," said the Princess, "provided that you will believe that I have not spoken in earnest all this while, and that I never had so much curiosity as to desire to know that, which any person did not think convenient to tell me."

Thus I got out of a streight which gave me no small trouble, and I was glad at the same time to observe in the countenance of the Princess, that she was no way dissatisfied: Much about that time Thrasimond and I went to visit the virtuous Leontin, Father of the Empress, who as you know after he had changed his Religion, had wholly dedicated himself to the service of the Altar: and without being heightned with any Ambitious thoughts, for the grandeur of his Daughter, lived among his Books in a retirement of his own chusing. He received us with a very signal affability, and in a long converse that we had together, out of the love that he had for judicial Astrology, being informed of the time and circumstances of our Nativities: and perceiving that we had a desire to know something of our future fortunes; One of you, said he, may be happy, but it shall be a good while first: the other is in hazard never to be so as long as he lives. He explained himself no farther, being desirous to give each of us leave, to hope the best we could for our selves: I thought it not impossible to be my self, knowing less improbability in my own fortune, than in Thrasimond's. But the Prince of the Vandals rather believ'd the prediction favourable to himself. And though he believ'd that Leontine's knowledge did not reach to make him divine what he had in his heart, he blush'd at first for fear of being surpris'd by the Father, in the love which he had for his Daughter, but afterwards growing pale through the grief which the cruel prediction made him feel, I do not doubt at all, said he with a sigh, but that I am to be miserable, nor have I but now begun to prepare my self for it. " Perhaps it was my self, not you whom Leontine meant, (said I, touch'd with compassion for the marks which I discovered in his face of a most vigorous grief.) Nor ought you to disturb your self, said the Philosopher, for words that proceed but from an imperfect knowledge, and an art that is not always infalible. That which Martin tells you, may perhaps be true; at least, I assure you, that his miseries will endure far longer than yours. I do not doubt, replied Thrasimond, but my miseries will end in death, for I find the happiness that should prolong my days is forbid me for ever. The wise man is above the Stars, said Leontine, and had I known that two or three words without any assurance, or any certain knowledge, would have so sensibly afflicted you, I should have been more wary what I had said. Ab, Sir, (said Thrasimond with a great deal of tenderness, and striving to discover less sadness) It is not you whom I accuse for my misfortune, nor is it here only that I first apprehended my misery, and consequently it is not you that have given me the first knowledge thereof: it is some time since that I begun to have an ill opinion of my fortune.

I think that this was the last Prediction of Leontine, for a few days after he fell sick and died at Constantinople, where he died as he liv'd, a true Philosopher, and one that knew how to despise life, and condemn death. All the Court went into Mourning, after the example of the Empress, who did the same out of the affection which she had always had for her Father, which her greatness did no way make her forget: for some days she remain'd shut up with the Princesses Flaccilla and Marina, where she was seen by no persons but the Emperour and Pulcheria. But after she return'd to the Palace, and permitted her self to be publickly visited as formerly, she had the satisfaction to see that all the Court was sensibly afflicted for her grief. But among all those that appeared most deeply touch'd with her sorrow, she perceiv'd none so truly sensible as Thrasimond, and when he made profession thereof by some expressions, she easily discern'd that his heart spake through his lips, and that he thought what he said, after another manner than many others, whom the observance and complacence of the Court, had caus'd to give the same demonstrations of sorrow. At length, time wore away out of the Court and heart of Eudoxia what her loss had fetted thereof doleful; and with joy the usual divertisements as formerly return'd: only Thrasimond was insensible of all comfort or delight, or at least if he tasted any thing of pleasure, it was only from the sight of the Empress; for as for her discourse, he fear'd it almost as much as he desired it, and out of the fear which he had to discover in despite of himself that which he was willing to hide, as much as possible he avoided her company, which at other times he so much coveted: but at length his malady encreas'd to that extremity that he could no longer master it, and his passion grew too violent to be kept within those bounds which he ought to have prescrib'd it.

The Emperour, the Empress and the Princess were walking one day in the Gardens belonging to the Palace, with a great company of the principal Ladies of the Court, and with them the illustrious Anthemius, the virtuous Paulinus, Lenon, Maximinus and my self; the Emperour himself led the Empress, whom he still lov'd as passionately as ever, and for whom when he was married he had preserv'd his love entire, resting on the other side upon the arm of Paulinus, for whom he had a very great esteem; Anthemius and my self had the honour to lend a hand to the Princess, the rest followed behind with the other Ladies. They had walk'd along time in the broad walks, when the Ladies desired the Emperour to go see a Fountain that stood in the most private part of all the Garden, which they call'd the Rustick Fountain, as being so little adorn'd by art that nature seem'd to have made all its Beauties; for there is neither Stone nor Marble nor other bottom but what is natural, covered with Grass and green Moss on every side, and defended from the Beams of the Sun by four great Trees that grow about the Fountain, and darken it with a delicious shade: it springs out of the Gravel, and bubbling up to the very surface of the water, runs into certain Troughs or Conduits plac'd in the Grass, with a delightful noise: Eudoxia had perhaps commended the wild Beauty thereof, had she not met with another object to entertain her; for with a voice drew near it, we saw a man lying all along upon the Grass, which we immediately knew to be Thrasimond; who, because he neither rose, nor mov'd at the approach of the company, they judg'd him to be asleep; and because as being his Friend, I concern'd my self more for him than the rest, and was fearful that in the condition he was in, he might think himself alone when he awak'd, and so commit some error, or utter some words in the height of his passion that might discover his secret, I let go Pulcheria's hand after I had begg'd her lieve, and was going to awake him, and to give him notice of the Emperour's being there, when the Emperour himself stay'd me, telling me that I should not deprive him of the content which he expected from that accident, and that he stopt thereby to learn a good part of what Thrasimond so diligently conceal'd; I durst not disobey the Emperour's command, only I took care to awake him by talking louder than the rest, when the Emperour commanded me also to speak softly. And Pulcheria, who observ'd me troubled, and likewise remembered the discourse we had had some days before concerning Thrasimond's privacy, smiling, gave me a sign with her eye, not to oppose the Emperour's will. He first drew near to the Prince as he lay asleep, the Empress and the Princess followed him, and as they pass'd with him on that side from which the Prince's face was turn'd, they look'd back upon him very earnestly: he rested his head upon one of his Arms, his other being extended upon his Thigh, and because the gentle breath had blown his hair behind his Shoulders, one of his cheeks was wholly uncovered, so that they saw it all bedew'd with tears, and not only with those that he might have shed when he was awake, but with such as trickled from his eye-lids as he lay asleep. His tears were every foot accompanied with deep sighs, so that they perceiv'd that that unfortunate Prince did not find any rest in that very charm which affords it to all creatures, and that in that very appearance of tranquility his Soul was cruelly afflicted. That object of pity tenderly affected the Emperour who highly esteem'd the Prince for his merit, and had a great kindness for him; and therefore turning towards us, but me in particular, whom he knew to be his faithful friend, I confess, said he, that I find my self mov'd with compassion, and that there are few things in the world that I would not do to cure that malady, which is yet unknown to us. "In truth, said the Empress, I am throughly griev'd; and I will employ all my credit this day, but I will know what hitherto I could never apprehend. I know not whether these words, being spoken a little aloud, did not for some few moments open his eyes, but immediately he stirr'd, and opening his mouth before he opened his eyes, Oh, miserable creature! said he so loud as to be understood by all the company, and without saying a word more, he turn'd to the other side, and there he lay in the same posture without any sign of awaking. I confess, said Pulcheria, that this poor Prince, whatever it be that afflicts him, causes a great compassion in me for him, and I wish I could find it out, that I might be able to give him some assistance. Tiberina, who was a Lady of great Quality, whom you knew in our Court, of a lively and confident disposition, turning toward the Princess, Madam, said she, I think I have found out one way to forward you in your design; for if it be love that thus torments Thrasimond, as it is very probable, this paper will, 'tis very likely, give you some intimation thereof. And at those words, laying her hand upon the corner of a piece of paper which she saw lying by him, she took it up softly, and having open'd it, she shew'd it to the Emperour and the company, to whom it soon appear'd, by the manner of writing, that they were Verses. The Emperour was very glad, hoping that through the experience he had of Thrasimond's wit, to find something more than ordinary therein, and more than that, some satisfaction in what he desired: Tiberina, who requested no farther than to read them, began without expecting the Emperour's command, whereby they understood these following Verses:

*Hence, hence presumptuous thoughts, be gone;
Perplex not one that is undone:
How! will ye thus to Heav'n aspire?*

By that beginning there was ground enough to fear that what followed, which was very long, would discover more than the sleeping Prince desired should be known; and out of that jealousy which I had thereof, turning toward the Princess Pulcheria, as it were to crave her assistance by my looks, I made her so well understand the perplexity that I was in, that she had no need of a more earnest importunity; and whether it were truly that the sign which I made, and the disturbance which she perceiv'd in my countenance oblig'd her, or out of that admirable prudence that so well govern'd the Empire, that she conjectured part of the truth, and believed that there might follow some things in the coherence of the Verse, which it was not convenient the Emperour should see, she snatch'd the paper so suddenly out of Tiberina's hand, that the Emperour could not hinder it. 'Tis enough, Tiberina, said she, and 'tis a sin against a virtue that preaches to you and I every day, not to pry into the affairs of another man against his will. And because she was afraid the Emperour should demand the paper before she had time to give it the Prince, she tore it all to bits. The Emperour and Empress, attributed that action of hers to her sole discretion: but all this was not done with so little noise, but that Thrasimond awoke, and opening his eyes he saw the illustrious personages that environed him. The surprize was greater than I am able to represent to you, and though his eyes finding so near what his soul sought every where, received those rays of joy, to which he could not but give entrance at the sight of his beloved object; yet the shame to be surprized in that condition, and with so many marks in his countenance of what he felt in his heart, made him blush with his eyes fix'd upon the earth, nor would permit him, after he had hastily recovered himself upon his legs, to accost the Emperour and his fair Train without a great confusion. The Emperour who was willing to ease his grief by all means, beholding him with an Affectionate look; You flee company, said he, and yet you see the Company that seeks for you. You did not I know expect to be thus awakened, and I assure you it was against my intention to interrupt your sleep: I am very much asham'd, replied the Prince, to have been seen in a condition, not fit for the sight of such a company as this, that awakened me out of my sleep: nor had I ventur'd my self, had I not known that it was not in this part of the Garden, that you were accustomed to walk. By what you say, said the Princess, you declare to us that you avoid our company: But you see that fortune favours the good intentions of those, that only seek the consolation of your misfortunes if it be possible. It shall not be my fault, replied the Empress, that I have not a better knowledge thereof to day than hitherto: And to that purpose Madam (said the Emperour interrupting her) I commit him to your care, and intreat you to employ all your endeavours according to your promise. Saying these words he caused Thrasimond to take the Empress by the hand, and so staying with the rest of the company, he order'd us during the time that they stayed in the Garden, to follow at a distance, that they two might have the greater freedom of discourse.

Poor Thrasimond seeing himself in that extremity, trembled, sigh'd and changed colour every moment, behaving himself altogether like one that was forlorn. But the Empress willing to put to tryal what she had determin'd, after she had looked upon him for some time in such a condition, as augmented the compassion which she had for him, beginning her discourse with a behaviour full of sweetness, and a grace that did but more and more inflame the unfortunate Prince; "Thrasimond, said she, besides the esteem which I have of your virtue, and so many rare qualities which attract the admiration of all that know you, I find my self so far obliged, by seeing you so much concern'd in my sorrow for the death of my Father, that I shall be very much dissatisfied, if I do not find some occasion to testify my acknowledgment, by endeavouring to comfort and ease you of yours. You are in such a condition, that forces all the world to take compassion on you: And I have perceived in your countenance this day, the marks of so severe a discontent, that who is not touched therewith may be said to be insensible, and they to have no esteem for you, that are not deeply concern'd therein. Seek Thrasimond, seek the cure of your distemper, and be not wanting to your self as you are. And that we may be able to contribute thereto as we desire, let us understand the malady which you so obstinately conceal, and assure your self that if the Emperour can procure your ease, or whatever his goodness has bestowed upon us, you shall soon behold a change in your fortune, and we shall have the satisfaction to see it in your person."

To these words the charming Eudoxia added others most obliging and very urgent, to which the poor Prince, transported and perplexed with Love, could not for a long time make any answer but with sighs, which continually issued from his breast, or else with some guilty looks by which the fair Empress might discern that which she desired to know, had she had never so little an inclination to have bent her thoughts that way. Then was his reason assaulted with many anxious resolutions; for as there were some few minutes wherein the civility that he received from the Empress, her obliging offers, and the testimonies of her being so highly concern'd for him, made him judge favourably of his fortune, and infus'd courage into him fit for such an enterprize, at other times when he looked upon the effects of Eudoxia's goodness with another countenance, he could not but think that it was out of the ignorance of his malady, that she was so pressing and so urgent after the cure: and from thence to his grief he inferr'd, that his love was something strangely, extraordinary, and opposite to reason and likelihood as to the apprehension of Eudoxia, since after so many visible marks which he gave thereof, she could not all that while suspect it. His harassed reason floated in that diversity of thoughts, when the Empress not enduring so long a silence, interrupted him more than once: and jogging his arm as it were to awake him out of some deep slumber; How Prince, said she, will you give me no answer, and do you make so slight of my kind offers, and of the interest which you see me take in your misfortune, that you think them not worthy to be confided in? The amorous Prince could no longer resist so importunate a sollicitation: and beholding the Empress with a sigh fetch'd from the bottom of his heart; Ab Madam, said he, suffer a miserable person to dye that cannot live: and seeing that in the condition wherein you see him, he may yet dye with the honour to have merited your compassion, do not cast him into another, wherein he may lose that glorious and dear consolation. Most certainly Madam I am just dying, for I find my self drawing near the end of that term, which Fate has set to my days: But the cause of my death is so desirable, that if it were known to you, you would lose all that compassion that makes you seek my relief. And instead of desiring me to live, you would hasten that death by which I should receive so great an honour. I have lived long enough, seeing I have lived to see that which the Sun never beheld more fair and amiable; since I have loved her, and since I am willing to surrender her the rest of my life. Others have found their happiness in acknowledgment from them whom they have loved, I find it in dying for her whom I love: But I find it so full and so entire, that I would hardly change my destiny for theirs, or at least if I may not be suspected for speaking too much, and that it be admitted me to aspire to so great a fortune, I willingly surrender my own and without envy behold them, whose lives are more happy than mine, though less glorious than my death.

These passionate words were uttered in a posture no less passionate, and the fair Empress, not so much minding the explanation of the words, as the compassion to which she was moved; was less apprehensive at this time than she had been at any time before: and not discerning a truth which the Amorous Prince did not over-cunningly disguise; Your words, said she, tell me nothing but what I conjectur'd before, for there is no person doubts but that love is the cause of your affliction: But it is impossible for us to employ our selves, in doing you these kind offices which we desire, unless you will discover to us the fair cause of your sufferings. Name her then Thrasimond, and together with the assistance which I promise you to the utmost of my power, if you trust me with your secret, I shall most faithfully keep your counsel. “It may behove you, said he, to keep it so well that you your self may not come to have the knowledge of it: for perhaps it cannot be known to you, without being known to the person whom I adore. Alas! added he presently after, I say too much: and I believe Madam you did not desire more. “No Thrasimond, (said the Empress without being any way moved) I desire no more, for my curiosity is satisfied. “I see well (said he in a forlorn manner) that having satisfied your curiosity, you have already lost your pity as I well foresaw. But Madam remember that it ought not to forsake me in the greatest extremity of my life. I had not spoken but in obedience to you, and durst I have adventur'd to have disobey'd you, I had known how to have held my tongue till death. That which you may command me can but very little prevent, that which I have propos'd to my self for the end of my troubles, and whether it be that I sacrifice my life to my love, or deliver it up to the punishment of my offence; I shall find ne're the more alteration of my condition, but I shall hasten to meet my death not only without repining, but as one that shall find an equal happiness, as well to please you as to be rid of my torments. I shall also have some ground to believe, that I dye happy if at the last gasp I may dare to hope, that I am not detested by you, nor shall I complain of my hard fate, if your anger, that I have too deservedly incurr'd, does not destroy all that pity which you have so generously testified. “No Thrasimond, said Eudoxia very calmly, my pity of your condition is not lost, and rather now that your malady is known I have so much the more compassion for you, seeing your malady remediless, or at least because I know no cure that may be acceptable to you; yet I will endeavour to find one out, as well in respect to you as for love of my self: and it is but just that I should do so, since I have been so earnest to seek what I have found. I have possibly deserved the greatest part thereof, or at least I have brought it upon my self in persecuting you: and for that reason I have neither any hatred against you, nor so much as any resentment. I shall also keep your counsel, as far as you can desire, nay I shall so far keep it, that I shall endeavour to be ignorant my self, that you did ever trust me with a secret.

Thus spake Eudoxia, and the Prince, who found more courtesie and gentleness in her behaviour than he expected, yet to cross this kindness, discovered something more cruel than all that he could have fear'd from a person less moderate, heard her with a mortal anguish, when the Emperour, who was already grown impatient to know whether the Empress succeeded in her design, drew near before they perceiv'd him, and addresting himself to the Empress, Well, Madam, said he, are you satisfied in your credit, and have you found out Thrasimond's mystery? “He has not truly confess'd it to me, replied the Empress, but I do not despair but that I can make a shrewd conjecture, but for to day I do not desire to know any more. Saying these words, she stayed for Pulcheria and the rest of the company, not desiring to be any longer alone with Thrasimond, who not knowing what judgment to make of his fortune, was swallowed up in a Sea of dubious thoughts, and was so ingulph'd therein, that he was not capable of any converse. Pulcheria tryed him more than any of the rest, resolving to urge him in her turn, with all the obliging and generous arguments, but he answered her with so much trouble and disorder, that out of pity she forbore to torment him: but in the mean time the Emperour taking the Empress under the Arm, walk'd at a distance from the rest of the company, who out of respect would not follow too near to interrupt their discourse, and press'd her so hard to tell him what she knew of Thrasimond's affairs, that she found herself for some time in a very great streight, but at last fearing to give him any ground to suspect by her behaviour the truth of the matter, and desiring withal, that the design which she had contrived, should come to some issue in a short time; Sir, said she, Thrasimond would tell me nothing clearly; and I believe he has very powerful arguments that will not permit him, but I have gathered by his discourse, and am pretty well confirm'd to inform you, that he languishes or rather dies for some Beauty that he has left behind in his own Country, and that not daring to depart from hence till he has perfected the affairs for which his Brother sent him, and discharg'd himself of his Commission, he consumes and pines away, and is in danger of death if he make any long stay here; so that out of that pity which I have for him, as well as your self, I am oblig'd to beg of you that you would dispatch him with all the expedition imaginable, and with all the advantages he can reasonably expect from your goodness and my intercession. Be pleas'd to grant him generously, and of your free will, that which he ought to expect from the esteem which you have testified for him, and out of respect to him add something more, if it may be done, to what the King of the Vandals desires of you. The confidence which he has had in me more than in any other person, obliges me to importune you, that I may give him his dispatch my self after the best manner that may be, that I may have the opportunity to let him see how I have employed my time in his behalf, and the satisfaction to have done that kindness to a Prince of his merit. "In truth, Madam, said he, your intercession is very prevalent over me, though you receive but slight proofs thereof, if you make use of it in things of no greater difficulty; for though you did not request me in the behalf of Thrasimond, there is no person more inclinable to treat him more favourably than my self, and with the greatest advantages that he can desire. His Affairs had been dispatch'd a good while since, had you let me know what you now tell me; but since his first arrival he never told me any thing of them, nor ever testified any desire of departing from us. I am glad that you have learn'd more than I knew, out of the desire I have to satisfy him, and to give him all occasions to speak well of us; and though I shall be very sorry for his departure, and that considering his virtue I could be content that he could remain with us a longer time, I shall have a greater respect to his ease, and the happiness of his life, than my satisfaction; and I will put his business in such a forwardness, that in two days he shall see the effect of your solicitation, and the power which you have in the Empire. "I have had, Sir, said the Empress, a larger than I deserv'd; and I dare promise you, that you shall never see me abuse it upon any other occasion; but as to this, take it not ill that I request the dispatch which you promise me; and that to make your favour complete, I desire you not to say any thing either to the Prince, or to any other persons, but to those who must necessarily have knowledge thereof.

The Emperour promised her what she desired, and to testify his willingness to please her, he call'd the Princess Pulcheria, who, as of all other affairs had the knowledge of the pretences of the King of the Vandals, and having told her what he had understood from the Empress's lips, and the intention which he had to put an end to Thrasimond's Negotiation; with all the concessions which he could honourably grant, he desired her to take care in it the same day, and to yield those things which at another time would have been difficultly granted; Pulcheria, who had a very great value for Thrasimond, was very glad of the opportunity to oblige him; and having soon after consulted with Anthemius, who had the greatest knowledge of those Affairs, they both used their utmost diligence to do him that kind office which he did not at all desire at their hands.

Leaving the Emperour, we retired together, and when we were alone he told me that which I have related to you, and repeated word for word the discourse which he had had with the Empress, but he rehears'd it with so much passion, that being concerned for him as I was, I could not chuse but be very much troubled. And when he had done speaking, seeing me hold my tongue, like a person, whom his discourse, and the accident that betel him, had astonish'd, and not perceiving in my looks what he desired, Ab, Martian, said he, I fear you have no good opinion of my fortune, for that I see those things in your countenance that foretel my misery. "I know not, said I very pensively, what judgment to make thereof; but as I never expected much good, I cannot find any ground to hope better, as

 “ was not so much offended at the knowledge thereof; for I feared she would have been far “ more rigorous than I found her to be. “ If you knew Eudoxia's disposition, said I, you “ would not flatter your self at all with her courteous behaviour; but you would believe
 “ as I do, that very moderation in her to be more dangerous than than the passionate extra“ vagancies of another: she is too prudent to testify any resentment that might make a “ noise, or come to the knowledge of the Emperour; and she has a greater esteem for you “ than to expose you to what you might fear from the Emperour, were your love known “ to him. I believe also as you told me that she does really lament your misfortune, and that “ it is not without a sufficient perplexity, that she sees you fallen into it: but I am very much “ deceived if that familiar sweetness, which she shewed you and which is natural to her,
 “ have any complacency with your love, or partakes of the least thought that may be favou“ rable to it, and I should think my self a Traitor should I advise you to abuse it. Let the “ Gods (replied Thrasimond) dispose of my destiny as they think fitting, but as in speaking look“ ing, or keeping silence death is equally inevitable for me, if there befall me no change in my “ fortune; I cannot repent of having spoken after such express commands, which I could not “ disobey.

That was Thrasimond's opinion, and he continued in this uncertainty of his condition the rest of that day, and the next that follow'd: but the third day, being alone in his Chamber, he saw the Eunuch Chrisaphius enter, in whom of all her Servants the Empress repos'd the greatest confidence, and to whom she shews the greatest tokens of her favour, who brought him his Dispatches seal'd with the Seal of the Empire, in the best form that could be, and with all the advantages he could desire; and after he had presented them with all due respect, and had given him to understand, that the Emperour did not only grant what the King of the Vandals demanded, but that out of respect to himself, he had treated him more honourably than the Emperours were wont to do other Kings, and had added to the end of the Articles particular applauses, and marks of his esteem for the merit and person of Thrasimond: “ Sir, said he, had the Empress sooner understood the necessity of your return to the King your Brother, she had sooner done you the service which now you receive at her hands; and she commanded me farther to tell you, that if there remains any thing farther to be done for yours, or your Brother's interest, she will willingly undertake it, and discharge her self so faithfully of her trust, that you shall not need to tarry any longer.

Poor Thrasimond beholding in this cruel civility of Eudoxia, the severe Decree for his Banishment, stood in need of all the Force of his courage to hear it without dying, nor did all that which he had serv'd him so well, but that the dreadful present tell out of his hands, and that he himself growing mortally pale, at length was constrain'd to let himself sink down upon a chair that stood near him, in a cold sweat without knowledge or feeling: Chrisaphius astonish'd at the effect of his message, drew near him, and earnestly besought him to tell him the cause of that accident, but the forlorn Prince for a good while made him no other answer than with his eyes, and beholding him like one that was half dead, he gave him ground to believe that the present which he had brought was more cruel than favourable. He continued thus for some time, without being able to come to himself whatever he could do: but at length, perceiving the frighted Eunuch was about to call others to his assistance; and fearing to discover his misfortune more than his respect permitted him, he us'd a more than ordinary violence to recover himself a little, and rallying the forces of his mind to assist the strength of his body, at length he put himself into a condition to speak to Chrisaphius; and beholding him with eyes wherein despair was lively painted: “ Be pleas'd to tell the Empress, said he, that I understand her commands, and that I am ready to obey them, that Gunderic shall one day thank her for the favours she has done him; but that there remains no more for her to do for Thrasimond, who possibly receives not as he ought this favour which she hath already honoured him withal, and which he has as little deserv'd.

He said no more then than those words, but a little while after, finding by the countenance and behaviour of the Eunuch, that he was much concern'd for his affliction, though he knew not the cause thereof; and believing him to have so much kindness for him, as not to refuse to oblige him by doing that courtesy for him, which none could serve him in so well as himself, mov'd by his passion that transported him beyond his ordinary prudence, and shutting his eyes against all those other considerations that had at another time withheld him, he made the Eunuch say as he was about to retire, and looking upon him as one that had need of assistance, I am apt, said he, to think that you have some pity upon an un- fortunate person, and as you see my indisposition to be such, as will not let me go to return my thanks to the Emperess, shall I presume to hope that you will give me the opportunity to do it in writing, and that it may be so delivered, that a secret which I discover by her authority may be no farther divulg'd. Yes Sir (said Chrisaphius without any more to do) I promise to give her your Letter, and so securely, that the Secret which you trust in my hands, shall never be known by any fault or miscarriage of mine. Thrasimond then taking off from one of his Fingers, a Diamond which his Brother had given him and presenting it to the Eunuch, prayed him to take it, not as a recompence for the courtesie he was to do him, but as a proof of his obligation to him for accepting it, and a testimony of his own good will toward him. Chrisaphius made some scruple at first whether he should receive it or no, but at last he suffered himself to be tempted by the beauty of the present, and the good grace of him that gave it, against which it was a difficult thing to defend a man's self: and having accepted it with an apology for his refusal, he stayed till the Letter was writ, and being written he received it from the Prince's own hand and so took his leave.

Chrisaphius was hardly gone out of the Chamber when I entred in, and seeing all the marks of his misfortune in the countenance of the poor Prince, I conjectured a part of the truth. In short, you might see by his wild and troubled countenance, by his wanness and by his eyes big with tears, which he endeavoured with all his might to refrain, all the symptoms of despair: sometimes he walked a great pace in his Closet with his Arms cross'd upon his breast, casting sad looks to heaven, and soon after the grief of his mind enfeebling the force of his body, he threw himself upon a little Couch in his Closet, from whence in a few minutes his cruel torments compelled him to rise, not to seek for repose or ease but to weary his body that could take no rest, so long as his soul was miserably deprived thereof. He had sent away all his servants that offered to come near him, commanding them to leave him alone: and when he saw me enter after he had staggered a little way, he sunk down in a Chair that was behind him, and all his constancy forsaking him he gave free course to a river of tears, which he had no longer power to refrain. He accompanied them every foot with sighs and sobs, and at length his face and all his body became to be in such a condition, that there is no soul so cruel that having seen him, would not have been deeply moved with compassion for him: and it may be Eudoxia her self would not have preserved all her constancy, at so sad and miserable a spectacle. For my part, seeing him unfit for any discourse, I was contented only to sit by him without speaking a word, being willing to stay till that torrent whose first fury it was impossible to stop, had emptied it self: but in the mean time I was not so insensible, but that in a little time my eyes were all bedewed like his: so that in embracing that disconsolate Prince, I was forced to mingle some tears with those, with which he washed my cheeks.

We continued a long time in this posture, neither Thrasimond's grief permitting him to discover the cause, nor the interest which I took therein permitting me to demand the reason: but seeing upon the table the dispatches which the Emperess had sent him, and knowing that Chrisaphius was but lately gone out of the Chamber; I made no question but that it was that fatal present, that had reduced him into that condition. I read the treaty which I my self had begun with the King of the Vandals, and found therein such advantageous conditions, that he could not have presumed to have hoped for: when Thrasimond striving with himself, began to recover himself so far as to be able to talk. Well Martian, said he, now you see what you so wisely foresaw: Eudoxia in pronouncing the decree of my Banishment, has pronounced the decree of my death, nor was it without reason that you told me, that outward kindness conceal'd an inward cruelty. Adieu Martian, farewell the generous friend of a friend the most unfortunate. I must be gone from the fatal place, where I unfortunately lost my liberty and my repose, and absenting my self from Eudoxia's eye for ever, I must surrender up a life which I neither can nor will preserve.

To these he added other words full of transportment, and of all the marks of the most vigorous grief, that ever could afflict a lovers heart: and at length he told me the cruel command which he had received, from Chrisaphius's mouth under the colour of civility. I confess his misery did so move me, and I was so sensible of what I saw him suffer, that hardly all the fidelity which I owed the Emperour, could hinder me from going about to seek out some means to give him relief, had I thought I could have found any out: but not seeing any likelihood of being able to do him any kind offices of friendship, I was forced to declare so much to him, bewailing my unhappiness, and giving him to understand by my looks and my discourse, that I was as deeply sensible of his misfortunes, as if they had been my own. I proceeded as well to give him all the consolation that my words could afford, either to encourage him against his misfortune, and to infuse into him some good resolutions that might serve him for a cure. I laid before him the little reason he had to expect any better success, and the small probability he had to believe, that the Empress, who was bound not only by the Laws of Duty, by her own virtuous inclinations, and by so many ordinary ties. but by extraordinary reasons so known to all the world, would show any kindness to his passion, and forget in the first years of her marriage what she owed to a Husband so lovely in his person, and who doted passionately upon her, and who from a low fortune had rais'd her to the highest Dignity in the world. That if his passion had been more moderate, he might have found a way to have afforded himself some better satisfaction; that in a place where the eyes of all the world being fix'd upon her, she could not engage with him in a vicious affection, she could not have treated him with more courtesies, nor with greater marks of a true esteem; and that in short, though the knowledge of his love might possibly be displeasing to her, out of the necessity to which it reduc'd her to forbid him the Court, yet I firmly believ'd, and durst presume to assure him, that she had no prejudice against his person, nor any distaste that hinder'd her from having a true value for him. I told him many other things besides, which took but little effect for his consolation, though he hearkened to them with a great deal of patience. And at length demanding of him what he resolv'd upon, and what his courage would enable him to determine: With an utterance interrupted with sobs, You need not question, said he, but that I am resolv'd to obey the Empress, and to depart from Constantinople, though I am assured to go to my grave: I cannot tell whether I shall be able to-morrow to proceed in my design, yet I find already that I shall not put my self to the trouble to seek my death far from the place where I receiv'd my wound. We suddenly found that he had not uttered any thing of an untruth; for instead of being in a condition to depart the next day, as he had determin'd over night; he was seiz'd with so violent a Fever, that the next day we perceiv'd, he was to take care of something else beside his journey, and the day following we began to be in great fear of his life.

In the mean time Chrisaphius was return'd from the Empress, with an intention to tender that service to Thrasimond that he had promis'd him. And whether it were that he really believ'd that it was upon some other subject than that of love that he wrote to the Empress, or out of the pity which he took upon his misfortune, or the acknowledgment which he owed him for the fair present which he had received from him, that he was willing to venture hard to serve him, he took his opportunity (as it was easie for him to do, by reason of the access which his employment gave him at all hours to Eudoxia) to speak to her out of the hearing of any witnesses of the charge that she had employed him in; and after he had given her an account thereof, and had related to her the truth of what he had seen, (though without mentioning the Diamond that he had receiv'd) he gave her Thrasimond's Letter, rehearsing to her his Apologies by reason of his indisposition, which would not permit him to wait upon her, to return her thanks for what she had done, and to speak to her of those things of which he had taken the liberty to write: I cannot tell whether the Empress, who knew the cunning of Chrisaphius, believ'd that he meant so innocently as he spake: However, she continued for some time not resolv'd what to do; she blush'd when she saw Thrasimond's Letter, which she believ'd not to contain any other business than what had been discours'd between them; and perhaps she had not receiv'd it (though she had been mov'd to compassion by the story that Chrisaphius had told her) had she not fear'd to discover to Chrisaphius a truth with which she had never yet trusted him, and which she was willing to conceal to her utmost. She took it for that reason, though with little intention to read it; but two of her women being come into the Closet when she receiv'd it, she was afraid to give them any suspicion by putting it up without perusing; whereupon having open'd it without being perceiv'd, she set her self to read, and not being able to leave off when she had begun, she found there these words.

The unfortunate Thrasimond to the Empress.

IT is not that which I feel, Madam, but that which I have said, that may have offended you. And as I did not speak, but only in obedience to your commands, 'tis only to my obedience that you are to impute my crime; could I have disobey'd you, I had kept silence till death. And since you made me speak, to banish me from my life, by banishing me from your presence, permit me to tell you that it is a cruel effect of that pity, which you testified to have for me before my crime committed;

committed, and which, after I had offended you, you gave me leave to hope. However, I do not murmur, and since I was destin'd to the glory of dying for you, I shall find it more complete, while I surrender it by your command, rather than abandoning it to be destroyed by sufferings which had ended it with less Honour. I receiv'd the orders as well as I could, but I shall obey them as I ought, and that obedience whereby I have merited your anger, may perhaps occasion me to deserve your pity in following to my Grave.

The reading of this Letter did no way stir Eudoxia's virtue, nor the resolution that she had taken, to stick severely close to her Duty. But certain it is that she was mov'd therewith, and that compassion wrought in her part of the same effects which it might have done in another: she cast her eyes again upon the lamentable words which she had undertaken to read, and bewail'd the misfortune of a Prince whom she judg'd worthy of a better fortune. But while she was thus employ'd, the Emperour enter'd the Closet; and whether it were the suddenness of his entry, or the melancholy wherewith Thrasimond's misfortune had disturb'd her, he was upon her before she perceiv'd him. Her innocency could not chuse but blush, seeing her self surpris'd with the Letter in her hand, but she was in a greater perplexity, when the Emperour having taken it out of her hand in jest, and casting his eyes upon it, knew it to be Thrasimond's hand by what he had seen before in the Verses which Tiberina had found, and it may be several other times, and when he farther told her he knew that hand, and that it was easie now to see whither Thrasimond wrote as well as he spake. Eudoxia was in a little study for some few minutes, but recollecting her self sooner than she could have done had she been guilty, and putting her hand upon the Letter just as Theodosius was going about to look over it, You will not find in that Letter, said she, any thing to satisfy your curiosity, and therefore since Thrasimond has confided more in me than in any other person, who sought to know his mind, I beg of you, Sir, that while he stays here, which will not be long, that he may not see himself betrayed by my imprudence.

She spake these words to the Emperour with such a serious behaviour, keeping her hand upon the Letter, that out of the fear which he had to displease her, he was not hasty to contradict her; whereupon the Empress having recovered it again, threw it into the fire. She told the Emperour afterwards with less disturbance, that there was something in the Paper that she had desired to know before Thrasimond's departure, and that thereby she had understood more of his affairs than by all that he had confess'd in the Garden. The Emperour having after that demanded of her how he receiv'd those things which she sent him, and how he was satisfied with him, she made answer how he had testified a very great acknowledgment thereof to Chrisaphius, and to shew how reasonable the good office which she had done him was, she believ'd that he would depart the next day, to find out in some other place the happiness which he could not obtain in our Court. The Emperour signified his sorrow for his departure, and spoke of him with large expressions of the esteem he had for him. But the next day, instead of seeing him come to take leave of him, as they believ'd he would have done, they understood that he was detain'd in his Bed by a violent Fever, and the day after they heard that the Physicians were in despair of his life. The Emperour, who was very sorry for his departure, and who would have endeavour'd to have detain'd him, had he not believ'd, by what the Empress had told him, that he could not recover his repose at Constantinople, was much more troubled for his sickness; and the Empress, though she were not sensible of his love, was much afflicted to hear that his life was in so much danger, and not doubting but the orders which she had sent him were the cause of his present condition, there were certain intervals of time wherein all the severity of her virtue could not hinder her from repenting of what she had done.

In the interim, it was very true that Prince Thrasimond was dangerously sick, but it was no less certain that his sickness was the cause of his comfort, and though he contributed rather to the increasing of it, than to the cure. Not that he obstinately refus'd the Physick which they gave him; for besides that he was of a mild disposition, and submissive to the will of his Friends, he would not discover all his despair for fear of discovering the cause. But certain it is that he neglected what he durst refuse, and that instead of having any desire to recover his health, he look'd upon his sickness as the way to death, and his death as the last end of all his troubles, and the fairest satisfaction which he could give to Eudoxia for the offence which he had committed. But being well below'd by all persons of both Sexes in our Court, there were few that were not extremely sorry for his sickness; but above all the rest, I was touch'd to the very bottom of my heart; nor could I see death before his eyes with so little sorrow, or so little desire of his recovery, without abandoning my my self to an entire grief, and giving him those marks of kindness which in the midst of all his sickness, forced him to be sensible thereof, and did not a little afflict him to see my sufferings for him; Is it possible, (said he to me one day with a feeble voice, but with a good courage) that you can look with dissatisfaction, upon the only cure that I can hope for of my misfortune: and since you your self can imagine no other, are you troubled to see them brought to a period by a death, less cruel than the sufferings to which I am expos'd? Do you not only know that by the orders of Eudoxia, I was upon the point of departing from you in all likelihood for ever? and is it not the same thing to be separated by a death that will deliver me from all my troubles, rather than by an absence which removing me from your self and Eudoxia, would never cure me of a torment much more cruel, than that which you fear so much should befall me. I will dye, added he presently after, since it is the will of the Gods and my destiny: and since in living I am so unhappy as to displease my adored Eudoxia; I hope that my death will appease her anger, and that I shall move her pity that could not move her affection. Ab Thrasimond (said I overwhelmed with grief) that your thoughts and resolutions should be so unworthy of your courage, how shameful a thing it is to see a Prince like you, a Prince that upon all important enterprizes have shew'd so many proofs of the largeness of your soul, submitting himself so meanly to his passion, without being able to make use of his vertue to relieve him: Are you the only person in the world that ever loved? Are you the only person whom fortune has not favoured in his affections, or rather are you the only person that have not succeeded in an enterprize, which was both unlikely and improbable: And when it is most certain that you ought not to expect from Eudoxia, that which with all your merit you have no reason to hope, are you therefore so weakly and miserably to abandon your self over to grief and to despair, why do you not rather wait? for we are no longer to contend with your passion: why do you not rather expect from time, from your services, from the proofs of your affection, that which you have not obtained by your first address? and since that in all likelihood the conquest of Eudoxia's heart was not so easie a victory, why do you not assay, as all other lovers do, to vanquish it by perseverance and fidelity. Ab Martian, said he, you know you never spake to me before in this manner, and though in the condition I now am in you say this to flatter me, you can tell that you never permitted me to hope any thing, by my perseverance or my fidelity, and that it was your opinion that my friends, could do no more for me than lament my misfortune.

I knew how to answer him well enough, and I had reasons enough to convince his: but beside that he produced none, that contest did but augment his Fever, which made me put an end to it, conjuring him to take some rest: and assuring him that if for the love of his friends, he would be assisting to his own cure, they would not despair to do him better kindnesses than those of lamenting his misfortune. He was sometimes apprehensive of this promise, and out of the natural vivacity of his wit, I did sometimes persuade him to yield to many things that I requested of him. But in the interim his distemper became so violent, that there was more fear than hope of his life: and then it was that my grief surpass'd the bounds of moderation, and caused me to make a diligent enquiry after all remedies that might conduce to the preservation of such a friend, without minding those considerations which till then had kept me more reserv'd, and which I had never thought on in all my life, had I not been so concern'd for his, and had not verily believed that I might a little slacken my duty for his preservation. The Emperour had visited him the third day of his sickness, had spoken to him in the most obliging expressions in the world: and by the care which he took to send several times to visit him, and to employ his Physicians and other Officers about him; he shew'd how much he was concern'd for the preservation of his life. The Empress and Pulcheria sent often to his Apartment, to inform themselves how he was, as being a person who was not slightly valued by them, but they had not seen him; which was the less wondred at, because it was not an ordinary thing, for persons of their rank to visit men unless they were their near relations, nor did Thrasimond himself take it amiss. But as I took more care of his life than he himself, I thought upon all things that might preserve it: and I believed it lawful for me so to do, in such a case of necessity. To which purpose one evening going out of his Chamber, I went to the Princess Pulcheria: and the Princess immediately enquiring of me how I found him, as a person much concern'd, she easily judg'd by the answer I made and the sadness she saw in my look, that there was more reason of fear than hope. She seem'd then full of pity, and after she had testified to me in most obliging language, how excellently she was afflicted for the misfortune of this poor Prince, as well in regard of his own merit as the friendship that was between us, and the interest which she saw me take in his misery; I make no doubt, said she, but the same cause that makes him suffer so much, is the same that hastens his death: and had you not conceal'd it so obstinately, I had perhaps assisted you in seeking out the means of his relief. I had also kept his counsel, and you saw what I did the other day as well for him as you, whose perplexity I took notice of when Tiberina would have read his verses to the Emperour. You did, said I, like Pulcheria, that is to say like a Princess equally replenished with prudence and goodness: Nor need you doubt also Madam, but that if it might have been permitted, not only for the fidelity which I owe my friend, but for the respect which I bear your self, to have disclosed his mind to you, I should have done it with all the resignation of my obedience to your will. There are no persons in the world, to whom I would have sooner discovered it than to your self: and when you shall understand it, as perhaps you may too soon, you will see Madam that I could not discover it without venturing your displeasure. You will very much wonder, said the Princess, if by what you tell me and what I have seen, I should already make a shrewd conjecture, and should have no more need of your discovery to understand a mystery which you have so long conceal'd. I should not so much wonder, said I, as you believe: and as Prince Thrasimond is in a condition, not to fear any thing farther of his fortune, and that out of your pity, if you have any for him, it be in your power yet to save his life; if you will permit me to hope that you will use, your utmost endeavours to retrieve him from the grave, I will make no scruple to inform you all that I know. You need not doubt, said she, but that I shall be very ready to do a kindness of that importance, and that in doing any thing for you, I shall receive a great satisfaction, if I may contribute to the preservation of so worthy a Prince as Thrasimond. If it be so, said I, there is nothing ought to hinder me from declaring to you, that which his death will suddenly make publick to all the world, and you have discern'd the truth, if you conjectured that it is for the Empress that Thrasimond dyes. Now you see that it became me not to make you this confession, but upon the extremity of his life: and that I could not do it without making my self in some measure, an offender against my duty to the Emperour. However I assure you that I do not find any check upon my conscience, and that I made no other use of the knowledge of my friends passion, but to oppose it with all the arguments, that my duty and the care that I had of his repose could furnish me withal. His passion has been too strong for my counsel, and it came to the knowledge of the Empress, rather by means of the authority which she used, than out of any intention of his: His passion was perhaps innocent, and respectful enough to merit pardon: But the Empress was wary in this condition, and perhaps another person would not have been bound so rigorously to that severity: and though out of her admirable prudence she made no noise of these dispatches, but only that she had solicited them out of her meer goodness, yet she sent her orders to the poor Prince to depart: so that while she only intended to banish him from her sight, I fear she has exil'd him from the society of men.

I told her then at large what pass'd between the Empress and Thrasimond in the Garden, and inform'd her of the orders which Chrisaphius had carried to the Prince, and the sad effect which they produced, not mentioning the letter which he had wrote to the Empress, not believing that would any way make for my design: and when I saw that she continued to hearken to me with all calmness and attention, after I had told her all those things, or at least that she took no disgust against a miserable person, who was in a condition rather to move pity than anger; "You do not imagine Madam, said I, that I go about to solicit your goodness to assist Thrasimond, in attempting the affection of the Empress, nor did I ever dream of doing him any such piece of service, but if out of the compassion which his misfortune and the grief which I have to see him perish, you will preserve his life by letting the Empress know that he does not at all desire to live, you will do an action worthy the grandeur of your soul, and which can never be ill interpreted upon such an occasion as this. Pulcheria listened patiently to my discourse, and when I had made an end of speaking looking upon me with a smile; "You know well, Martian, said she, what it is that you desire of me, and few persons will believe that Pulcheria was ever so employed: but to continue the testimonies of that esteem which I have for you, and to succour a Prince whose merit I consider, and lament his misfortune, to retrieve him from that low condition in to which he is fallen, it shall not be my fault that Thrasimond does not recover his health. If it succeed, you must advise him to make use of it, to seek out the means how to recover his liberty, and I think he can hope no more neither from you nor me.

She told me afterwards that she had suspected the truth a good while before, and that it was rather out of that suspicion than for any other cause, that she hindred Paulina from reading his verses. That she would speak to the Empress, and that she hoped not only to bring her to visit Thrasimond, but also to speak to him that which she thought most necessary to conduce to his cure, and to tell him that she had no such distaste against him, to hinder him from desiring it. But it after that he recovered his health, then that she should immediately depart, not so much to satisfy Eudoxia, who could not perhaps be offended at a respectful affection, but for fear of giving any occasion of jealousy to the Emperour, whose disposition she knew, which though it were very mild was very precise in that point. I declared to to her that my thoughts were conformable to hers, that I desired nothing but Thrasmond's life, and that I should persuade him to depart so soon as he had recovered health, so that after I had return'd her thanks for her promises with all the submissive acknowledgment, I went away very well satisfied, as well for the hopes which I had conceiv'd of my friend's life, as for the proof which the Princess had upon this occasion given me of the value she had for me.

The same Evening she visited the Empress, and discours'd her particularly upon this very subject, to whom after she had told her errand, she gave her those praises that were due to her virtue and good conduct, and laid before her all the most obliging arguments she could upon that occasion; and after she had commended the honesty and prudence of her proceeding, she said to her with a smile, that though she was not to love Thrasmond with an affection that might displease the Emperour, she was not to let him die, and prosecute her resentment so far for an offence that deserv'd no such cruelty of punishment, and that she ought to restore him to a condition to perform those orders she had sent him; Eudoxia could not chuse but blush at the beginning of Pulcheria's discourse, but afterwards recovering her self, she hearkened to the rest with more seriousness; and as it was easie for her to lay aside her prudence, and rely upon her authority, whatever should happen upon this adventure, she confess'd to her more than I had said, and discovered to her the trouble she was in when the Emperour surpris'd her with the Letter in her hand, and what she had ventured against her own quiet, to hinder the disturbance of the Emperour's repose. Afterwards she told her, that she was wholly govern'd by her advice, upon which she would rely in all things; and as she did really pity Thrasmond's misfortune, and desire his recovery, she would without any scruple do what the Princess desired, in order to the saving of his life, and so much the rather for that Pulcheria undertook so to order matters, that the Emperour himself should oblige her to visit the Prince. Pulcheria desired her to send Chrisaphius before to enquire how he did, and to tell him in her behalf how much she was afflicted for his being sick. All that she did the morrow morning: but if the poor Thrasmond trembled at the sight of Chrisaphius when he brought him his terrible orders, he no sooner heard his obliging message, but he admitted a passion into his Soul, that probably was not to come there any more. As he had his senses very quick, he said nothing to the Eunuch that did discover any thing more than he had a desire he should know, so that upon his first coming into the Chamber, the Prince took from his lips the Bracelet which the Empress had given him at the Tilting, which he continually kiss'd; but a little after calling him close to his Bed-side, and whispering to him, he ask'd him what news of the Letter which he had given him; whereupon the Eunuch relating to him the truth of what had pass'd, inform'd him of the care which the Empress took to conceal his Letter from the Emperour, and the hazard she had thereby expos'd her self unto; whereupon he permitted himself to be flatter'd with a thought that presented it self at that instant to his mind, and persuad'd him that he was not so unhappy as he believ'd himself. These thoughts for some time brought a little colour back into his cheeks, and infus'd some inclinations into his Soul to desire life, which he hated but some minutes before; but he was more sensibly surpris'd when he saw that Pulcheria and the Empress were come to visit him, as indeed they presently after did by the will of the Emperour who upon the advice of Pulcheria, had himself made it his request to the Empress.

It seem'd to the amorous Prince not only as if a new day had been entred into his Chamber with Eudoxia, but that the Heavens were open'd for him, and that he had been transported to the Seats of the Blessed. For by that sight he was troubled in such a manner, though with a very pleasing trouble, that it did more than all his sickness had done, for it took away part of his reason and his knowledge; and indeed it was much that so sweet a surpris, finding him in so great a weakness, had not made him lose all his understanding; not that he attributed the favour which he received, either to Eudoxia, or Pulcheria, or the Emperour; but from whence soever it came, he could not receive it without being transported in his mind, nor could he see that which he adored, which he thought he should have died without ever seeing again, without a strong commotion and extraordinary seizure, that render'd him so incapable of all things, that it did not permit him so much as to return a reply to the first complements of Eudoxia and Pulcheria. However, he answer'd them with eyes fix'd upon the countenance of his too much beloved object, in so passionate a manner, that if the darkness of the place had not conceal'd a good part thereof, Pulcheria had no need of what I had told her to inform her of the truth. I was in the Chamber, and as I was the better friend of Thrasmond, I did my obeysance both to the Empress and Pulcheria. But after they had sat a little while upon the Bed's side, which time they spent in informing themselves of the condition of his health, and testifying their sorrow for his sickness, all which they perform'd in a most obliging manner. The Princess, willing to do what she thought was necessary for his recovery, and to let me see how she would acquit her self of the promise she had made, told me she had something to say to me, and rising up from the Bed-side, she took me apart to the other end of the Chamber, and left Eudoxia sitting by Thrasimond. Though the Empress were prepar'd for all this, yet she could not chuse but blush to see Pulcheria gone, nor was she without some little shame, to see her self so engag'd, though her intentions were wholly innocent; Thrasimond could not but with a great deal of joy behold himself alone in her company, and though the fear of displeasing her shut his lips, and that he made her stay a good while without speaking to her any other ways than by his looks; at last judging that in the condition he was in there was no necessity for him to observe those punctilios, as if he had expected longer life, or to stay long near the Empress, struggling with his weakness how to express himself, and preventing with certain sighs what he was about to say to the Empress, I beg your pardon, Madam, said he with a faint voice, if I have not obeyed the orders which you sent me, and I hope that your goodness will spare me, in the condition wherein you see me. Had it been possible for me, I had not delayed my obedience, but what I should have accomplish'd by my departure, I will complete by my death, which shall no less deliver you from the sight of a miserable person that has displeas'd you, which perhaps my absence could not so effectually have done. I accept it also as a relief against the misfortunes of my life, and as a satisfaction which I owe to your just anger; and since it must serve me in both extremities, I willingly receive it; I will not endeavour to justify my thoughts, which could not be innocent since they offended you, and without doubt I deserv'd death because you condemn'd me to it. So favourable to me is death in my misfortunes, and so honourable in so good a cause, that I should be unworthy of so glorious a destiny, and unworthy of the favour with which you have honoured me this day, should I murmur at it. My only sorrow is that I can only prostrate at your feet a miserable life, and a life which through the misfortune I have had to displease you, cannot but be odious to me. Had my fortune given me leave, I would have desired to have sacrific'd something more precious; for the Gods are my witnesses, that for my life I would have offer'd it up in the most happy estate, with the same joy as now in this deplorable condition wherein you see me.

The poor Prince spake after this manner, and more he would have said, by the assistance of a passion that strengthened his weakness, but that the fair Eudoxia, who heard him with pity, and had not visited him but in reference to his preservation, thought that a long discourse would prejudice her intentions. Upon this consideration she hindered him from going on, and undertaking the discourse with a carriage full of sweetness: "If hitherto I have declared that your illness caus'd in me as well compassion as sorrow, you may well believe I shall much more lament your death; and that you cannot have done me a greater injury than to think that I desired any such severe satisfaction: In sending you those things which were presented from me, perhaps I let you know that you would do well to absent your self from this place. But when I gave you that advice, I neither did it out of any motion of anger, or any prejudice to your person, but only knowing the miserable life which you led for my sake, and the little likelihood of your being happy here; and out of the hope I had that in your absence from us you would lose the remembrance of that which was the cause of your affliction: I might add, nor can you find any thing therein unjust or cruel, that you are not ignorant what my obligations are, and besides those ordinary obligations, those of Athenais to the Emperour Theodosius, by all which you must of necessity judge that a knowledge of your thoughts, such as you gave to me, could not but have wrought a bad effect in the mind of the Emperour, both for me, and perhaps for your self, seeing you do not so well conceal it, that it could have been long kept secret. Having these arguments for you absent, I thought I had us'd sufficient moderation to perswade you that it was not your death which I desired, and that I had neither any hatred or prejudice against you: but seeing my proceedings have produc'd an effect so contrary to my intentions, I must tell you that I do not only not desire your death, but that I am willing you should live, and that you can no way better manifest the care that you have to oblige me, than in doing all that lies in your power for the preservation of your life.

These words, though they signified to the amorous Prince but an imperfect happiness, yet they gave not a little satisfaction to his unquiet mind; and though he saw well that Eudoxia did not engage her self by her discourse, yet he made a right conjecture that so great a care of his health could not proceed from any thoughts but such as were far from hatred or anger, and that therefore he was not possibly so unfortunate as to desire death with so much vehemency, vehemency, nor to oppose himself to what the Empress condescended to for the preservation of his life. In the midst of these thoughts, and beholding her with eyes, which, as dejected and languishing as they were, sparkled with his love, As I cannot, nor ought ever to disobey you, said he, I will endeavour to live, since you command me; and it may be, Madam, you shall see that I shall shew you a proof of my obedience far greater, in reserving my self to an unfortunate life, than I should do in abandoning my self to a death that may be avoided, since you otherwise decree. “As you have both virtue and reason, replied Eudoxia, I am in good hopes your life will no way prove unfortunate; but though it should be so, I desire you once more to labour for its preservation, nor expect the continuation of my friendship but upon that condition.

Concluding these words, she rose from her Seat, telling the Princess, that considering the condition wherein Thrasimond lay, it was not convenient to make a long visit. And Pulcheria, who had not in all that time spoken any thing to me but of Thrasimond, drawing near his Bed, most obligingly besought him to mind his recovery, and to shew that he had both courage and virtue to vanquish both the sickness of his body, and the disturbances of his mind. After that they retired, and left him in a condition to examine the estate of his body. The rest of that day he employed in that study, and though he knew Eudoxia too well to hope to be perfectly happy, or to attribute what she did for him to any other causes than her moderation and goodness: when he reflected upon all that had pass'd, and that he argued thereupon with an inclination to judge favourably of his fortune, he considered that he had spoken, that he had writ, and withal that he was not odious, that the Empress was not ignorant what his thoughts were for her, that she had conceal'd all this from the Emperour, and that in doing so she had expos'd her self to some hazard, and that she had testified that she desired the preservation of his life; and that after his thoughts had walk'd over all these things, he saw some ground to believe that he was not altogether unhappy, and that he was not forbid to hope a better fortune. Though I had no intention to engage him farther in a passion of which I sought so affectionately to cure him, if it were possible, I was unwilling however to contradict those thoughts that might seem to flatter him; so that I furthered his belief of all things which I thought might advantage his recovery. You can hardly imagine the effects which the satisfaction of his mind wrought upon the distemper of his body, and how powerfully that admirable receipt work'd for his cure. For certain it is, that the day following there was an apparent amendment, so that he, of whose life all persons so lately despair'd, now recovered so visibly, and in such a manner, that in two days we were assured of his life, and in four or five after his Fever quite left him. Eudoxia came once more to visit him, together with the Emperour, whom she brought along with her; and though she spake nothing to him then in particular, however he thought that he observed nothing in her eyes less favourable than in her first visit, and that she shewed no more prejudice toward him than she had done before the knowledge of his love: there were few persons indeed that were not deceived in the carriage of the Empress as well as he; and as she had an intention only to help him out of the danger into which he was fallen for her sake, there was not any thing which she did, that did not give him less cause to fear than hope: and to shorten this story wherein perhaps I have too tedious, you must know, that in a short time after, he got up, and at length perfectly recovered his health, and found himself in a better condition than he was before his sickness.

His recovery caus'd no less gladness than his sickness had been the occasion of much sorrow, and thereupon I return'd my thanks to the Princess Pulcheria, for what she had done for him, with so much sincerity, that thereby she soon perceiv'd how deeply I was concern'd for him: nor did she seem in the least to repent of her kindness. But one day that we were talking of him, after she had heard some expressions of my acknowledgment; Marian, said she, I have done for you at this time, that which possibly few persons in the world durst have requested of me, and although perhaps I have acted nothing which you did not innocently intend, I cannot tell whether the Emperour would approve at that I have done, had he the knowledge thereof. His disposition is soft and mild in every other thing as well you know, but in this I am not so well assured of his meekness. And as you see well that I acted for the preservation of Thrasimond, if the cure of his sickness have not withal completed the cure of his passion, I desire you to helpe your self for his satisfaction and ours, which he may disturb by any longer stay in our Court, and gently to persuade him to seek those remedies in absenting himself, which he will hardly find by tarrying here. Eudoxia. “I find, Madam, said I, that I shall have more trouble to do him a discomfiture than you had to do him a kindness. And though I doubt not but that he will be very ready to obey the Empress's commands, if he have any notice thereof;

“ thereof, yet perhaps it may occasion a relapse worse than the sickness of which you have “ cured him; however, in obedience to your desires, I will endeavour what a friend can “ do without the ruine of his friend, and I will fortifie with my counsel and entreaties “ those reasons which ought to oblige him to absent himself, but it will be convenient for “ you to send your orders by some other person; for I shall not be able to serve you in this “ affair. You believe then, (said she, with a behaviour that had something in it more than ordinary) that the absence of the person beloved is a thing so cruel, than a man of courage and virtue cannot easily support it. “ There are some circumstances, replied I, that make the ab“ sence of the person who is beloved, more or less intollerable than others, and though I “ believe a man of courage may easily endure what his fortune, or the desire of honour, or
 “ the service of that person whom he loves, causes him to suffer, and which is not likely to “ be of any long continuance, I cannot apprehend how he can submit to an absence com“ manded him by the person belov’d, or rather to an eternal banishment. Then, (said she very seriously) you would be very much troubled to dispose of your self, and the person whom you lov’d, if you love any, would find you but a disobedient servant upon the same occasion.
 These words terrified me not a little, and caused me to pause for some time, without making any answer; but afterwards recollecting my self, In any extremity, said I, I shall ever obey the person whom I love, even till death, but whatever resignation I make to her will, and whatsoever honour I gain by my obedience to her commands, you may well imagine, Madam, that I could not receive her commands without a signal affliction. There are several reasons, added the Princess, to aggravate or lessen that sorrow; for as those orders which you call a banish- ment might proceed from a favourable intention, they may have sometimes a very obliging cause:
and that person that shall find his absence desired out of a fear of his merit, cannot but reap a great satisfaction by the knowledge thereof. I believe, Madam, said I, that few persons were ever banished upon that consideration; and as I have no such merit which the person whom I love can fear, and that there is no merit which she can think worthy of any consideration, I am not in danger to find so cruel an effect of so glorious a cause. There may happen things, replied the Princess, that never happened yet; and seeing the fortune of men is subject to many revolu- tions, there are few accidents against which we ought not to prepare our selves. She uttered these words with a calm reserv’dness, and left me the rest of the day in a strange meditation, what should be the occasion of that discourse of hers to me: I ponder’d upon it till morning with no small perplexity; but finding the Princess, as soon as I saw her next, the very same that she was before, my fear left me, out of the belief that I had that there was no foundation for it.

In the mean time, the passion of Thrasimond (for you see ’tis rather the story of his life, than my own which I relate) instead of being weakened by his distemper, seem’d to have gather’d greater strength; for being permitted as soon as he got abroad to see the Empress as he was accustomed to do, the sight of her, and the remembrance of that goodness which she had shewn him, increas’d those fires that were kindled before. However, he saw that the Empress gave him no opportunity to speak to her in particular, as at other times, and that she would not discourse alone with him in any place where-ever she met him. But as he knew that she was not ignorant of what he suffered for her, and that he was not oblig’d to conceal what he had in his heart from her, he spake to her with his looks, as eloquently as if he had discours’d her with his tongue; and as his passion many times transported him beyond his reason, his eyes express’d themselves in such a manner, that many times Eudoxia was asham’d of it, and Pulcheria fear’d that they would soon discover what her discretion had conceal’d; and I was almost dead for fear, lest others besides our selves, and consequently the Emperour, should come to know the truth. This fear made Eudoxia blame Pulcheria for what she had done, and Pulcheria to blame me, and to desire me to advise Thrasimond to depart before those things happened that were so likely to fall out, and which might have been so easily prevented. But though I promis’d fair to the Princess, yet had I not the courage to speak to him of it; for though he was perfectly cured, yet he made no proffers to be gone, nor any way prepared for his journey. One Evening the Emperour being upon the Terrass of which I have spoken, together with the Empress, the Princess and all the Court, and seeing Thrasimond among the rest he call’d him to him, and after he had highly complemented him, he told him, if it pleas’d him so to do, and that it stood with the conveniency of his affairs, he need not to think of leaving a place where he was so highly in esteem, and where all persons were glad to see him, though there was none but the Empress that knew his whole mind, and that he had not confidence enough in him to trust him with his secret concern: Thrasimond made answer to this obliging discourse with a becoming respect, though blushing, and with a timorous countenance,

and without saying any thing whether he would go or stay. But Endoxia who had impatiently heard the discourse, yet was unwilling to speak any thing (especially before Thrasimond, being gone a little farther off, and seeing her self alone with the Emperour, “ Sir, jud she, “ if you knew how cruel you were to seek to retain a person who visibly pines away here, “ and may in another place live with that comfort and repose, which he has lost among us; “ I know you would discourse him in another manner than you did: and because I know his “ mind as you told him I did, I entreat you to give me leave to solicit his departure, which “ I know to be necessary for the preservation of his life. “ You may do as you please, re- “ plied the Emperour, but I do not find that Thrasimond has such a desire to leave us, as you “ would persuade us to believe: which makes me think, added he smiling, that either you “ have a prejudice against him, or else that he is in love with you.

These words made the Empress blush in such a manner, that had not the Emperour been slow in observing her countenance, he might easily have perceived that she spoke the truth, of what he conjectured in these last words: But soon recovering her self, and not being willing to be long ere she gave the Emperour an answer; Neither have I, said she, any prejudice against a Prince of so much merit as Thrasimond, and so much in your favour: nor is he in a condition to be in love with me. But Sir, laughing as she concluded, then you judge, said she, that Thrasimond’s love if he have any for me, is a sufficient cause of banishment. I do not say it were a just reason, replied the Emperour, but if I were in his place I should extremely fear it, from a virtue so severe as yours; and in truth this eagerness of yours to send him going, gives me a great suspicion of it. I hope you will not continue long in that opinion, replied Endoxia, and that you will find by the deportment of Thrasimond, that his inclinations are in another place. That little discourse confirm’d her in her design, and it seeming to her that the Emperour did instruct her what she had to do with Thrasimond, were he in love with her: She resolv’d upon it without any more ado, though not without some motions of pity and grief, for the diskindness which her duty oblig’d her to shew to a person that ador’d her, especially seeing that neither his person nor his love was distasteful to her.

The next day knowing that Thrasimond and I, were with the Princess Pulcheria in her Apartment, thither came the Empress and found us there, with several other persons belonging to the Court. At first the discourse was general, but a while after the Empress told Pulcheria, she had something to say to her in private: and that was enough to make those persons that understood themselves retire. Thrasimond and I went out of the Cabinet as well as the rest, but upon the sign that Endoxia gave her, Pulcheria called us back and told us we might tarry: and seeing that ever since his recovery he had observed the Empress, to avoid all occasions of speaking with him in particular, his heart misgave him that that reservedness boated him no good from her intentions. It was not long ere he knew the certainty, but Pulcheria unwilling to be present to hear, what the Empress would say to Thrasimond though earnestly entreated, took me aside to a window that looked into the Gardens, leaving Thrasimond and the Empress alone at the other end of the Closet, with so much the more freedom, because she had opened the window and stood looking out into the Garden. Thrasimond was fate down by the command of Endoxia, and expected his destiny trembling, when the Empress after a short silence beholding him with a look wherein there was both sweetness and majesty; Thrasimond, said she, when I visited you in your sickness, I told you that I had no ill will for you or prejudice against you: and I spoke this as well out of pure sincerity, as out of the opinion that I was persuaded into, that it would be of great consequence to hasten your cure. If this assurance proved successful I am very well satisfied, and though I see you in a condition now not to have any farther need thereof, I will add that instead of prejudice or distaste I have a true esteem for you: and that there is no person that shall be more concern’d, for your repose and happiness than my self, and that out of an apprehension much different from that of other persons, I do not find my self offended at those marks, which you have given me of your affection: I must tell you also that I find more reason, to shew you favour than to be angry with you, and that all the thoughts which the knowledge of your love has infused into me, tend rather to procure your happiness than to displease you. Having told you all these things that another person more nice perhaps and scrupulous, would not have told you with so much reality; I must desire you to consider who I am, what is my duty, and how far my ability extends: and to consider that together with the obligations of my duty and virtue, I have these more particular that you are not ignorant of, whereby that which would be looked upon as a small fault in another person, would in me become a crime most detestible, and a treacherie that would render me unworthy your esteem. I have a husband worthy of something more precious than my affections and fidelity, a Husband who is Emperour of the East, and a Husband who from a mean fortune, has rais’d me to the biggest dignity in the world. Besides he loves me now more tenderly than ever he loved me yet, he seeks out every day new ways to oblige me, and he merits in his person whatever I owe to his kind deeds, though he were less worthy to be beloved for his desert. In short (though that consideration is not to be alledged among virtuous persons) he sees you every day, believes you are in love, and now begins to suspect that it is with me. By all these things which you know as well as I, you see there is a necessity which obliges you to be gone from this place: and out of the good opinion which I have of you, I do not doubt though I should entreat you to stay, the fear which you would have of injuring my repose, my honour and all things dear to me; would not hinder you from so far condescending to my request. 'Tis not a banishment which I command you, but a necessity which I lay before you, which you are constrain'd to obey at the price it self of both our lives. I should submit without doubt had I the same thoughts for you as you have for me, and I desire you to prepare your self, without accusing of inhumanity a person, who believing you have nothing of cruelty in your heart for her, has nothing of severity in hers for you. The absence of a few months will settle your mind in its former tranquillity: and I am apt to hope that you will have no need of your courage, nor I of all the credit and reputation I have with you, to encline you to a willing compliance with my desires.

Having finished these words with a steady and resolute countenance, wherein however some marks of tenderness appeared, she rose from her seat not staying for answer, which pity made her afraid to hear, when casting her eyes upon Thrasimond's countenance, she beheld therein all the true colours of death, and at the same instant she saw him fall from his seat, upon the floor like a person without life, or rather like one in a swoon. At the noise which he made in falling, the Princess and I looked that way, and seeing him in that condition I ran to him: and having lifted him up and seated him in a Chair next the wall; I strove all I could to make him come to himself. Neither the Empress nor the Princess were willing to leave him without relief, but because they feared that by divulging the accident the cause would be known, they were at a stand, not knowing whether they were best to call the women and servants of the Princess or no. At length believing that that swooning of Thrasimond, would be taken for an effect of his late sickness, she called two women to the Closet door, and commanded them to fetch her some water. While they were throwing water in the Prince's face, and doing their utmost to recover him; Pulcheria was very much troubled, and it was as much as Eudoxia could do to refrain, from shewing greater marks of her compassion than she desired. At length Thrasimond came to himself, and opening his eyes he saw the Empress sitting by him in such a condition, that had he observ'd her looks he might easily have perceived, that she was not insensible of his grief. And for that Pulcheria seeing him come to himself, was retir'd at a distance from him, having first commanded the women to depart the room: he was by that means alone with the Empress, who as soon as he spy'd the opportunity; Oh Madam, said he, why did you not let me dye, when favourable death offered me his relief: For since it was your purpose to take away my life, why would you prolong my pains to make my death more miserable? I have done, said the Empress, all that I promised to do, and I did it willingly to retrieve you, from that danger wherein you were thought to be. My intention was to preserve your life and not to take it away, and I have so little alter'd it, that you can never give me a proof of your affection, that can be dearer to me than in doing your utmost for your own preservation. I make no question but you will do it, and that as soon as you can you will depart from a place, where you had been always most gladly welcome, had you remained in a condition to permit it. Yes Madam, (said the Prince with a dejected look,) I shall be gone from you since you command me, and it will be more easie for me to obey that command, than it will that of commanding me to live. I equally desire of you both the one and the other, said Eudoxia, and I expect both the one and the other from your courage, from your virtue, and the consideration you have of my honour and repose.

Concluding these words with a look that had nothing of anger in it, she rose from her seat and went out of the Closet, without giving the Prince any liberty to make a reply. Had Pulcheria followed the motions of her compassion, she had gone to him to comfort him in the extremity he was in: but because she was unwilling to let him know that she understood the whole truth, as well for fear it might displease him as for other considerations; she commanded me to stay with him to do him those offices, which he might expect from my friendship, till he was able to go out, and she her self followed the Empress into her own Chamber. Thrasimond continued in his Chair more than half dead, not being able to rise neither for the one nor the other when they went forth. For a good while he wanted all other language but looks and sighs, but when he began to unfold his grief in words, his expressions were so piercing and so lamentable, that had I never loved him I could not but have taken pity on him. I obliged him at length to rise, and causing him to go out of the Closet, at the door that opened into the Terrace walk, I led him to his own Apartment,

where he might give a greater liberty to his grief: there he gave himself up to his sorrows all the rest of that day, so that many times I lost the hope which I had promised myself in his resolution, while he all the while uttered complaints of his misfortune, that would have softened the most stony hearts. It would be a difficult thing to recite them, besides that they would extend the story to a tedious and irksome prolixity: and therefore to let them pass, I will only tell you that not being willing to leave Thrasimond in the condition wherein he was, I stayed with him all that night: and having given the first impetuosity of his grief, liberty to tire it self, and to waste the torrent of his tears and complaints, which it was impossible to stop for some hours, I gave him all those exhortations, when he was in a condition to hear me, which I thought might prevail with him to take a better resolution. I also endeavoured to persuade him, that his misfortune was not so great as he represented it to himself, and though the Empress urged thereto by the necessity of her duty, to which she could by no means oppose her self, ordered him to depart; yet he might well observe by her looks, in her discourse, and by her general deportment towards him, that she did it not without a vehement compulsion, and without letting him understand that he was no indifferent person in her thoughts. To this I added all that could make for his consolation, and all that I could imagine might oblige him, to employ his courage in that extremity: and at length I so well composed his mind, and managed the confidence that he had in me, that I made him understand that it was impossible for him ever to see Eudoxia there, or that she should suffer him to tarry longer where she was, if time could not procure him other remedies: so that he resolved at last to hearken to reason rather than to his despair, and to depart like a man of courage and in such a manner, that the Emperour should have no more ground to find out the certainty of a truth, of which already he had a suspicion. In short, murthering his grief, he composed himself so well, that the next day he did what I desired, with a better resolution than I expected. He took his leave of the Emperour who testified no small sorrow for his departure, and spoke to him in such obliging expressions, that thereby he found that the suspicion which the Emperour had of his love, had not produced any bad effect in his thoughts. Pulcheria treated him with all manner of courtesie, and all the marks of value and esteem, and the Empress who avoided all occasions of taking any particular leave, especially before the Emperour, for fear of some accident, gave him sufficiently to understand at that separation, as well by her looks as by her discourse and in all the rest of her deportment, that she had no hatred for him. Then it was that he stood in need of all his resolution, upon the Empreses addresses, to assist him, to hide the trouble and disorder of his spirit. After he had taken his leave he would not tarry a moment in Constantinople, nor could I prevail with him to go with me, and stay some few days at my house in the country, to gather strength, and to put himself in a condition fit for Travel. Had he travelled by land I had accompanied him some days journey, but he resolved to go by sea: and embarking from Constantinople, we took leave of each other the same day, but yet not without all the marks of tenderness and affection, which two real friends, and such friends who had in their hearts, something more prevalent and powerful than bare friendship, could testify upon such an occasion. I was certain that all that passion which possessed the soul of Thrasimond, could not hinder the sorrow which he had to leave me, and for my part mine was so great to part with him, especially in such a condition; that without that love which fortified my heart against all other passions, I should have found some difficulty to have satisfied my self.

'Twas then in Pulcheria that I sought my comfort, and the consolation of the sorrow which I felt for his departure: but I enjoyed it a very short time, and it was through my own misfortunes, that I became less sensible of Thrasimond's. For three days after the Princess told me, that I was to go to Rome to attend the Emperour Honorius, who a little before was return'd thither from Ravenna, where he had kept his Court a long time, having abandon'd miserable Italy to the fury of the Barbarians. She gave me to understand how important and honourable the employment was, as being to reconcile the two Emperours, betweenwhom there had been an unhappy misunderstanding for some time: For which reason they had not assisted one another against those Enemies, that had invaded both their dominions, as they had done at other times, and as they were truly obliged by their nearness in blood, by the interest of their honour and the good of their Empires. I understood indeed that that journey would be honourable for me, but I gave Pulcheria to understand that if she had procur'd it for Authemius or Paulinus, or any other person that was more worthy of it than my self, I should have been better satisfied, and that the occasions of serving her near her person, would be always more dear, and better acceptable to me than any others. However I submitted to her commands, and some days after having received the orders of the Emperour, I departed from Constantinople towards Rome, where out of the desire I had to return, I us'd my utmost diligence to dispatch my affairs. There I found the Emperour Honorius overwhelmed with that sorrow which mov'd me to pity, though it were less for the ruine of that magnificent City, which had commanded the world for so many years, which every where bore the marks of the Gothish fury, than for the loss of Bellamira, whom the perfidious Heraclius had carried away by force into Africa, where, by her own Heroick Virtue, and the death of Heraclius, she has given Renown so large a Theme to celebrate her praise. However, he received me with an extraordinary civility, and all the marks of his esteem of my person, which I had no way deserv'd, seem'd very sensible of the offer which I made him of our Forces to assist him in his war in Africa, whither he had sent the valiant Artabure, and testified a great desire to reconcile himself for ever with the Emperour his Nephew, and inseparably to joyn interests with him: I need not tell you the particulars of my Commission, of which I discharg'd my self to the utmost of my ability. And when I had dispatch'd all my affairs at Rome, I departed thence, and spurr'd forward with a desire of returning to the Princes, I hasten'd for Constantinople, travelling hard every day. But before I came near it, I received orders from the Emperour to command the Forces that were marching against the Blemian Rebels, and reduce them to obedience. The hopes of winning honour was that which comforted me for the delay of my happiness. In short, I headed the Army, march'd against the Enemy, whom I successfully overthrew, chas'd them from those places which they had assaulted; and having forc'd them back within their own Limits, made them submit to such conditions as I was pleas'd to impose upon them. This war being happily and quickly ended, I sent to give an account of the success to the Emperour, and in one Letter which I wrote to Pulcheria, (for she suffer'd me to write to her about the affairs of the Empire, of which she had the Government in her own hands) after I had given her to understand that my presence was not necessary in a Country where all things were quiet, I begg'd her that I might return to be near her; and not foreseeing the difficulty, I indeed prepar'd for my journey to Constantinople, when together with Letters from the Emperour, wherein he declar'd the satisfaction which he had in the service that I had done, I received one from the Princess Pulcheria in these words.

IT is sometimes a bad thing, Martian, to have too much merit; for as in some accidents it may beget suspicion and envy, it causes it self in others to be more fear'd than lov'd. I knew all your thoughts, but I did not know my own, and it is but the distrust of my self that makes me so cautious as to you, in whom I have all manner of confidence. That which obliges me to esteem you above all other men constrains me to keep you at a distance from our presence, and to desire you not to come back till I recal you: your absence shall produce no bad effect for you; and that which you have most to fear, (if I am not deceiv'd in my judgment of you) is, that you will not be over suddenly recal'd. Your presence disturb'd me in my designs, and perhaps I say enough to make you guess that it troubled my repose, or at least, thwarted my resolutions; when I find that it ceases so to do, I shall take care to send for you. In the mean while be assured, that when it shall so please Heaven, it shall not be my fault if you do not see the effect of your Father's hopes.

Have you ever heard of so odd an accident as this? And could you have believ'd that I could have expected from a humour like Pulcheria's, what I felt upon that occasion? I know not what judgment you may make of it, but I must tell you, that I remain'd some days without being able what to think of my own condition, nor could I determine whether the misfortune which I found in a banishment, to which as well as Tbrasimond, I saw my self condemn'd, might be counterbalanc'd by the honour to have had the glory to disturb Pulcheria's repose, or (if modesty might be permitted to think, after the her self had spoken) in having a merit that was terrible to her: "What an Honour is this, said I, on the one hand! What a misfortune, said I, on the other! But what a happiness, said I again, to find such favourable inclinations for us in the heart of that Princess whom we adore! But what a terrour, cry'd I, to see our selves banish'd, it may be for ever, from the sight of Pulcheria! Ah! if it be for ever, added I, our glory and our happiness will be the greater; and I have nothing more to fear, than that I shall be suddenly recal'd.

“But if this glory continue as long as we live, we shall then never more behold what we
 “so much love, and we shall spend our days in an absence more cruel than death it self.
 “Chuse, Martian, between these two extremities, either to see Pulcheria again, or to be in“different to Pulcheria. I often propos'd to my self this choice, but neither that day, nor in any that followed, had I power to make the election, nor to resolve of which of the two I ought to be most sensible, whether of my happiness, or my misfortune. However,
 I stood firm to my obedience. And having sent back part of my retinue to Constantinople, I resolv'd to travel into places far remote from the place of my banishment, and where I should more easily endure the cruel exilement to which I saw my self condemn'd, than near our Court, where I must live an idle life, hateful to a person of my disposition, being such a one as I could have led at my house in the Country. But before I went, I wrote these words to the Princes.

Martian to the Princess Pulcheria.

‘Tis to the defect, and not to the excess of my deserts that I must attribute my misfortune; for had I had enough to excuse the boldness of my thoughts, I believe, Madam, that you would never have banish'd me. Since they are known to you, I will not disown them, yet probably they were not sufficiently criminal to merit the severe sentence to which I am condemn'd. However, neither will I complain of my misfortune, nor shall I interpret it to my advantage; and as the latter is not permitted me out of the knowledge which I have of my self, so neither am I permitted the former, through the submission which I owe to your commands. It is from them that I shall wait the continuation of my exilement, without examining the cause thereof; and if it must last as long as the favourable thoughts with which you flatter me, I shall hardly desire the end of it, though the rigour of it causes me every day to die. I know not whither I am wandering to lead my life; but since you are no longer ignorant, that it is wholly at your devotion, I believe it may be permitted me to tell you, that the absence to which you condemn me, shall never hinder it from being otherwise as long as I live.

This was the answer which I gave to Pulcheria's Letter. And a few days after, setting forward upon the journey that I had premeditated, I left Thrace, and visited a good part of the fair Cities of Greece, carrying always along with me the image that reigned in my heart, and dividing my thoughts between the grief to see my self exil'd, and the glorious cause of my banishment. I pass'd through Macedonia, and so into Ilyria, and Pannonia; afterwards reduc'd under the power of the Huns by the valiant Balamir. At length I came into Germany, and finding it full of Armies, and almost all intercs'd and involv'd in a war which has made so great a noise in the world, I thought it more honourable for me, and more agreeable to my Birth and inclinations to stay there some time, and to see so many Princes whose reputation flies over all the world, than always to wander without any design; and although by common report this side was not the justest, I did not think it handsome to take Pharamond's part, who was one of the most formidable enemies of the Empire, more especially because the Queen of the Cimbrians and the King of Suevia, who were the chief authors of the war, who had been for some time since our Allies and Confederates, and had not begun the war with Pharamond but for the interest of the Empire: it was therefore to them that I made my address, and as my name was not unknown to them, they receiv'd me very honourably, and by their noble entertainment engag'd me to stay with them. You arriv'd some few days after, and your arrival has bound me faster than any other consideration, since now I understand better than I did, the little justice on their side, and the admirable virtue of their Enemy.

Thus you have heard what you desired of me; and with my own adventures I have mingled Thrasmond's, out of the belief that I had that you might not be a little pleas'd with those of Athenis. And now you see that it was not without reason that I was so scrupulous of discovering my mind: for besides what I owed to the secrets of Thrasmond, which were known only to Pulcheria and my self, you find that the very secret of Pulcheria's thoughts, which all the world knows nothing of, was of sufficient importance to make me conceal it till death, but that I could not hide it from you, since you so obligingly desired

fired the knowledge of it, my confidence in your promise being such, that I dare assure my self I shall never have any cause to repent of the trust which I have repos'd in your friendship.

The End of the Second Book of the Seventh Part.

PHARAMOND.

BOOK III.

THis was the Relation that Martian made; and the Prince of Persia, who listen'd thereto with so much attention, as to let him know how much he was concern'd therein, taking his turn when he had made an end of speaking, "In truth, said he, you have inform'd me things worthy the attention which I gave you with so much delight, and the trust which you have repos'd in me. And though you have made a shorter relation of your own than Thrasimond's affairs, I find in the end something so surprizing, that I can hardly yet recover my self from the astonishment that has seiz'd me. I give my voice however rather for your happiness than for your misfortune; or to say better, I take your happiness to be far more probable than your misfortune. Not believing that the sufferings of absence can be in the least compar'd with not being belov'd, where a man has fix'd so strong an affection. Those others cause only pining and languishment, the other inspires rage and despair. In my opinion, Pulcheria is not only not afraid to love you, as she tells you in her Letter, but loves you most affectionately: and that terrible Maid that despis'd all men, and who in raising her self above her own Sex, has sham'd ours by her great endowments and ability to govern the Empire, has found in your merit that which she avoided, and which she will shun in vain if her heart be touch'd as I imagine it is. I know her pride is such that she can hardly endure the yoke, but I do not despair but that she will submit at last. And as you know of late it has been an ordinary thing to associate Partners in the Empire, that Valens for example was associated by Valentinian, Theodosius the Great by Gratian; and who doubts but that Honorius would have associated Constance after he had given him Placidia, had not their fortune been otherwise dispos'd: I do not therefore hold it impossible but that through the power that Pulcheria has over Theodosius, she may oblige him one day to take you for his Partner in the Empire being married to his Sister, so shall your Father's hopes which I do not find to be ill grounded, and Leontine's Prediction, have their effect. And you see that the Princess instead of opposing them, heightens and encourages these hopes her self. For poor Thrasimond, my Successour in the love of Athenais, I fear his misfortune will endure. But if he will come to us, and seek out the remedy which has cured me, I dare answer for his cure, and promise him that after he has seen Rosamond he will never love any other Beauty. "I do not believe that remedy, said Martian, to be so infallible as you say it is; for though I have with others admired the Beauty of the Cimbrian Queen, and that I truly find therein something supernatural, I do not believe she can work the same effects " upon

“ upon many other hearts, as she has wrought upon yours. And although, (if a true love “ will admit of this confession) I will readily confess that Pulcheria's Beauty is not com“ parable to hers, nor to that of Athenais, yet neither the one or the other have been able “ to make my heart lose any thing of its first impression. “ You have successfully made that “ experiment, said Varanez, because, as I said before, you are belov'd by Pulcheria : But “ did you despair through her cruelty, or the entire loss of your hopes ? As it was my mis“ fortune; and is likely to be Thrasmond's, and that in that condition such a Beauty as Ro- “ samond's should present it self before your eyes, I cannot tell whether you would prove “ so constant in your love, or so obstinate in your opinion, as not to be shaken. “ If that “ reason could effect it, replied Martian, there would be no greater argument to move me “ than this cruel exilement to which I am condemn'd. And although I see my self flatter“ ed with some rays of hope, by some actions of Pulcheria, but more by the words of her “ Letter, yet neither do so far intoxicate me hitherto, as to fill my head with chimeras and “ ridiculous fancies. Pulcheria sports with my misfortune, when she mentions my “ Father's hopes, and for Copartnership in the Empire of which you have spoken, it is “ most certain, that if Honorius were inclin'd to take a companion, (as considering his weak“ ness known to all the world, it might be convenient for him to do) Constance has more “ reason to aspire to that, not only as being of the blood of the great Constantine, but also “ as being the person that by his valour and his renowned actions has been the only support “ of the Western Empire against all its enemies, and who had without doubt defended Ita- “ ly against the fury of the Goths, had he not been detain'd in Gallia by a sickness that had “ reduc'd him to the utmost extremity. The same may be said of the great Theodosius ; but “ for my self who have done nothing considerable, either for the honour, or enlargement of “ the Empire, I should not be wise in nourishing such vain imaginations ; and I am there-“ ly mistaken if Pulcheria (notwithstanding that holiness that possesses some part of her “ thoughts) is not ambitious of Government for all that, and if she does not one day make “ use of that power which she has over the Emperour, to make him take another compa“ nion than her self, whom he has truly made his Partner, causing her to be called Pulche- “ ria Augusta, establishing her in an authority equal to his own, as I was inform'd presently “ after my departure. I have also understood that in this advancement of her power, she “ has done me kindnesses and procured many eminent Employments and high Dignities for “ my Relations and Friends ; but all this in a disposition like hers, is far from that which “ you would persuade me to hope, or rather from that which you feign to hope, only “ for my present consolation. In the midst of this discourse night drew on, whereupon “ they called for Supper, and having taken a short repast, they went both together to visit the “ Queen of the Cimbrians, where that illustrious company, compos'd of so many Princes or“ dinary us'd to meet.

With the two Queens and the Princess of Suevia they found the King of the Burgundi- ans, Prince Balamir, the King of the Herules, and a little while after came in the King of the Alains, and the King of the Basternes. After some discourse Ardaric told the Prince of Persia that he had been at his Chamber door to look him, but was there answered that he was lock'd in with Martian; whereupon he was not willing to interrupt them, believing they were about some business of importance, or at least entred into some discourse that required time and attendance. Varanez excus'd himself, and presently after turning to the rest of the company : It is true, said he, that Martian and I have been together the most part of the day, busied in a discourse that has been very pleasing to me for some hours, and that finding him in a good humour, I would not let him be at rest till he had told me some passages of news, from a place where I have spent many a sorrowful day. “ In all likelihood, said the “ Queen of the Turingiens, there are few persons can inform you more than he can ; for he “ hath been so highly prefer'd in the Court of Theodosius, that in all probability he ought “ to know what happened there of greatest importance. 'Tis very true, Madam, said Mar- “ tian, that I liv'd there long enough to give an account of things that came to publick knowledge.
 “ And we may believe, said the Queen of the Turingiens, that you know a great deal more “ than you say ; for you have been so long of the Council and Cabinet of Theodosius, not to “ be ignorant of the most hidden secreties. I believe, added the Queen of the Cimbrians, that Martian does not only know what has pass'd in the Imperial Court in the Reign of young Theodosius, or his Father Arcadius whom he has seen, but that though he was very young in the latter years of Theodosius the Great, I doubt not but he has well inform'd himself of all that was memorable at that time. And as there were many things for which I have always had a curiosity which I have not yet satisfied, though I have heard them confusedly spoke of a good while since, if I durst presume I would entreat him to inform me in what I am ignorant, and I should be infinitely oblig'd to him, if he would be pleas'd to take the pains. I believe, Madam, replied Martian, that there is no person in the world who does not esteem it so great an honour to please and to obey you, that he would willingly purchase it with much more pains and labour, than you impose upon me in what you desire; and as there is nothing certainly that has fallen out considerable under the Reign of the great Theodosius, wherein I have not been particularly instructed, either by my Father, from whom I was seldom absent, or by the persons themselves who occasioned the most memorable accidents, and whom I knew in their old age. If you please to tell me what it is that you desire to know, I hope, Madam, that I shall be able to satisfy your curiosity, and I shall most gladly undertake it when you shall be pleas'd to command me. Since you will have me abuse your civility, replied the charming Queen, I must tell you, that I never heard but confusedly the beginning of Stilicon's fortune, nor of his love to the Princess Serena, whose Virtue and Beauty have been so loudly reported, wherein of necessity there cannot but be most notable accidents. There may be couch'd therein some particulars of the fortune of the great Theodosius, and above all his advancement to the Empire, which I never rightly understood, and as I believe that the Queen of the Turingiens, and the Princess of Suevia are no less ignorant than my self, I make no question but they will desire to be sharers in the obligation, if you will take the pains to make us a relation.

Amalazontha and Albifinda confirm'd what Rosamond had promis'd in their behalfs: and although Amalazontha her self was not in a condition that gave leisure to mind curiosities. However the liberty which a long discourse of Martian might give her to be silent, and to meditate upon that which chiefly employed her thoughts, made her sensible of the proposition, and readily accept it. And Martian understanding their desire, I am most happy, said he to Rosamond, to find so easie an occasion to do something to give you the least content, and as among persons of the same age with Stilicon and Theodosius, as there are several in our Court, there are few that are better instructed in the transactions of those persons which you desire to know, as having learn'd part thereof from Ruffinus's own mouth, who understood the greatest part no less than Stilicon himself; when you please to give me your orders I shall content your curiosity to the utmost of my ability, and together with those things that are come to publick knowledge, I may probably inform you of some that are not very much discovered to the world, the relation whereof may be worthy your attention, if I can but acquit my self of my task as I ought to do. If, as by what we gather from the Prince of Persia, said the Queen of the Cimbrians, you had not been so lately too much tired already, and that for that reason it were not an incivility, to urge you to speak so much in one day, I must tell you, that of a good while since we have not had such a time of leisure as now; and therefore believing that all these Princes will not think it a trouble to give you an attention equal to ours, if you need not a longer time to recollect your self, and bring back to memory things out of mind, though we are forc'd to borrow some part of the night, I dare be bold to say that this noble society will not grudge their time, nor think it ill spent. The Princes confirm'd what the Queen of the Cimbrians had said; and Martian having a great desire to please her, though he might probably be tired with the long recital which he had made Varanez but a little before, he thus began his Relation which he address'd to the fair Queen of the Cimbrians.

The History of Theodosius the Great, of Stilicon, and of Ruffinus.

THE Relation which you desire of me, Madam, might perhaps require a little preparation, and whereas it will be convenient, that in rehearsing the lives of Stilicon and Ruffinus, whose actions until the death of Theodosius were intermingled together, I should also relate unto you part of the Actions and Life of that Illustrious Emperor; and whereas you declare to me that you desire a more perfect knowledge than what you have hitherto had, it behov'd me possibly to have taken a longer time to methodize those things which may in all likelihood come to my memory but confusedly; yet in regard I am only to make a succinct Relation of those things that are known to all the world, and to enlarge upon those only, of which you are ignorant at present, I hope my memory will serve me to recollect sufficient matter wherewithal, to satisfy your expectation; at least I shall endeavour to shew my self a person willing in all things to obey your Commands.

To pay what is just to the memory of the great Theodosius, we may say that it will not only be highly revered by his successors, to the utmost period of the Empire, but that for the glory of his life he has equal'd if not surpass'd, the most famous of his illustrious Ancestors; and that in valour and all other military virtues, he was not inferior either to Constantine, Trajan, or to the ancient Cæsars: that in goodness, justice and moderation he excell'd Vespasian, Antonius, and indeed that he possess'd all the virtues both of the one and the other, nor was taxed with any of those vices for which they might have been blamed. In a word, besides his valour and skill in war, easily to be compared with that of the most famous Captains of the Ancients, besides his ability in governing the Empire, wherein he shamed the most nimble and sharp-witted Politicians, he was so faithful to his word and so great an observer of what was his duty, that no consideration of interest could move him. His piety toward heaven was such, that it has serv'd as an example to all the world: so courteous toward his equals, so mild and affable to his people and friends, that he was adored by all those that came into his presence: so faithful in his acknowledgments toward those, to whom he thought himself oblig'd, with a liberality full of magnificence, especially toward persons of any merit, whom he loaded with his favours, and for whom to his dying day he had an affection full of respect, tender as a parent of his relations and friends, with a most amiable and familiar sweetness in his behaviour; so great a contemner of those honours, which his Ancestors so eagerly fought after, that though he had merited those Triumphs and other marks of glory, which are commonly challenged as the reward of great actions, he always looked upon them as things beneath his consideration, having lived in all the splendour of his victory, and in the supremest place of honour in the whole world, with the modesty of a private person, who did not understand any other use of honour and grandeur, but only to distribute them illustriously to those, that by their virtue rendred themselves worthy of them. He was soon angry but sooner pleas'd, nor was he ever in a passion which caus'd not in him either trouble or repentance. Under such a person was the Empire established in its full glory, all the potentates of the world trembling at his name, sought his Alliance with submission: and if heaven had suffer'd him to complete the number of his years, of which there was a natural likelihood enough, and for which his people earnestly pray'd, he had restored the Throne of the Cæsars to all the glory of its primitive splendour. These rare endowments of his mind were accompanied with the advantages of body: For besides a most exact proportion, he had a very fair countenance, his eyes pleasing yet quick and lively, and in all his person a deportment full of royal Majesty: so that they who have seen the pictures of Trajan, have found no less resemblance in their persons, than all the world has observ'd in their manners, their actions, and their management of affairs; which is the less to be wondred at, seeing that these two Emperours both sprang from the same line, and that most certainly the Emperours that at this day rule the Eastern and Western Empires, deduce their original from Trajan. Having told you all this, it is not necessary, since you cannot be ignorant thereof, to inform you that he was a Spaniard, or that he was the Son of that great Captain whom Valens the Emperour put to death, as the reward of so many great victories that he won; because he bore the same name as his Son Theodosius: and for that they had foretold to that Emperour, being cruel and jealous of his dignity, that he should have a famous successor, whose name should begin with Tb, the two first letters of the name Theodosius. That Prince being weak in parts, but of a bloody nature, not minding what had been foretold him by one of his most illustrious Ancestors, that never any Prince had put to death his Successor, yet for that vain and ridiculous reason before mentioned, deprived of life a person illustrious for his great deeds, and most renowned actions. The young Theodosius his Son incens'd for the death of his Father, and therefore fearing the same fate, retir'd into Spain, where by his admirable virtues and the many proofs of his valour, he made his fame so well known that his great reputation had expos'd him more than ever to danger, if Valens had not lost his life in the great fire of the Goths, wherein he was burnt in Thrace: and that his Nephew Gratian, who after the death of his Father ruled in the west, had not become master of the Empire, making himself to be presently known, for a Prince adorn'd with most excellent virtues: for besides that he was just, liberal, prudent and eloquent, he was the most active for all exercises of the body, of any person in the whole Empire. He was also valiant and a very great Captain, and in his early youth had gain'd a very famous victory, over a numerous and formidable Army of the Barbarians, wherein were slain above forty thousand upon the place. But at the same time finding himself assaulted on every side, by the Goths, Huns, Suevians, Alains, Herules, and many other Nations, that like an inundation threatned the Empire, with a most formidable power; and seeing that he stood in need of a person to assist him, and help him to support the burthen of all those wars, the report which was already spread through all the world of Theodosius's fame, obliged him to cast his eyes upon him above all other men, and to send him the purple Robe into Spain, declaring him chief over all the Armies of the Empire, and desiring him to come and employ his valour and courage in its defence.

Theodosius, whom renown had inform'd of the vertues of Gratian, willingly embraced all occasions to serve him, and because he saw there was an urgent necessity, to stop the fury of the Barbarians, who began to swarm in the Territories of the Empire; instead of going to Gratian who was then in Pannonia, he put himself at the head of the first Army he could meet, and sending for more forces from other parts, he made up an Army not to compare with the Enemies for number, but which under the conduct of such a Captain was sufficient to undertake any enterprize: and with these forces which daily increased, he not only stopped the progress of the Goths and their confederates, but he assaulted them in their own quarters, weakened and distressed them in many skirmishes, where virtue and valour had always the advantage over number: and at length giving them battel, obtained so entire a victory over them, that hardly in any part of the Empire, a more complete was ever gained though bloody withal, the field being covered with an infinite number of the dead Barbarians bodies, whereby he chased the remainder quite beyond the Danubius. After these Actions, so renowned and of so great importance, he went to seek the Emperour Gratian at Simium a City of Pannonia, where that Prince gratefully in love with his vertue, not only confirm'd him in the dignity which he had bestowed upon him, but a few days after observing more and more his admirable endowments, and knowing the good which he should do for the people, in bestowing upon them such an Emperour, declared him his equal, and companion and associate in the Empire: and retaining for himself the Empire of the Romans and of the West, which Honorius at this day possesses. He left him Constantinople with the Empire of the East, as it is now under the government of the young Theodosius his Grandchild.

Thus the great Theodosius in the two and thirtieth year of his Age, was advanced to the Empire, and it was upon the Throne of the Cæsars, that he made the lustre of his vertue shine, while all the world commended Gratian's choice. He seconded his first deeds with many others that were no less renowned, and having every where overthrown the Barbarians, his very name struck such a terrour into them, that they durst no more come near the limits of the Empire; and those who had been his most formidable Enemies, not only submissively sued for peace, and had it granted upon conditions very honourable for himself; but they engaged also to assist him in all his own affairs, and to fight under his pay as his own subjects. He had sent for Flaccilla the Empress out of Spain, with the young Arcadius his Son, who was born much about that time, together with Serena his Brothers daughter, her father being dead some years before; whom he caused to be brought up under the Empress, with that care and affection as if she had been his own daughter. His Court was then more numerous, more fair, and more magnificent, than any of the Emperours before him had been: and it being publickly known that there virtue would infallibly find reward, all brave persons flocked thither out of foreign nations; nor did they fail to find there the relief of estates and dignities proportionable to their merit: But among those that had the highest employments, Arbogastus, Stilicon, and Ruffinus, were in chiefest esteem with the Emperour, as being the persons that by their services and by their great endowments, though perhaps not in every one alike, had best merited that great honour. They were first entertained by Theodosius, at what time he marched out of Spain with that Army, where they had considerable commands under Gratian: and being there detained by the charms of his vertue, and the entertainment which he gave to men of desert with a discerning judgment, they not only affectionately tied themselves to his service, but they had also a great share in the famous Actions that had advanc'd him to the Throne, and in the wars that had been ended since his establishment: they had themselves commanded Armies by the Appointment of the Emperour, and had in many battels overthrown the Enemy, and settled the peace of the Empire, insomuch that seeing themselves the chiefest persons in the Emperour's favour, they began to dispute the Priority among themselves, with little odds in their advantages, though they sufficiently differed in their endowments. Arbogastus was descended from the race of the Gauls, if it be true as is reported the most illustrious in the world, as of those Princes who boast themselves descended from the Son of Hector, who reigning over the Sycambrians, settled their Kingdom in that part of Gall, which lately called King Pharamond to the Crown. Besides his Birth, Arbogastus had noble endowments of mind, but that which excelled all the rest was his great valour, which was such, that he would not submit to the God of War himself; and though his passions made him act like a person that had other inclinations, yet he was naturally born for War, and War it was that was more natural to him than any other thing in the world; though he wanted not wit, yet he came short of that mildness necessary for a Courtly Society; for in his discourse, and in his behaviour he us'd a kind of ruggedness, that was next to pride it self, and sometimes extended it self to insolence.

Stilicon was a Vandal of a very noble Descent, and for his Valour not inferiour to Arbogastus, of which he had given manifold proofs; and he had a wit capable of all things as well in peace as in war: he was no less a good Captain than a valiant Soldier; nor was he less fit to consult at the Council-Table upon the most important affairs of State, than to conduct an Army in the Field. Besides all this, he was truly generous, magnificent, and a lover of Virtue, and he had in all things a great courage, large thoughts, and a boundless ambition; he knew how to conceal, where it was convenient, the excess of his passion; and his deportment was so much the more pleasing, because his person was rarely proportion'd; his aspect haughty, so that from his youth he seem'd to be born to something beyond the fortune of his Ancestors.

As for Ruffinus, though his Parentage was not known, it being uncertain whether he were descended from the Gauls, or the Italians, yet his nature was so different from the frank humour and downright plainness of the Gauls, that as many other persons did, I took him to be rather an Italian than a Gaul: in valour he was certainly inferiour to Stilicon and Arbogastus; but for address of wit he far exceeded and surpass'd Stilicon himself, as being the person that till his declining years, was accounted the most cunning Head piece, and the greatest Politician of the Age: his behaviour also was far different from theirs: and it the other two upheld themselves by their famous Actions and their sublime courage, he did no less by the subtilty of his Genius, whereby he had so insinuated himself into the favour of the Emperour, that he kept his station till his death, with an admirable Conduct. He was handsome in his person, and his converse was charming; and though the Emperour neither lov'd Flatterers, nor Flattery, yet that of Ruffinus was always masqu'd under so much curiosity of address, that that great personage, as apprehensive as he was, never understood him, nor could discover his subtilty and artifice from his real and sincere intentions.

These three persons different in their parts, in their inclinations, but little unequal in their fortune, look'd upon one another in a short time with envy, by reason of their corrivalship in the favour that they contended for. And if Arbogastus and Stilicon had an advantage over Ruffinus by their Military Employments, of which, the wise Emperour knew them to be more capable than he, yet he seem'd to have no less advantage over them at the Council-Table, and in the private Affairs; for in those things that concern'd the Government, the Emperour heard him more favourably than the other two, and very much relyed upon his advice. He carried himself however toward every one with so much reserv'dness and indifferency, that they had no cause to complain of him, not Stilicon himself, whom he knew fit both for the one and the other, and whose prudence in council he did no less esteem, than his Valour in the Field. But to this Corrivalship that fortune had contriv'd between three men, she added another in a short time, which gave them no less trouble, and which produc'd the greatest part of those Adventures and Accidents which I am going to relate.

You heard me say, Madam, that the Emperour had sent for the young Princess his Neice Serena out of Spain, causing her to be bred up under the Empress with all care and affection imaginable, to which I must add, that in a short time, what with the Beauty of her Body, and Divine Quality of her mind, she became one of the most accomplish'd persons, and the greatest ornament of our Court, and so drew upon her the eyes and admiration of all persons that beheld her; the report of her Merit and her Beauty has been sufficiently spread, that I need not doubt but you have heard thereof, and that it is not necessary for me to make a particular description of her. I have heard marvellous things spoken of her youth, and though I knew her not till she was well advanc'd in years, the charms which I perceiv'd in her person were so extraordinary, and that I easily believ'd that what was said of her, came far short of the truth: her Eyes and her Hair were black, her Skin most delicate and white, her proportion the exactest in the world, and her gait in walking, her deportment, her discourse and all her actions seem'd to have a charm altogether supernatural, and gain'd her more hearts than she had a desire to be Mistress of; she had a lively brisk wit, but prudent and moderate withal, sweet and severe by intervals, according to the persons, and the occasions: her inclinations were noble, her courage great and lofty, which occasion'd some to accuse her of so much ambition, as to have approv'd the last intentions of Stilicon, if not to have been the encourager and promoter thereof: her Beauties had not attain'd to their perfection when she came to Constantinople, but in a few years they appear'd in all their glory. And you may well imagine, that in a Court where there were so many persons capable to know and feel their power, that they produc'd quick and notable effects. Certain it is, that in a short time the fair Serena became the object of the most noble passions; and probably there might be several persons, illustrious both for their Birth and Virtue, that sigh'd for her; yet by reason of the disproportion of their fortune to hers, they covered their love with a respectful silence. But among all her admirers, Stilicon, Arbogastus and Ruffinus, having receiv'd the same wound, did not conceal it with the same care, nor with the same success. And whether it were that the only merit of the Princess had inflam'd those hearts, where it is very probable that ambition had left no place for any other passion, or whether ambition joyning it self to their love made them look upon the Emperour's Neice as the highest mark they could propose to accomplish and complete their happiness, the fair eyes of Serena had made them Rivals in love almost at the same time that they became Competitors in favour. Arbogastus by the advantage of his Illustrious Descent, by the fame of his Actions, and out of a natural boldness which he had above the rest of men, was he that less feared the Dignity of the object which he look'd upon; and whereas through the greatness of his courage, and the good opinion which he had of himself, he imagin'd few things to be above his desert, he embark'd himself in that passion with larger hopes than any of his Rivals. Stilicon modestly consider'd what he was going about, and respecting the blood of Trajan, and the Emperour's descent, though his own were sufficiently illustrious: for a long time he did what lay in his power to suppress his presuming thoughts: but at length beholding with a jealous eye the boldness of Arbogastus, to whom he thought himself nothing inferiour, and confiding in the greatness of his services, and the Emperour's inclination which he knew would be favourable to him, he permitted himself to be guided by his love, which engag'd him to the service of the Princess far more deeply than his ambition, and verily believ'd that he was no otherwise prohibited than as he was a Gaul, to settle his thoughts and hopes upon her. As for Ruffinus, though the obscurity of his Birth ought to have abated his courage, yet trusting in the power which his nimble and flattering wit had over the Emperour, he was in hopes that he might make such use thereof, as to perswade him to approve his boldness before that of his Rivals, nor did he despair but that the same dexterity, and the assistance of fortune, that he might raise himself to such a degree in his Master's favour, that might counterbalance in the opinion of Serena those other advantages which they had over him.

Serena, as I said already, was bred up in the Palace by the Empress, who as well out of the consideration of her blood, as her deserts, look'd upon her rather as her own Daughter, than a Neice. All the Court ador'd her as well for her Virtue, as for her excellent Qualities. And besides those Lovers that already sigh'd for her, several other Princes, either the Emperour's Friends or Confederates sought in the glorious happiness of possessing her, the alliance and support of the Emperour. But whether it were for the tenderness of her years, or out of the little disposition which he found in her to the matches which he propos'd to her, or whether it were that he chose rather to bestow her upon some person, who by his Virtue and his Merit might aspire to that honour, he never shew'd any inclination to absent her from his person, yet still very honourably dismiss'd those had been sent to demand her. This proceeding of the Emperour toward foreign Princes, had rais'd and increas'd the courage, or rather presumption, of those Lovers whom Serena had at Court; for they judg'd by appearances likely enough, that notwithstanding the inequality of their Birth and Dignity, the Emperour would be always more favourable to them than to strangers. Arbogastus, as being the person who for the Nobility of his Descent, and the good opinion he had of himself and his great Actions; thought himself least distant from Serena's Quality, was the first that by his actions, and by his discourse, made the love which he had for her publickly known: I could never well understand in what manner he declar'd his passion, nor what the Princess said to him to abate his presumption; but I have been inform'd that she receiv'd the first marks thereof with a marvellous disdain, and that she gave him such a repulse as would have humbled any courage but his: and indeed for some days he appear'd very submissive before the Princess; but afterwards he resum'd his courage and his hopes, and giving himself entirely up to his love and his ambition, he made no question but that time and his services would overcome the greatest difficulties, and out of a confidence with which he easily deluded himself, he continued almost openly what he had begun with more circumspection:

Stilicon who had always look'd upon him as his Rival in fortune, observ'd him more particularly since he had confirm'd his suspicion of the truth by his Actions, and not wanting Spies near Serenz, for the interest of his Love, he not only observ'd what was evident to best part of the Court, but afterwards he was inform'd more secretly that Arbogastus had spoken to Serenz concerning his affection, and that she had receiv'd him very disjointly in her discourse. On the one side, the presumption of his Rival, so little answering his hopes, gave him no small satisfaction; nor was he a little glad to understand that Serenz had receiv'd the knowledge of his love with such evident marks of anger and reluctance. On the other side his fortune made him distrustful; for as he knew that in Birth he might be inferior to Arbogastus, though it were not a thing certainly agreed upon; and that in the Glory of his Actions he had at that time no advantage over him, he fear'd with probability enough a fortune equal to his own, and believ'd that he was to go another way to deal with such a haughty disposition as the Princess's was. It was not but that for his person he knew he was more comely than any of the Gauls, and observ'd by many signs that the Emperour's inclinations were favourable to him. But this thought with which he might flatter himself with reason enough, did not sufficiently secure him from that which he had to fear in a design which he look'd upon as a great enterprize; nor could all the opinion he had of his own merit, or of his person, hinder him from acting with a circumspection, full of respect, in a business that concern'd the chief repose and quiet of his life. By reason of this fear which his love had caus'd in him, he would not speak a word for a long time, or if he expressed himself any way, it was only in looks and sighs, whose language might have been easily understood by a person whose inclinations had been more acquainted with love, than those of Theodosius's Niece. Perhaps he had been contented for some time to have used no other language, if the presumption of his Rival had not inspir'd him with more boldness than he could draw from his own courage, and caus'd him impatiently to suffer, that another should so publickly own that which he conceal'd as a crime. Already for the merit of his person, through his obliging diligence, and by means of a compliance full of respect, he was become more acceptable to her than any other person in the Court. And as there were none over whom he had not very great advantages, in regard that Serena had an excellent wit, a lofty courage, and a true value for merit, and also a great respect to the thoughts and inclinations of the Emperour, she seem'd therefore for those reasons to give him the precedency above all that ever came into her presence, and entertain'd with most kindness.

This great Emperour liv'd in his Court with a great deal of familiarity and courtesie, so that besides the peace which reign'd among the people, he had introduc'd several Sports and Divertisements: but he took the care himself to appoint them, and to make the matches wherein he often took his lot, and where his presence begat the greatest occasions of gladness. He resolv'd one day to walk with all the Imperial Family, and the principal Officers of the Court to a House that Valentinian had built, and which he himself had magnificently finish'd, not above two hours riding distant from Constantinople, and being in the strength and flower of his age, he left the Chariots to the Ladies, and generally rode a Horseback himself. Particularly being mounted that day, all the Court was mounted with him, composing the most magnificent and pompous Guard of the Emperour's Chariot and the rest of the Chariots that attended, that ever was seen in the world. Among the rest Stilicon, Arbogastus and Ruffinus mounted upon stately Steeds, and magnificently habited, displayed their pomp in Serenz's sight: but because she rode in the Emperour's Chariot, they contented themselves only with publick complements, as they could come near the Seat of the Chariot. And Arbogastus himself, though more rash than the rest, durst not declare to her otherwise than by his looks what he had in his heart.

But when that noble company was arriv'd at the House, and were walking in a very fair Garden, while the Collation prepared for them was making ready, Stilicon and Arbogastus who equally waited for that opportunity, at one and the same time took the Princess by the hand to lead her: and Ruffinus who was more close, though less bold; yet had done the same had he found the opportunity favourable, seeing himself prevented retir'd another way, and shortly after went to the Emperour who was walking in another Alley, with another part of the company. The two Rivals cast a look one upon another, which shew'd their indignation: and if they had not that satisfaction from Serenz's entertainment, which they might have expected had she had more freedom; however they had the satisfaction of equally spoiling one another's design: nor was it so slight, but that it made amends for some part of their discontent. As they could not speak to the Princess but of things which were far distant from what they had in their minds, they had much ado to hold out the discourse; though Stilicon more wise than Arbogastus, made use of the advantage of his wit, to quit himself of it as he was accustomed: and for that their thoughts were always opposite, out of the diskindness they had for one another, it was no easie thing for them to reduce themselves to that complacency, which by her pretence she seem'd to command them. Serena who shun'd the troublesome discourse of Arbogastus, whose love was already known to her, was more delighted in Stilicon's company, which she was pleas'd to let him observe in her eyes when he first accosted her: but if that made him any thing glad, he was sensible soon after of a more pleasing joy, when Arbogastus was sent for by the Emperour, who desired to speak with him: and that that haughty Rival who to obey his orders, which his ambition at other times coveted, but then his love deemed cruel, was forced to leave his competitor, yet not without manifesting in his looks, how much he resent'd his misfortune. But if vexation appeared in his face, gladness at the same time overspread the countenance of Stilicon, and that so visibly that the Princess having observ'd it, out of the confidence that she had put in him in some particular affairs, could not chuse but manifest the thoughts which she had of it: Metbinks, said she, you are not so much troubled as you should be for Arbogastus's absence, nor does the emulation that is between you, in relation to the Emperour's favour, give you any disturbance to see him peculiarly called away. I confess, replied Stilicon, that without any trouble I behold that effect of Arbogastus's good fortune: and as it is not the favour of the Emperour, at how high a price soever I value it, that I care to dispute with him, I shall never be disturbed to see him near the Emperour upon that score. You make me admire at this discourse, (carelessly replied the Princess, whereby he might discern that she misdoubted the truth) for I do not believe that there is any thing of greater importance, that can be disputed between ye, than the favour of Theodosius. You know however (said Stilicon fixing his eyes upon the ground) that Arbogastus has more than one pretence: and you may believe that he will not have more Rivals in the fortune, which he can expect from the favours of the Emperour, than in the honour which he has to serve you.

Serena, though she were the daughter of the Emperours brother, yet was the daughter of a private person only, born at a time when the Empire was not in their family: nor was it a thing unheard of in the Empire, nor without example to see the Emperours favourites Court, and marry their near relations and kindred, and sometimes their own Sisters and Daughters. But Serene having a high spirit, and knowing her self to be descended from Trajan before Theodosius came to the imperial dignity, she could not endure that persons who were not born to reign, or of parents who had worn the regal diadem, should talk to her of love or pretend to enjoy her: and therefore though for the amiable qualities which she saw in Stilicon, and for his more respectful behaviour, her inclinations were more favourable to him than to Arbogastus; they did not proceed so far as to make her effect in him that which she detested in the Gaul, nor yet to suffer her to endure without disdain and some kind of anger, that publick manifestation of his love. The commotions which it rais'd in his mind, might have been observed by the choleric colour of his face, had Stilicon looked upward: but the fear which possess'd him that he had displeas'd the Princess, made him keep his eyes fixed upon the ground. And Serena having walked for some time with looking upon him, striving with her passion to hinder it from breaking out, against a person so beloved of the Emperour, whom she had also an esteem for her self, and who perhaps had not said enough to deserve her anger; I did not believe, said she at length, that what you have observed in Arbogastus, and which you know displeas'd me; had given you the presumption to imitate him. Nor have I imitated him, said the Amorous Stilicon, for though I have suffered more than he, while he has declared himself the profess'd lover of Serena, and spoken in publick of his love to us and to the whole Court, or to say more truly to the Emperour and the Empress in our hearing and the hearing of all the Empire, I am still contented to adore without speaking, to sigh in secret, and to burn without opening my lips to make any complaint. If you have done it hitherto, replied the Princess, you ought to do it as long as you live, nor do I see any thing to the contrary, why you should now dispencc with that respect which you have hitherto paid me. That which you have done me the honour to tell me, replied Stilicon, has drawn from my lips the confession of a trash which I cannot conceal, having so seasonable an opportunity to disclose it: nor was I the master of a passion, that transported me contrary to my intention, but if by some few words, whereby I did not think to wound the respect I owe you, I committed a crime that does deserve your anger, I am ready to undergo what punishment you shall please to ordain me, nor is there any so severe, to which I will not submit without repining.

Stilicon utter'd these words with a behaviour so submissive and passionate, that it was hard for the Princess to preserve all her Anger entire: Yet being unwilling by pardon to give him liberty to pursue what he had begun, taking the middle way between the two extremes, tremes, and observing a moderation to be wondred at in a person of her Age, I have no other punishment to ordain you, said she, but that you no more commit the same offence that you have done this day, and that if you do not desire that I should have the same thoughts for you as I have for Arbogastus, I advise you not to provoke them by a behaviour answerable to his: at least while Arbogastus speaks, I may be permitted to sigh, said Stilicon, and while my heart endures for you all that his can feel, you will not forbid my eyes from telling you, what the mouth of the presumer shall insolently publish to the whole Court. I cannot tell what his vaunts are there, said the Princess very smartly, but his Example is so bad to follow in all things, that once more I advise you not to imitate it: and concluding these words she turned toward the Ladies that followed her, and joyning her self to the rest of the company, she gave him no farther opportunity to pursue his discourse: nor had Arbogastus, though he accosted her when all the company was united together, any more liberty to speak to her all that day but in publick. When the Collation was set upon the Table, in a magnificent Room at one end of the Garden, and that the Empress and Serena were ready to sit down, as the Princess was looking about, to give her Gloves to some person to hold according to her custome, Arbogastus and Stilicon both at the same time presented themselves ready to receive them; but she believing them both equally guilty would give them to neither: but seeing Ruffinus coming toward her in the posture of a lover that crav'd the same favour, without any farther scruple she put them into his hands. Arbogastus cast a furious look upon Ruffinus, not daring to do more, knowing his reputation with the Emperour: but Stilicon who stood next the Princess, whispering to her over the shoulder, so that no body could hear him; I cannot tell Madam, said he, whether you have favoured the most innocent: but I am very much deceived if he be not as guilty as the rest. If it be so, said the Princess blushing, I had rather learn it from your mouth than from his, and you are ignorant perhaps of the kindness which he receives by your means, in doing for him that which all his life time, he durst not have presum'd to do for himself.

She concluded these words with a countenance, sufficiently disdainful to make Stilicon understand, that he had but more displeas'd her: and her displeasure was such, that all the company observed it in her looks, and which she could not forget all the rest of the day, though there were none that knew the cause. But after the Collation was ended, the Princess calling for her Gloves, Ruffinus went to her and presented them with a behaviour full of submission and respect. She received them courteously, but remembring what Stilicon had told her concerning Ruffinus, and because she observed in his looks something of that passion, which Stilicon had perswaded her to believe, she received them very carelessly, and with some symptomes of disgust, which the apprehensive and nearly concern'd Ruffinus easily perceived. He was troubled at it for some time, but recollecting himself shortly after, and beholding her with a look that might easily convince her of the truth; Shall I be so unhappy Madam, said he, to see you repent of the honour you have done me, and would you give that satisfaction to persons who are so concern'd at the discouragement they have thereby received? Neither have I done any thing for which I am obliged to repent, replied the Princess, nor do I know any person who can concern himself therein, or to whom I owe any satisfaction: However I make no question, replied Ruffinus, that Stilicon and Arbogastus may have beheld my good fortune with envy, and though you owe them no satisfaction, they may presume to pretend to it, since they are so confident as to make known their affections for you, while others are careful to conceal them from the whole world. These words confirm'd Serena in the truth of what Stilicon had told her, and because Ruffinus was less in her esteem than the other two, though at that time through the favour of the Emperour, his fortune was not inferiour to theirs, beholding him with all the disdain that an imperfect knowledge could create; I cannot tell, said she, what thoughts they have for me, but if they have any such as may be displeasing to me, neither the persons whom you name, nor any other person in the Court, ought to be so bold as to let me know it, and you cannot do me a better piece of service, than to advise them to conceal them for ever from me. Since you command me, I will obey you, said Ruffinus, but I fear I am too much suspected by them already. You!—— replied the Princess, looking upon him with disdain, and without saying any more, she went away from him, when Arbogastus, who was got near while they were discoursing, and heard the last words, intercepting her in her passage just as she had turn'd her back to Ruffinus. Never doubt it, Madam, said Arbogastus, Ruffinus is shrewdly suspected by us; nor will we bear the advice of a person whom we know so much concern'd as he is. For you, (said the Princess very disdainfully) this is not the first time that you have been wanting in your respect; nor is it the first time that your behaviour has wrought that effect upon me that it ought to do. She spoke these words so loud, and made so little stop in pronouncing them, that Arbogastus had neither liberty nor courage to pursue his discourse; and the Princess being got near the Emperors, kept close close to her all the rest of the day, so much displeas'd that she could not dissemble her vexation.

The Empress, who by many signs observed it, when they were in the Chariot together upon their return to the City, demanded the cause, and the Princess seeking to excuse her self for some time, seeing she could not avoid it without displeasing her, and expecting from her some assistance against those persons whom the favour of the Emperour made more presumptuous than she desired, told her the whole truth, and gave her to understand in a discourse full of resentment, the trouble that she suffered by reason of the boldness of her Lovers. The Empress, who was a good and virtuous Princess, did no way condemn her anger, nor the little inclination which she had kindly to entertain the thoughts of Love; but she gave her not that assistance which she expected; and having manifested to her how well she approv'd her spirit, and her unwillingness to debase her self, she let her know withal that she did not receive so great an injury as she imagined, in what she complain'd of; and that of the three persons whose passion she was either acquainted with, or suspected, the one was born a Prince, and the other two, by the favour of the Emperour, were not only in a condition to aspire to great things, but were already in a better estate than the Emperour before Gratian sent for him out of Spain to associate him in the Empire; that she might do that which became her Dignity and her Virtue, without being transported, by expecting the event of the Emperour's intentions, who, she might assure her self, would not bestow her upon any of his Favourites, nor encourage their presumption, if he had not a design to advance her to such a degree with which his Neice might be satisfied without thinking her self undervalued. This discourse of the Empress, and the instructions which she gave her besides, made Serena resolve to hearken more favourably to her Lovers, at least not to look upon their loves as so great a disturbance, and such a great injury to her Dignity as she had thought it had been, and to leave the care of her Destiny to the Emperour, without being so much offended as she had been, had she only followed her own inclinations.

This resolution spared her much of that disquiet to which she was exposed by the perseverance of her three Servants, who very diligently waited upon her: but they managed their business differently; for while Arbogastus made his love publicly known, not caring to keep it private neither from the Court, nor the Princess, Stilicon govern'd himself with so much respect and circumspection, that neither the Princess could be offended at his behaviour, though she saw well enough the pursuit of his love, nor the Court take any knowledge thereof that might displease the Princess: And for Ruffinus, he knowing the advantages which his Rivals had over him, was more reserv'd than either, and carried himself toward the Princess in such a manner, that while he discovered to her all his passion, he neither said, nor did any thing which might not be attributed to his respect only, and by his address he made it his business to let her see, that he was less confident than Stilicon; and at the same time endeavoured to lay before her all the insolency of Arbogastus to render him odious to her. However, he was certain that Stilicon, who by means of several rare qualities, appear'd more admirable in his person than Arbogastus, and in all things to be prefer'd before Ruffinus, was the person of all the three whom she lov'd best, or at least the person to whom her favours most inclin'd; and though for a long time she could not resolve to shew him any kindness, nor possibly dispose her self so much as to conceive any affection for him, she made a most remarkable difference between the entertainment she gave him, corresponding indifferently well with him, that his Rivals might perceive 'twas he was the most fortunate. Stilicon made an admirable use of the advantage which he had over them, and feigning to be ignorant thereof, out of a modesty that was very pleasing to the Princess, but taking all occasions himself to make known his own love, rather by his Actions, and by all the most obliging diligence that his hopes could infuse into him, than by his discourse: at length he played his game so well, that he oblig'd her to suffer his discourse, or at least to hear him speak without being offended. Besides Serena's inclinations, all things else were very successful at the beginning; for setting aside that he was more acceptable to the Empress than his Rivals, and to all persons that had any power over the Princess's disposition, the Emperour, who lov'd him better than Arbogastus, and esteem'd him above Ruffinus, took notice of his love without any offence, and a little while after testin'd by many signs, that in that very affair his thoughts inclin'd to favour him, rather than either of his Rivals, though he well considered the valour of Arbogastus, and that Ruffinus's wit was extremely pleasing to him: but he had not leisure then to declare any thing farther; nor the Lovers of Serena to dispute their affections at the Court. For just about this time the Eastern Empire was troubled at the strange revolutions that happened in the Westera

Western Empire, the rehearsal whereof I shall briefly run over, because there are few persons in the world that are ignorant thereof.

You know most illustrious Queens, that while Theodosius lived at Constantinople, from whence his renown flew through all the world, Gratian by whom he had been associated into the Empire, was adored at Rome for his excellent virtues: and very honourably and prudently governed Italy, Spain, France and other Provinces which fell to his share: and which at this day remain under the power of Honorius. Certainly that Prince was adorn'd with all noble qualities; but though his valour had rendred him formidable to his Enemies, yet he was not fear'd by his subjects, who taking advantage of a slight pretence, that he had entertained some of the Alain Troops to be of his Liteguard, the souldiers that were in France rebelled, and after they had committed great disorders, casting about who to pitch upon for their Captain, they chose Maximus then in Gallia, and proclaimed him Emperour.

Maximus was a person truly endowed with excellent abilities, as well for war as peace, and it is reported that he never sought that dignity, and that he accepted it very unwillingly: but when he was chosen he neglected nothing to establish himself, but resolved to try the utmost of his fortune. To this purpose gathering forces together from all parts, he made himself master of a good part of Gallia, resolving to reduce the rest, and so to march for Italy to dethrone Gratian: but that Emperour being advertised thereof, was nothing dismay'd, but halting into Gallia with such forces as he had ready, by his presence had reduced his affairs into so good a condition, that the fortune of the Rebels began to change countenance, when his Enemies betook themselves to stratagems and treason, which was much more favourable to them than open hostility: to which purpose having spread a report in the Camp, that the Empress, whom he had left in some frontier town of Italy, was coming to him, and counterfeited letters in pursuance of their treachery, that gave him an account of her march, and the places through which she intended to pass. The Prince ill advis'd, and submitting rather to his love than his prudence and reason, going to meet his Spouse with some few Troops of horse; fell into an ambush near Lyons a famous City of the Gauls, where the perfidious Andragathius Lieutenant to Maximus, attended his coming and most inhumanely slew him. After the death of Gratian, a Prince of noble and renowned memory, Maximus and the parricide Andragathius, to whom he had given the command of the greatest part of his forces, having slain or disperd all those that had followed Gratian, or were rais'd by him in Gallia, march'd into Italy thinking to surprize the young Valentinian brother of Gratian, whom his brother a little before had made his partner in the Western Empire. They found all the passes free, by reason that Valentinian was but in a very bad condition, and having with the terrour of their victories overcome all resistance that made head against him, they advanced toward Rome without any opposition: whereupon Valentinian being dismay'd, and not finding himself able to sustain their power; he forsook Rome and Italy, and sought for succour and sanctuary in the Arms of the great Theodosius, who was become the refuge of the miserable, the support of the good, and the terrour of the wicked.

Before his Arrival, the news came of the fatal and lamentable death of Gratian, of which the generous and grateful Theodosius was so deeply sensible, that with all the grandeur of his soul, he had much ado to support so great a misfortune, with a moderation answerable to his dignity and vertue. In short, the loss of so great a Prince much more deplorable than if he had dyed a natural death, a Prince endowed with so many excellent qualities, and to whom he was beholding for the place which he held in the Throne of the Cæsars; did no less move him than the loss of a Father, a dear and beloved Son, or some other person to whom he had been bound, in stricter tyes of tenderness and affection could have done: and after he had spent many days in tears and lamentations, which drew all the Court to mourn, he turned all his thoughts to revenge his Benefactor, and had given orders to muster up forces from all parts, and to march against all those inhumane parricides, with all the power of his Empire, When the young and unfortunate Valentinian arriv'd, despoiled of his Dominions, he did not receive him as a person chac'd from his Territories, and forsaken by fortune; but as a brother whom he most entirely lov'd, or rather as his Emperour, and as a person to whom he would restore that dignity, which he had received from his Father: so that it was not by a kind reception, and in bare words of consolation, that he only sought to assuage his grief; but after he had paid him all the honours that his grief could suffer, without losing a moment of time, which was to be employed in levying and assembling his forces together, he let him soon see that he was in a posture to serve him; and solliciting him himself to the revenge of his Brother, and the recovery of his his Empire, he undertook that famous expedition with him: and departing from Constantinople, he marched toward Italy with a flourishing Army. Then it was that the three Lovers of Serenz, were forced to absent themselves from her, to go where their duty obliged them: no question but they went with a sorrow little different, but equally glad, that every one of the three at the same time, beheld the departure of his Rival, and that they were not exposed to a misfortune that was not common to all, seeing they were all deprived of making any advantages of one anothers absence. They had every one hopes that in a war of such importance, they might not only find occasions to purchase honour; but by their famous Actions to open a way for the enjoyment of Serena, and their hopes were so much the greater, in regard that Arbogastus and Stilicon had the highest commands in the war, and that Ruffinus being bound to be near the Emperour's person, was called to all Councils and employed in all important Embassies.

I cannot tell particularly, nor is it necessary for me to relate, in what manner they took their leaves of the Princess, but it is most likely that Stilicon's farewell was received most favourably, in regard she had a higher esteem for him than for the rest: and that then she suffered him to declare his affection. However it were, they were compelled to depart all the same day, but they did not long continue to march together: For the Emperour understanding that Maximus to keep him from entering into Italy, had shut up all the Passes of the Alpes; and had lodged his Forces in the streights of the Mountains, and that so strongly, that it was impossible to force them; was resolved to make a diversion that might compel him to draw off his Army, and to that purpose he sent part of his Forces by Sea to land in Italy, under the command of Arbogastus, in whose valour he very much confided. Stilicon being jealous of him more for his Love than his Ambitions sake, though his other passion did not altogether smother that, had envied that employment, if the Emperour, who confided no less in him than in his Rival, had not honoured him with another that was no less considerable, by dividing his Army by land into two bodies, and giving the conduct of one part thereof, not inferiour in number to that which he kept himself, with orders to attempt a pass in one part, while he marched to another place upon the same design. As the issue of this war has been publick to all the world, I will not abuse your patience by rehearsing the particulars: only I must tell you, that the famous Emperour, accomplished to admiration what he had reserved for himself to do where he commanded in person, and that he was served to his satisfaction, by those two Captains to whom he had given the command of his other forces. And indeed Maximus himself gave him as great advantages as he could desire; for dreading the power of the Army, sent by sea under the conduct of Arbogastus, and fearing to be assailed on that part with the greatest force, he drew off the best part of his Army from the passes which they guarded, for the perfidious Andragathius to head, and oppose himself against Arbogastus, whereby he weakened his party that lay to defend the passes in such a manner, that Theodosius on the one side and Stilicon on the other, hardly met any resistance capable to oppose them.

Arbogastus undertaking Andragathius, obtained considerable advantages over him in all the engagements that he had with him, and constrained him at length to flee before him, after he had sustained many notorious losses. Stilicon also about the same time, meeting with Victor the Son of Maximus, whom his Father had trusted with a good part of his Forces, while he opposed the Emperour with the rest, fought him with so much valour and good fortune, that Victor's Army was totally defeated and he himself slain in the field: whereby all the passes became so free and open, that Stilicon advanced with all his forces to that part of the Country, where Maximus lay to oppose Theodosius, who upon the coming of this additional succour, and the vigorous onset which he gave upon Maximus, put him into that fear, that he durst not hazard the least skirmish: but at length forsaking all the passes which he had so well guarded some days before; he retired in disorder and shut himself up in Aquilegia.

The Emperour who had no time to lose followed him close, besieged him, and so hardly distressed him on all sides, that the same souldiers who some time before had proclaimed him Emperour, seeing no hopes of their Lives but in the clemency of Theodosius, and willing to repair their infidelity by such a change; seiz'd upon the Tyrant, and presented him in fetters to the Conquerour. All his clemency could not move him at that time, nor could it prevail for the life of a Barbarian, who not content to have usurped the Empire, had so perfidiously and cruelly slain that very Emperour, from whom Theodosius had obtained the imperial Diadem: and therefore not being able to give any denial to the demand of his own justice, nor the young Valentinian's fury, who required satisfaction for his Brother's blood, he would not however deliver him up to the tortures that he deserved, but requested

Valentinian

Valentinian to be contented with his head. The cruel Andragathius being inform'd of his end, neither hop'd nor sought for pardon, but ended his miserable days by casting himself headlong into the Sea. After the death of Maximus and Andragathius all Italy was at peace, as also were all the rest of the Imperial Territories; for the Rebels relying upon the clemency of Theodosius, every where laying down their Arms, the famous Emperour, in the midst of the peoples Acclamations march'd directly to Rome, there to settle the young Valentinian in the Throne of his Father and his Grandfather. The Empire of the West was no less then at his devotion than the Empire of the East; for besides that he was called thither by the consent of the people, Valentinian instead of opposing him, did not presume so much as to murmur at it. Most certain it is, that there were several persons that advis'd Theodosius to keep both the Empires, and that upon grounds solid and specious enough. It was never known to be Stilicon's judgment; but for Arbogastus, he press'd him to it with all earnestness: and for Ruffinus, he omitted nothing that he could imagine of force to persuade him. But the Generous and Faithful Emperour hearkening to their counsels with disdain, and rejecting them with anger, brought the young Prince as a victorious Triumpher to Rome, where he established him in the Throne of the Cæsars in full authority; and because that by reason of his youth he was unapt for Government, he took the pains to instruct him as if he had been his Son, and with admirable diligence reform'd what the corruption of the age, and the disorders of the War had introduc'd of bad and vicious customs into Rome and Italy; he employed the force of his Arms, and the terrour of his name to reduce all things to peace and quietness, and would not leave him till he saw him in a condition capable to maintain himself without help in a Dignity equal to his own. After he had done all these things in the view, and to the admiration of all the world, he took leave of the Emperour, and left Italy and Rome, and full of Glory return'd to Constantinople.

During this Renowned Expedition, the three Rivals, as well in the Emperour's favour, as the love of the Princess his Neice, had sought by all the ways imaginable to facilitate the enjoyment of her to themselves. Stilicon had signaliz'd his Valour by the defeat of Maximus's Son, and by many other Noble Deeds, insomuch that we may say that the Emperour was in some measure beholding to him for his success. Arbogastus had beaten Andragathius at Sea in several Engagements, and might boast himself to have had a notable share in the ruine of Maximus. But though Ruffinus had not perform'd such famous Actions as either of his two Rivals, he had stuck close to the Emperour with his counsel; and it was said that by vertue of his correspondencies and contrivances he had facilitated the reducing of Italy, and had in part been the occasion of the revolt of Maximus's Troops; so that he returned to Constantinople with very favourable hopes, though perhaps not so kind as those of his Rivals; nor did Stilicon seem to presume more than Arbogastus. By the Emperour's indulgence they had a great share in the Triumphant Reception that the people gave him; and as Serena, who well understood the affection and esteem that Theodosius had for them, was no less ignorant of the increase of their late acquir'd fame, she entertain'd them very obligingly, and forc'd a kindness for them to whom she had the least inclination. Certain it is, that her carriage was such toward Stilicon, that it plainly appear'd that she esteem'd him above the rest, and it was afterwards well known, though in prudence she disssembled it, that she was much concern'd for the Honour which he receiv'd in the War, and was not a little joyful for his return. However, she made but little difference in the Reception which she gave to all the three: so that if Stilicon had any advantage above the rest, there was only something to be observ'd more sweet and pleasing, when Stilicon, than when either of the other two came into her presence. But soon after he had reason to believe, that those happy beginnings of his good fortune, with which he had flattered himself before his departure, had not prov'd false to him during his absence, and that though he could not entirely glory to be below'd by the Princess, he might at least conjecture by all manner of signs that the value which she had for him was far different from that which she had for the rest of his Competitors. He had ground enough to be confirm'd in that opinion by several discourses which he had with her; and the very next day after the Emperour's arrival, having happily an opportunity to discourse her in her Closet without any interruption, ushering in with his passionate looks that which he had to say to her: Shall I dare to hope, Madam. (said he with his eyes fix'd upon the ground) that the pardon which you granted to my presumption before my departure, may still continue after my return? And may I not now make this farther protestation, that during an absence wherein we have not wanted employment, and during an Expedition that has been too successful to the Emperour, not to have found some work for those who had the honour to follow him, my thoughts were still employed in the precious remembrance of your Beauty? I dare sincerely avow it, if you will but give me leave; and I will tell you yet something which is no more than truth, that in all those enterprizes that my Duty made me undertake, it was only your favour that I sought, or at least, I thought on nothing more than to render my self thereby worthy of the honour to serve you. Arbogastus, (replied the Princess, smiling) told me just the same; and I think I answered him, that ambition and the desire of Glory were sufficiently predominant in his mind to carry him to Enterprizes of a higher nature. This answer, replied Stilicon, might be fit enough for Arbogastus, in whom certainly ambition prevails over all his passions: But as for myself, though I really affect Glory, and that I am of opinion that that I ought to love it, to the end I may be in your esteem; and though my courage is not incapable of a noble ambition, yet on the other side it is as true, that all my other passions submit to love, or rather, are sacrific'd to love in such a manner, that they have hardly left in my heart any signs of their first impressions. This truth, Madam, is more difficult for me to prove upon this occasion than at another time; for as I find the noblest end that my ambition can aim at, and a transcendent subject to satisfy my love of Glory, in the honour of being your Adorer, and of being own'd by you, I cannot say, that in adoring you, I am the less in love with honour, or that I am not ambitious; but I can safely make you this protestation, that love alone governs my Actions, and that it is love alone to which I am entirely devoted. To which soever of your passions we are engag'd for what you have done for the good of the Empire, and for the service of the Emperour, replied the Princess very bravely, you may believe, Stilicon, that the cause of such worthy effects cannot be odious; and without farther examination, you know that I am too much concern'd for the honour of the Emperour, not to esteem those famous Actions whereby you have so much contributed thereto; and therefore I may truly inform you, that few persons have heard that which Renown has publish'd thereof, with a greater joy than I my self received; and that you have few Friends who are better satisfied with the effects of your courage. That which I have done, added Stilicon, is not sufficiently considerable to have given any great satisfaction to those persons who have the goodness to be concern'd therein; but were it true that they did merit any credit or esteem with you, if you look upon them only as you are interest'd for the good of the Empire, and the service of the Emperour, Arbogastus is no less happy than I; for as his Actions are no less famous, nor of less importance than mine, he must have an equal advantage with me in your thoughts. 'Tis true, (replied Serena very readily) that I have payed that justice which I thought was due to the famous Deeds of Arbogastus, and that it is not in my power to deny desert that esteem which belongs to it. "I am not troubled, replied Stilicon, that the Emperour takes so much notice "of Arbogastus's service: and as I do not pretend to rob him of any part of his Honour, I "never interposed for the smallest boon that he expected from the Emperour's Gratitude. "But I confess, Madam, in relation to your self, I have not the same equity; for if it might "be permitted me, I could wish that you would look upon my Services more favourably "than those of Arbogastus. When you desire that which is unjust, (replied the Princess, smiling) you must not complain if you obtain not your desire; and where it is not in the power "of the person to do it, it may not be perhaps less just to confess it to you. "Ah, Madam, (said "the amorous Stilicon, beholding her with a passionate look) and what injustice do you think "you shall do in preferring in your thoughts a person that adores you with all the respect "and all the humility with which we can look to Heaven, before a presumptuous person "that presently thinks himself worthy to love and serve you, and publishes the same to all "the world, as one that does not believe you to be a price equal to his ambition? It is "not necessary, replied Serena, that I should teach you the difference that I have made; for "without explaining my self any farther, I am apt to think that that you understand it well e- "nough; but in truth, Stilicon, since I must give you an answer to what you say, you will not be "over-happy should I prefer you before Arbogastus; for though I have a respect for some quali- "ties that make him worthy of respect, there are others which hardly permits me to endure him. "Ah, Madam, replied Stilicon, be pleas'd to take nothing from his merit, for the favour "which you shew me; but permit me to hope, that if the haughty carriage of Arbogastus "have displeas'd you, the submission of Rufinus, who under a feigned humility couches "an ambition greater than that of Arbogastus, may not work a contrary effect. He now "presumes as well as Arbogastus to profess himself a Lover of Serena; and though I may "say without an offence to modesty, that in all things he is inferiour to us both, he is now "in so much favour with the Emperour that he may advance his hopes as high as ei- "ther of us, and through the insolence that his fortune infuses into him, he makes no scrup- "ple of declaring as much in publick: Heaven is my witness, that I envy him not the fa- "vour of the Emperour, I could have done it before, and I should do it now, if, as I have "already said, Madam, I had not another passion in my Soul stronger than my ambition;

“but for the honour of serving the Princess Serena—— For that, (said the Princess, interrupting him) if it be true that it be an honour to serve Serena, I advise you not to renounce the favour of Theodosius, which is no less necessary for the enjoyment of Serena, than for the obtaining any other fortune which you can expect at his hands. Do not wonder, said she, at what I say, observing in his looks some kind of surprize, it is not to prefer merit before fortune and virtue; but as you know there is no enjoying Serena but with the Emperor’s approbation, you may believe that she will never dispose of her self without his good liking, though he should leave me at my own liberty. Now you see what my inclinations are, and what are my intentions; and in short, to explain my self to you, with a confidence that perhaps may seem something too free, know that I esteem Stilicon, that I hate Arbogastus, and condemn Ruffinus. The amorous Stilicon was ravish’d with these last words of the Princess, and began to manifest in his eyes, before his lips could express it, the joy that transported him, when Arbogastus entred the Chamber, and presently after him Ruffinus.

The Mourning which all the Court was in for the Emperor Gratian, and which Theodosius carried rather in his heart than in his habit, together with his his natural modesty, had made him refuse the Triumphs and magnificent Honours that were prepar’d for him at Constantinople. But it could not hinder the people from doing all those things which they were capable to perform, to express their affection and loyalty towards him, together with their joy for his happy return, and the glorious success of his Arms; nor the Knights of the Court from contriving Matches for publick fights of Gallantry, very usual for some ages since, wherein they displayed even to envy their Magnificence, their Activity, and their concernment for the good fortune of Emperor; inso much that the Theatres and Hippodrom were fill’d with all those publick Divertisements that a flourishing and magnificent Court might abound in upon such occasions. I will not make you description thereof, for I am not to crowd things of that nature into this relation, only I must tell you there were not wanting all manner of ingenious and costly Scenes, running of Chariots, and Horse-races, Combats of all sorts, and at all Weapons, both a Horseshack, and a foot, and in short all that us’d to be seen at publick Spectacles. My Father, who was then among the young Knights, was one that did not signalize himself the least among them; and it was from him that I learn’d the chiefest particulars. But among all the rest, the Favourites of the Empire were more than ordinarily remarkable in the Colours of the Princess, and bearing upon their Arms and Furniture the character of her name, and all sorts of curious Impreses and Mottos, which might denote their devotion for her service. Stilicon as he was very ready and magnificent withal, signaliz’d his activity in all sorts of Exercises, and shewed his Magnificence in his Furniture. Nor was there less in that of Arbogastus, nor did he less manfully behave himself in the Courses, and upon all occasions where vigour and activity were necessary. But Ruffinus acquitted himself but meanly, either of the one, or the other; for as he was less liberal than his Rivals, and less used to the Exercises of the Body, he did not pass at that assembly either for an Active or Magnificent. As he had a great judgment in all things, he very well discern’d his disadvantage, and though he could find no excuses for his miscarriage in the Courses, yet he endeavoured to pretend something for his Furniture, the means whereof he attributed to other causes than that of sparing. As for Stilicon, though he neither lov’d nor esteem’d Ruffinus, and that at that very time he found new occasions of disgust, beholding him apparel’d in Serena’s Colours, he was satisfied to see that his Rival had worn them to his own shame, and was unwilling to heap too much discontent at one time. But Arbogastus was not so moderate; for the hatred which he already had against him, being now augmented by an accession of fresh malice to see him wear the Princess’s Colours, and to presume also to crowd himself in for a Champion, he could not dissemble the joy which he had for his ill success, so that he omitted nothing to make it known to all the world. And therefore as Ruffinus was ill belov’d by the Court, it entred presently into Arbogastus’s thoughts, so that he could not conceal it from Ruffinus himself; and some few days after being together with him, Stilicon, and several others in the Princess’s Chamber, where were also present several Ladies of the Court, who were come to visit her, the discourse of the publick Sights, which was then the entertainment of the company, being at an end, all the Ladies and the Knights that were present began to speak in the praise of Stilicon and Arbogastus, as well for the fair Courses which they had run, with a success little different, as for the magnificence of their Furniture. Though the commendations which they gave them were all their due, and that they had truly got all the honour of the Tourny. Stilicon heard the discourse very moderately and modestly: but Arbogastus not being able to dissemble his thoughts, and not being willing to let slip that opportunity of discovering what lay brooding in his mind: after he had beheld Ruffinus with a smile of derision; It was a shameful thing, said he, of any Champion who had the honour to wear the Princess's colours, not to perform something worthy to be taken notice of. I cannot tell whether I myself did my duty, Stilicon I am sure acquitted himself very well: but Ruffinus, of whom you speak not a word, has so far excell'd us all, both for the gallantry of his courſes, and the magnificence of his furniture, and has so highly honoured the colours of the Princess which he wore as well as we, that I fear he will now be the only person, who must henceforward enjoy all her favour. I do not believe, (replied Ruffinus changing his colour) that I have done any discredit to the colours of the Princess, or possibly that I am less worthy the honour of wearing them: For if it be true, that in Tilting you have an advantage over me; I have perhaps the advantage over you, in other things no less important than Tilting. For counsel and treaty I must confess, said Arbogastus, that I must yield to you: But I desire you to stick close to your Gown, and not to tilt any more.

At these words, considering the gesture with which they were uttered, all the respect which that noble Company had to the reputation of Ruffinus, could not hinder them from falling into a very great laughter, which instead of making Ruffinus any thing ashamed, assisted him to conceal the present confusion of his thoughts. Any other person but he might possibly have been nonplus'd, but he had a wit that was able to overcome greater difficulties than what he was then expos'd to: and using a method quite contrary to what any other person would have taken upon that occasion, and looking upon Arbogastus with a smile; To tell you the truth, said he, it will be no great punishment to me, though I never tilt again: For I had rather be seen in the Emperours Closet than in the Lists. It would be to very good purpose, replied Stilicon, if in the Emperours closet you would wear the colours and characters of the Princess as you wore them to day, and that you were call'd to council as the Princess's champion. In whatsoever quality I may be call'd thither, replied Ruffinus, I shall never be ill received, nor shall I be wanting in my duty. And as the Emperour perhaps is no more ill satisfied in my services than in yours, the judgment that he may make between us, possibly will not be either to yours or the advantage of Arbogastus. I make no doubt (said Arbogastus with the same behaviour as he had spoken before) but the Emperour will pay that justice which he owes to your great merit, and the good opinion which he has of you, gives us sufficiently to understand, that great men cannot err in their choice. But for the Princess, I cannot tell whether she be altogether so just, and I question whether she be so well satisfied, in the honour which you have done to her colours, as the Emperour is satisfied in your services.

Serenus, who in contemning Ruffinus loved Arbogastus never the better, was not more pleas'd to find the former so much thamed, as she was vexed at the presumption of the latter: and therefore undertaking the discourse with a design to humble him; As the choice of my colours was free to any person, said she, I could not hinder them that were so minded from wearing them, but if it had been necessary for me to have been consulted, 'tis an even wager whether there had been any more than one person, to whom I would have granted that favour. Nor can I tell (said Ruffinus immediately to Arbogastus smiling) whether that award would have been so favourable to you as you imagine: for in my opinion 'tis neither you nor I, that the Princess would have honoured with her choice. Your opinion, replied Arbogastus, may not probably be so full of reasons, for though our merit and services are equal, there is a great difference in our birth. I confess (said Stilicon very smartly) I am not of the blood of Hector, but I much question whether there be in the world a nobler extraction, than that from whence I am descended: and for other things, I cannot tell whether the difference which is between us, be so much for your advantage.

This answer of Stilicon wrought so upon the company, that Arbogastus was not a little abashed: And as among us, that pretended descent of the Gaulish Princes from the Son of Hector, has pass'd for an idle Chimera, it was no unpleasing thing to see them contemn in the person of Arbogastus, a man of an excessive pride, that to which in another Prince, descended from the same line, they would have born a great respect. However he prepared to give Stilicon an answer, and because he took those words from him, after another manner than he had done from Ruffinus, whom he despis'd; there was therefore some danger that a reply might have transported them, to a higher dispute than that of words, had not the Princess interpos'd, and us'd her Authority to hinder the farther pursuit of the discourse; She mistrusted however her power, to hinder the effects which it might produce: And though less than there pass'd, might have hurried two persons full of courage and valour, Rivals and Competitors in all things, to the worst of extremities; before they went out of the Chamber, she caus'd the Emperour to be acquainted therewith, who reconcil'd them the same day, forbidding them to quarrel upon any consideration whatever: and farther declar'd to Arbogastus with a stern authority, that he could not despise Ruffinus without displeasing displeasing him, in condemning the esteem which he had for him.

From that time forward, Ruffinus understanding that of his two Rivals, one was better belov'd, and the other more respected than he, and fearing least in the end they might have the same advantage in the favour of Theodosius as they had in Serena's good opinion, instigated at the same time by his love, and by his ambition, though in the opinion of the world he was less addicted to Love than to Ambition, resolv'd to employ all the dexterity of his wit, to undermine as well their respect with the Princess, as their favour with the Emperour, though he forsook less trouble in his design against Arbogastus, than in what he meditated against Stilicon; and as they were persons of a different temper, he resolv'd to use a different method of proceeding against them: for Arbogastus, he saw well that he had not much to do to effect his business with Serena, finding by several signs that he was not all belov'd by her, but he knew him to be in good esteem with the Emperour, and likewise understood that the Emperour's approbation was sufficient to render him the enjoyment of Serena, and consequently to raise him to a higher degree of Honour. He was also of opinion, that it was not with Serena, but with Theodosius that he was to lay the foundation of his contrivance against him, not doubting but his fierce, boiling and tumultuous humour would furnish him with opportunities enough. For Stilicon, as he questioned not but that he was the best belov'd by Serena, and that in that regard he found he had a greater advantage over him, than in respect of the Emperour's favour; therefore believing it would be a difficult thing to prejudice him in the opinion of a just, prudent and apprehensive Emperour, a person so wise, and who did his Duty so exactly, he resolv'd to play his game against him with his Mistress, and with her to practise against him as he practis'd with the Emperour against Arbogastus. He hasten'd his design with all diligence, resolving, in the plot which he had, to ruine both, to make use of the one against the other, equally to serve his turn; hoping thereby not only a better success in his design, through the help which he should receive from them; but in the end, by the ill offices which they should reciprocally do one another, of which he would not fail to give them both a secret account, they would be transported to those extremities of passion and anger, in which they might both perish, by that means to rid himself of two formidable Competitors. To bring about this project he admirably disssembled the hatred which he had against them, and became so great a master of his passions, that for some days they could neither of them discern that he bore the least malice or spleen against them, or that he had any bad thoughts toward them. He began to hold a fairer correspondence with them than ever he had done, and in a short time after he gave them to understand by many signs that he desired their friendship; and they had the less reason to suspect him, because he had receiv'd the same commands from the Emperour as they had done, in point of reconciliation, who gave them to understand that they could not oblige him in any thing more, than in living peaceably together. Arbogastus, who was more courageous than subtil; and Stilicon, who as cunning and politick as he was, yet was more free hearted and plain dealing, had no distrust in the least of the bad intentions of Ruffinus, and how unwilling soever they were at first to entertain the testimonies of his feigned friendship, in time they suffered themselves to be deceiv'd, and to make him returns of true sincerity. However, when they were both together he behav'd himself but coldly, making them both believe that it was only for him in particular that he had such a peculiar kindness, and to take away all suspicion of holding any correspondence with his Rival. But when he found either of them alone, then it was that he discovered himself, or at least that he feigned to discover himself to them, and that he omitted nothing to persuade each of them apart how much he desired to unite himself, and joyn interest with him in particular for the ruine of his Competitor. Whatever contempt they had of his person, they saw that they were no more to despise his fortune; and that although even in the very judgment of the Emperour, he was much inferiour to them in all things, yet that with him he was in as great a reputation as any person in the Empire, and might glory to have no less than Stilicon, much more than Arbogastus. In short, he so behav'd himself that he wrought them into a belief of what he pretended, and so allured both one and t'other apart to think that if he was not intimately their friend, yet he was not their enemy: and when he saw himself in that forwardness, he began then to go on with the execution of his design, without losing any opportunity. And to this purpose, when he saw himself alone with Arbogastus, amusing him with a false confidence; "I confess, said he, that I know my self unworthy the affections of Serena, and that I am assur'd they are due to a person of greater merit than my self; but certain it is, that if I must renounce my hopes, I shall more willingly abjure them for your sake than for Stilicon's; and since I cannot be happy my self, I wish you may enjoy that good fortune to which I dare not aspire, rather than he. Nevertheless, I clearly perceive that Serena has no more kindness for me than for you, and that Stilicon enjoys the sole preeminence, though with less merit than yours, and perhaps little superiour to mine. Shall we suffer this injustice to be done to our fortune, without using some endeavours to divert the effects? And shall we suffer this Vandal to easily to ravish from us a happiness which you better than he deserve, and of which I think my self no less worthy than himself: let us try, Arbogastus, let us try all that a just grief can infuse into us, to overturn the advantage which he has got over us; let us unite our Interests against a Rival that will be too happy, if we become unfortunate. And since that Love as well as War allows us to make use of all sorts of Weapons to distress our Enemies, let us employ against him all those that we can imagine may give us the victory.

In this manner did he incite Arbogastus upon every occasion that he could meet with: and the amorous Gaul, who was too apt to follow his incitements, and who look'd upon the advantages that Stilicon had with a jealousy that gave him but little repose, most willingly entred into the combination, and offered as much as he could desire to ruine their common Competitor. On the other side, when Ruffinus found an opportunity to be private with Stilicon, feigning before him the same assurance in point of Ambition, as with Arbogastus he had done in point of Love: "You are most worthy, said he, of the esteem which the Emperour has for you; and although it be natural to us to seek our own advancement to the prejudice of the fortune of others, I behold yours without the least disturbance, as well in regard of your great merit, as of the judgment which I have hitherto made of your inclinations, in which I have found nothing that can make me fear your power over persons that have not deserved your hatred. But for the power of Arbogastus, I must confess, that I cannot endure it patiently, not only because he has no endowment that signalizes him, unless it be that valour which is common to Lions and Leopards. But also for that both you and I have no small reason to fear his impious, terrible and violent humour, so that should he attain the top of a happiness to be supreme in the favour of the Emperour, to which he takes a very good way, he would infallibly ruine and destroy us. Therefore, Stilicon, since it no less concerns you than my self, to oppose the growing advancement of a person that will overturn our fortunes, or rather, since you have more reason to expect than I, as being his most formidable Competitor, to feel the first effects of his power, and that though you were assur'd of Serena's affections (to intermix the interest of Love with that of Ambition) you cannot be ignorant how little they would avail, should Theodosius stand firm to Arbogastus, let us therefore joyn together that reputation we have in the Emperour's favour, to remove a person that would endure no companion if he could be our Master. And since you and I may well behold one another's fortune without envy, and without any design to cross one another, let us put a stop to that person who only seeks to mount so high that he may cast us headlong.

With such provocations as these Ruffinus ply'd Stilicon; and because Stilicon truly hated Arbogastus, as a person that was his Rival in all things, and knew it was all truth that Ruffinus said of his humour; and for that being ambitious as he was, he look'd with emulation and envy upon all those that went about to dispute with him the chief place in the Emperour's affection, and which indeed was the most forcible argument, because he was not ignorant, as having been told by Serena her self, that for the obtaining of her, the favour and approbation of the Emperour was chiefly necessary, and that by that means Arbogastus might endanger those advantages which he had over him, through the inclinations of the Princess, he readily consented to the proposal that Ruffinus made him, to use their utmost endeavour to ruine his credit. But there was this difference in their proceeding, that Stilicon did openly that which Ruffinus did only by indirect and by-ways, and that he never went about to mischief Arbogastus till he found that the other sought to do him all the injury he was able, both with Serena and Theodosius. So that Arbogastus being no more cunning to conceal his thoughts than Stilicon, by reason of the little care they took to hide the ill offices they did one another, they serv'd Ruffinus in his design as much as he could desire. All this while that subtil Sophister remain'd fix'd in the favour of the Emperour, not only because he was really useful to him in the management of all State Affairs, but because he never lost any occasion to please and divert him, complying with all his inclinations, and for that because he knew the Emperour was very devout, and extremely zealous in the service of that God whom we serve, he also feigned to be very devout, and a piety like his, conversing with Cloystered Votaries, and spending his time all day in the Temples, though in his heart he had less Religion than Stilicon; who not affecting piety, yet observ'd a moderation

tion and reservedness as to those things, and perhaps he had less than Arbogastus, who had no religion at all.

Through this care which he had to disguise his inclinations, and to cover them with a Veil of piety, he had obtained such a repute with the Emperour, that that great personage subtil in other things, suffering himself to be deceived by outward appearances; gave ear to him and hearkned to his advice, more willingly than to any persons in the Court, though he had a greater esteem for Stilicon, and a greater value for Arbogastus. And Ruffinus made an admirable use of that advantage, not failing to return the blow upon his Rivals when he found a fit opportunity, though after a different manner. Certain it is that Arbogastus himself, gave him opportunity enough to do him all ill offices, for being naturally fierce and impatient, he was in a rage if his counsels were not followed in the government of Affairs, murmuring at it without discretion or circumspection, before persons that might tell the Emperour again: and sometimes he had so little power over himself, as not to refrain the violence of his behaviour in his very presence.

The Emperour who knew it, and considered that which was good in him as well as his faults, endured those violent sallies of his pride with a wonderful patience, and attributed them more to his boistrous humour, than to any bad intention. But Ruffinus lying upon the catch, like those that hide their hand when they throw the stone, did not want his Agents, who without appearing any way concern'd: fail'd not to whisper in the Emperour's Ear the danger of such a violent spirit: and when he himself found him in a good humour to hear him upon that subject, he told him all he could to create a jealousy, and make him suspect his intentions. Through the good nature of the Emperour for a good while he wrought little or no effect: but in time the Emperour finding likelihood enough, and something of truth in what he said, by little and little began to conceive some distrust in his mind, and to look upon Arbogastus as a person, likely enough to attempt a disturbance and to work mischief enough too if once he were set upon it. Ruffinus did not fail to heighten his jealousy, by putting him in mind of the great authority he had among the men of war, of whom he was admired for his valour, and beloved for the liberty he gave them, and the care that he took to see them well paid: and in short he omitted nothing, that could either make him be hated or dreaded, but he did it so artificially, that the Emperour could not attribute it to any other cause, than the zeal he had for his service.

As for Ruffinus he observed a very strict reservedness, not only out of the assurance which he had of the Emperour's good will, but because Stilicon did not give him any probable occasion to accuse him, He only was contented therefore, in reference to Stilicon to persuade the Emperour after his dextrous manner, that he had a very high ambition, that every day he sought to make new friends at Court: as also in the Armies by the employments which he bestows in the Armies, and by many other benefits, of which a just suspicion may easily make a right interpretation, and which according to the common opinion was only out of design, to advance himself higher than he is, than out of any real fidelity that he took so much care, studying rather by his own merits than by the Emperour's favour to gain the heart of the Princess. This was all that at present he could insinuate into the Emperour, to his prejudice, and waiting only when time would give him a farther advantage, he turned all his thoughts, to undermine his favour with Serena, with whom he then saw him in a high esteem. He spent a great deal of time and diligence to find an opportunity, and at length he found one, or at least he believed he hath met with one to his hearts desire.

Considering the condition he was in with the Emperour, Serena, who gave way to favour, had been constrained to suffer his addreses as well as others, and though she never return'd him any very favourable answers, for as much as she had but very little respect for him, as also for that her love was already fixed upon Stilicon, however she gave him leave to talk of his passion, as she did to the rest of his competitors, or at least she permitted him not having any means to hinder him: and through this advantage which he had equal to the rest, one day being alone with her, which happened very often by reason of his dexterity in taking his time for all things, after he had framed his countenance to the discourse he was to make; As it may be, said he, I thought myself the least considerable of all those, that openly make profession of their love to you, and as in your opinion Madam, and possibly according to the verdict of truth it self, I am far inferiour in merit to Stilicon and Arbogastus; so was I in fear that my fortune would be forced to submit to theirs, and that by the power of their luck, they would carry away from me that, which they could not hope by their love and fidelity. But now they themselves begin to free me from that mistrust, so that I despair not at this time, of being the only person of the three, devoted to your service till death. If it be so, said the Princess smiling, I shall see you with a better will and humour than I see you sometimes, at least if such Rivals as they are, could give us any cause of discontent in me: and therefore since it would never trouble me to be rid of you all, it is your fault you do not tell me, what grounds you have for this hope. For Arbogastus, replied Ruffinus, I know you are too wise to believe him capable of love: for though in all his passions, he has seem'd to proceed even to madness, I assure my self that for that very violence of his love which he has declared to you, you will soon see your self quit of him. And as for Stilicon, his ambition for a while may make him covet the Niece of Theodosius, but if he have any love, it is not in that place, where his Ambition stops him for the present

Though Serena might well suspect those words as spoken by Ruffinus, yet they made her change colour: For seeing that she then loved Stilicon, the least distrust that you could insinuate into her, touch'd her to the heart. Nevertheless she recovered her self in a moment, and looking upon Ruffinus with a behaviour, that would have made a person less dextrous than himself have believed, that she nothing regarded his discourse; By what I can find, said she, the grounds of your assurance are not altogether so infallible as you imagine them: for neither is the violence of Arbogastus's passions incompatible with their continuance, nor is the ambition of Stilicon, incompatible with his love: at least I shall never be perswaded to it, till I hear it from some other mouth than yours. True it is, (replied Ruffinus with a very serious look) that I am a person suspected at this time, and therefore I shall say no more, but stay till time shall inform you what you ought to think of Stilicon's inclinations. I do not concern my self, replied the Princess very severely, to seek for any farther information, for I am contented to believe that Stilicon's inclinations were always conformable to his duty. I cannot tell, replied the cunning Ruffinus, which duty you mean, only I am apt to think with you Madam, that Stilicon would not be wanting in his duty toward his Prince: But I think he is not altogether so regular in what obliges a Lover to the service of a Mistress. As I believe, replied the Princess, that a person who makes a profession of virtue, is equally oblig'd both to the one and the other, for that reason I conjecture Stilicon will not be wanting in either, and that he would be no less faithful to his Mistress, than to his Prince. I should believe as you do, replied Ruffinus, had I not been a witness of things that convince the contrary, and if by misfortune Arbogastus were not as much suspected as my self, he could tell you what Stilicon's fidelity is.

These words, though the Princess gave little heed to them, yet put her into some disorder, just as Arbogastus, whom Ruffinus had mentioned, and as a better Artist in cunning and deceit, had exactly instructed before, entred the Chamber. The last words that Ruffinus had spoken of him, made Serena blush at the very sight of him, and Arbogastus guelling at the cause as soon as he perceived it, though he seem'd to know nothing thereof, and seeing Ruffinus look upon him with a malicious smile, as soon as he was fate down by the Princess, who fix'd her eyes upon the ground in a considering posture; I cannot tell, said he, whether she Princess be more disturb'd at my visit, than you seem to be glad of it: but methinks I equally observe no less disgust in hers, than pleasantness in yours. Serena did not give Arbogastus an answer immediately, and therefore Ruffinus preventing her just as she was going to speak; I cannot tell, said he to Arbogastus, whether you have given the Princess any occasion to be in this deep meditation, but truly my errand hither was to tell her, that you can inform her what Stilicon's fidelity is. Ah Ruffinus, (replied Arbogastus, counterfeiting an amazement) is it possible that a wise man like Ruffinus, should commit a fault not to be pardoned, by such an inconsiderate person as Arbogastus? and do you not consider that though the Princess were not concern'd in those things which we know, yet they nearly touch'd a person, from whom the secrecy ought to have been conceal'd. Had I been better advis'd, perhaps I had not spoken so much, but since 'tis out that which is pass'd can not be recalled, nor did I say any thing more to the Princess but that you could inform her, what kind of fidelity Stilicon's was. 'Tis very true that you told me so, (said Serena, looking upon him with a sornre disdain) but I never told you I was so much concern'd, as to desire to be satisfied of the truth. "If it be so, replied Arbogastus, I shall not deceive the person who has trusted me with this secret: for being so indifferent for Stilicon's affection, I am quit of a trouble which your curiosity might have given me. "You may be sure, said the Princess, that I am no more curious after Stilicon's concerns than after yours, though I am not so little curious after your affairs, but that I shall be glad to hear news if any person can tell me any. "I will tell you then some news, replied Arbogastus, if you please, or rather I will inform you without speaking a word: And whatsoever discontent I have testified to you for prejudicing by indiscretion a person of quality and merit, who is concern'd therein, I know no consideration strong enough to hinder me from pleasing you, wherever I meet with an opportunity.

At these words, without expecting that she should manifest any farther curiosity for what what he was about to inform her; and before she could tell him whether she had any desire to be inform'd or no, and so prevent him in his design, he drew forth some eight or ten Letters out of his Pocket, and presented them to Serena: See, Madam, said he, whether you know that hand. Serena opened the first Letters that she took out of the Packer, not without some inward disturbance, and presently found it to be Stilicon's hand, with which she was very well acquainted, and which she saw every day upon one occasion or other, though perhaps she might receive none of his Letters; the manner of their being folded up put her out of doubt that they were Love-Letters; nor was she long in an uncertainty, when calling her eyes upon the first superscription, she read there, To the charming Irene. If it be to Irene then that he applies himself, said the Princess, blushing, I know not where he can better make his applications.

She spake the very truth in those words; for there was not any Lady in all the Court that could contend with Irene for beauty, and all other advantages besides. She was bred up by her Parents, who were of the chiefest in Dignity there, but some years after being contracted to Flavian, one of the most eminent personages in Gratian's Court, she was married at Rome, where she made her abode till the death of her Husband, who was slain in the War against Maximus. Stilicon and all the Court had seen her at Rome, during the Emperour's stay there: and at Constantinople she was not only visited by all the persons of Honour, but she was also without doubt courted by several, there being few women in the world that were more desirable. So that if Serena could admit of a jealousy, there was no person more proper to give her cause, and make her suspect the fidelity of a man devoted to the service of one of her degree and merit: it was not therefore without an apparent inclination to a disgust which she could not shun, that she cast her eyes once more upon the Letter, wherein she found these words.

To the charming Irene:

YOU are unjust to accuse me of more Ambition than Love; for certain it is, that I have no more Ambition than to serve me in my Love; and that I seek not for honour, but only to make me worthy of you. 'Tis out of that desire that I use so much diligence, to serve those persons who can advance me; and though I highly prize the favour of my Master, you ought to believe that the favours of my Mistress are of a more precious value, and that all the Grandeur of the Empire is not so dear to me as are the fetters of the fair Irene.

I did not believe, (said Serena, giving more credit than she needed have done to the Paper which they presented to her) that Stilicon had chained up his fortune in the fetters of Irene. And I confess, that we may be deceived in our judgments. But let us see whether the other Letters do confirm us in what we have discovered in the first. And at the same time opening another Letter she found these words.

To the most pleasing Irene.

YOU were discoursed of this day to me in the Emperour's Lodgings; but as they were persons much suspected, I made very little discovery of my self, but left them to think what appearances only anim'd the world withal. In the meanwhile I beg you to believe that this constraint makes me die, and that in a Court where so many fair things are to be seen, I have neither eyes nor thoughts for any other object but you.

This is yet a little more plain, replied the cunning Ruffinus, and methinks that Stilicon could not more clearly make us apprehend that here he only disguises his fortune, while his heart is with Irene. I believe it it as well as you, said Arbogastus to Ruffinus; and I am of opinion that you and I may be the persons whom he leaves to judge by appearances; for it is not many days since that we were speaking to him of Irene, as the Emperour was making ready. You have decided the matter very judiciously, (said Serena, striving to conceal what she had in her thoughts) but it behoves us to try a little farther before we determine any thing certainly. And so saying, she opened another Letter, and there read these words.

To the fair Irene.

They who shall see me enter the Lists to morrow with any other Colours than yours, will not make a right judgment of my intentions; and others, with as little justice, will attribute what I shall act there, not to be done for your sake alone. But since I am not permitted to be your Champion but in secret, I shall most carefully conceal this secret, only I shall trust it in some dubious Imprese, which hiding it as much as is required, shall give me that consolation which is necessary for me.

Ab! Madam, then cry'd Ruffinus, would you have more to convince you how wrongfully we are accus'd by you? For if you remember what happened at the last Tilting after the return of the Emperour, when Arbogastus and Stilicon carried your Colours with so much Honour, and I with so little, can you mistake the foul play of Stilicon, or can you be so blind as not to see the dubious Imprese of which he makes mention. Have you forgot that he caus'd a Syren to be painted upon his Shield openly, for the resemblance which it had with the name of Serena; but in truth, as you perceive in the Paper for Irene, since it is but changing two Letters in Serena, and adding one to Irene; and this equivocation answerable to his intent, equally preserv'd his secret, and disguis'd the outward appearance. Neither is any so clear, nor so well interpreted, reply'd Arbogastus; so that Stilicon cannot inform you more in a hundred Letters than he has done in two words. I shall see what is in the rest, (said the Princess with a forc'd behaviour) but not before such severe accusers as you are.

And concluding these words she put them up, as well those which she had read, as those which she intended to peruse. Arbogastus besought her to restore them back again, telling her it would be an unhandsome thing for him, out of mere complacency to her, to hazard the reputation of Irene, who was in such esteem at Court both for her quality and merit. But Serena absolutely denyed to return them, promising, as soon as she had read them all over to restore them, and assuring him that she had no design to publish what was in them; and presently after she left them, and shut her self up in her Closet, where, at her liberty she read all the other Letters of Stilicon, which she found altogether answerable to the first, and confirm'd her in the opinion into which they endeavour'd to persuade her of his infidelity, being such as they had pick'd out among a great number of others to serve their turn.

The rest of that day the Princess would not be spoken with, so that Stilicon coming to the door was refus'd as well as the rest; but the next day she resolv'd to see him, and she so order'd it, that she resolv'd to be alone with him in her Chamber. He saw in her countenance some marks of his misfortune, but he could not well interpret the meaning, and therefore confiding in his own innocency, he conjectured every thing else rather than the truth of what had been contrived against him. Serena beheld him for some time with eyes full of indignation, and by and by she took them off again with a behaviour full of disdain, and indeed she shew'd in her whole countenance those signs of a general inward commotion, which in a very large measure perplex'd the amorous Stilicon: for some time he patiently bore his disturbance without speaking, but at length willing to know the cause, with a trembling utterance, he besought the Princess to inform him. But the words were hardly out of his mouth, when the Princess interrupting him, I possess nothing that is worthy taking notice of, said she, and perhaps less that deserves the passion of any person. But before I say any more, (drawing forth one of the Letters, and shewing him it open) tell me, said she, whether this be your hand or no.

Though Stilicon believ'd himself innocent, and least thought of those Letters, while Serena kept her hand upon the superscription, yet the behaviour of the Princess so surpris'd him, that he stood like one that had been struck speechless, and whether it were out of a fear that he had written something that had displeas'd her, or out of the usual mistrust that accompanies love; and which, considering those signs of anger that appear'd in the countenance of Serena, might easily produce that effect. He was troubled in such a manner, and and so difordered as well in his looks as in his discourse, that he could hardly find two or three words to return an answer, only at length he confessed that it was his hand. The commotion of his mind and his guilty countenance, were enough to convince the Princess without any more to do: and so putting up the Letter again, and with all striving to her utmost to keep in that resentment, which she was unwilling should express it felt beyond what she intended; Trouble not your self Stilicon, said she, for your crime is not so great nor your punishment so rigorous: for though perhaps I could easily let you see, that 'twas not to Serena or the Niece of Theodosius, that you needed to have acted your feigned Courtship; you shall easily be quit of that duty, by never seeing me again as long as you live. Never as long as I live, cryed Stilicon in an extatic; No Stilicon not while you live, replied Serena aloud and sternly, and I shall find means to force you to an observance. Concluding these words, she went into her Closet and lock'd her self in, and would not hear one word more of reply.

In truth, said the Princess of Suevia out of her own sweet disposition (which made her interrupt Martian in his discourse) in a moderate person methinks that behaviour of hers was too violent; and as I always take the part of the unfortunate, I wish she had heard Stilicon speak for himself, before she had proceeded to so much extremity. She had too violent proofs, replied the Queen of the Cimbrians, to produce any mild effects: and indeed we mortals are subject to greater weakneses, and to do pieces of greater injustice than this. But I cannot apprehend why Ruffinus made use of Arbogastus, in that which he might have done alone; for if I am not deceived, 'twas he that contrived the plot, and gave Irene's letters to Arbogastus. You judge right Madam, replied Martian, for it is most certain that Arbogastus acted only, by the solicitation and instruction of Ruffinus. But besides that I have told you that Ruffinus being nothing so bold and valiant as his two Rivals, chose rather to oppose Arbogastus and Stilicon's anger, than expose himself to danger, he had no less a design to make them quarrel one with another, and so to rid himself of both at once, if it were possible. And for that reason he considered that the foul play he played with Stilicon, would either be concealed, and so Stilicon would be quite lost in Serena's favour, or if it should be discovered, Stilicon would understand that it was from Arbogastus, that Serena had the Letters; and so looking upon him as the principal Author of his misfortune, and as a person by whom he should get more honour than by Ruffinus, he would turn all his fury upon him, and give the Emperour time to hinder the effects thereof, from falling upon Ruffinus. He endeavoured also to make Stilicon act after the same manner, in those ill offices which he did Arbogastus with the Emperour, making use of all his subtilty, to destroy two such formidable Enemies.

The End of the Third Book of the Seventh Part.

PHARAMOND.

BOOK IV.

IT would be a difficult thing, Madam, to represent to your fancy the condition, where-into the amorous Stilicon was reduced, by the severe entertainment that Serena had given him: for as that misfortune befel him at a time, when he had least reason to fear it; it was so much the greater by how much the less it was foreseen, whereby he found his heart not so well prepared to bear it. This lover equally astonish'd and afflicted, examined himself a long time in the Chamber, where he heard those cruel words that so tormented his soul before he went out of it: And not finding any thing that he could recal to his memory, which in his opinion could provoke Serena to so much indignation, his astonishment encreas'd without lessening his grief at all: and sometimes he was in doubt whether he ought not to attribute to Serena's frowardness only, that which his innocence suggested to him, could proceed from no other cause. He had sufficiently viewed the Letter, that Serena shewed him to perceive that it was his own hand, but not having read any thing therein nor seen the superscription, he could not divine to whom he had written, nor of what offence he stood convicted by that Letter. However he found that he was thereby accused, and he chose rather to fall into a misfortune, which calumny and slander might have produced, and which when the truth came to light, would as suddenly vanish, than permit himself to fear a far greater Calamity, should it be any change in the natural disposition or inclinations of the Princess. He had for some time perplexed himself with these thoughts, when Sextilia one of the Princess's women, for whom he had the greatest kindness, and one whom he knew took his part against his Rivals, enter'd the Chamber: and wondring to see him there alone, she was yet more surpris'd when she beheld in his looks and in his behaviour all the symptoms of a violent grief: whereupon she pressed him to tell her the cause with so much earnestness, that he found thereby she was not a little concern'd for him.

The afflicted Stilicon, who desired as much as in him lay to find out the true cause of his misfortune, told her though with a great deal of trouble the whole story: and conjured her to inform him if she knew, what offence he had committed to have drawn it upon him, or rather what way they had made use of to destroy him. Sextilia professed that she knew nothing of it in the least, and all that she could say was, that she had seen the Princess for some hours, reading and studying upon certain Letters, at which time she often mention'd his name with many expressions of vexation and anger, and that she believed that she had received those Letters from Arbogastus and Ruffinus, who the day before had had a very long and particular discourse with her. Stilicon then made no question but that it was his two Rivals, who had done him this ill office: so that all the commands which the Emperour had given him to live friendly together, could not have hindred him from going to find them out, with an intention scarce to have been regulated by his obedience, had he not believed that it would be better, first to endeavour to find out the truth, before he suffered himself to be hurried to attempt those things, which he could not do without using extremity. Nor would the fear which he had of displeasing the Princess, give him leave to stay in her Chamber any longer: and therefore after he had conjured Sextilia to be kind to him, and to endeavour to find out what his offence might be, he went his way.

He continued for some days before he adventured to return again to visit the Princess, being willing to yield that respect to the command which she had laid upon him, never to see see her more, which made him suffer so much during that constraint, that the effects thereof were easily to be observed in his countenance. His Rivals perceiv'd it with no small joy, his friends were not a little sorry. And the Emperour declared himself so much troubled for him, that Stilicon not being able to disown what was so apparent, and yet not willing to discover the real cause for fear of displeasing the Princess, rather than out of any other consideration, was constrain'd to attribute it to some indisposition of Body. In the mean while he neither durst visit the Princess nor the Empress, in so much that he had hardly confidence to see her in the Emperour's Apartment, where she was every day. And as he never beheld her without trembling, or without such a fear which the night have easily discern'd in his looks, had she but vouchsafed to cast her eyes upon his countenance, he had still the misfortune to observe that she turn'd her eyes away, and kept off from looking upon him with all the wairiness imaginable; or if at any time her eyes were constrain'd to make him their object, it was with so much indifference that he had reason to believe that he was entirely ruined in her affection. But that which pierc'd him to the very heart, was, that during all this while he saw Arbogastus and Ruffinus continually attending her, and that she rarely went to the Temple to walk, or to any other place, without being waited upon by one, or both of them, but attended with more diligence by Arbogastus, that Gaul not caring for any affront she put upon him, or at least not dreading the effects of her displeasure so much as the rest did. He observ'd likewise that she conversed with them after a more familiar manner than she had been accustomed to do, especially with Arbogastus for whom she had all along an unkindness, which she could hardly dissemble in company, and that she now openly treated him with all the civility that he could reasonably desire.

Stilicon for some days suffered all patiently that a heart like his could endure, striving with himself all that it was possible for him to do. But at length he was of opinion that no respect was to hinder him from endeavouring to justify himself, or at least from teaching what his crime was, from Sextilia's mouth, since he could not find it out by any other ways that he tryed. He durst not visit her after the command she had laid upon him to the contrary, fearing also to appear in her presence in any other place; but at last he found it necessary to clear the truth by speaking to her, for it cruelly oppress'd him to let them that had accused him carry away a victory so easily obtain'd by his silence. To that purpose he endeavour'd to speak to Serena in the Empress's presence, or as she was taking the air, but when she was walking abroad he found her attended by Arbogastus, to whom all others gave way, either by reason of his authority, or out of other considerations; and as often by Ruffinus, whose reputation was highly revered by all the Court, and therefore fearing the success of that enterprise, he was unwilling to expose himself before his Rivals, lest he might give them any cause to be glad, should he receive a repulse; and as for speaking to her in the presence of the Empress, in regard she was never there without a great crowd of company, he had observ'd that still when he drew near to her, she always turn'd another way to avoid him if possibly she could, thereby depriving him of all the means to discourse her. At length finding all other ways prove ineffectual, he resolv'd to write to her, and gave the Letter to Sextilia, who was willing to undertake the delivery: the contents whereof were as follow, or much to the same purpose.

To the Princess Serena.

I Cannot tell what is my crime; but as I know you are not unjust, I find that I have committed an offence, since I have deserv'd your anger; it is but some few days ago that you permitted me to believe my self the most happy among men. But now, Madam, 'tis your pleasure that I should think my self the most unhappy: nor can I think there is any likelihood that I should fall from one extremity to another, if I were not acnyl guilty: Yes, Madam, I have offended since you have condemn'd me. But for pity's sake inform me what my crime is, and give me so much confidence as to justify my innocence, for that is impossible; since I have displeas'd you, but to render me more odious to my self when I shall know my offence: This is the only favour which a person, which you once permitted to hope the most glorious favour in the world, now begs at your hands. Nor will he at his death ever complain of you, if you will but let him know the cause of that death to which you have condemn'd him.

Sextilia presented this Letter to Serenus, and she had so much reputation with her as to oblige her to read it; but she could get no other answer from her, but that Stilicon was the most ingrateful, and the most unfaithful among men, forbidding her any more to speak of him; so that Stilicon understanding the ill success of his Letter, and knowing himself to be altogether unfortunate, though altogether as ignorant of the cause, fell almost into a despair. It was in his mind sometimes to throw himself at the Emperour's feet, upon whose goodness he relyed, and whose affection for him he well knew, with an intention to inform him of his misfortune, and beg the aid of his compassion. But he was afraid, with probability enough, to provoke the Princess by that way of proceeding, and therefore more boldly resolv'd to speak to her himself, and to receive from her own lips his last condemnation. Fortune seem'd to offer him an opportunity some days after at the Temple, whither he went every day to find her. For as the Princess was upon her knees very devoutly at Prayers, her Book fell out of her hands, which, Stilicon, that was not above five or six paces off, perceiving, ran with so much diligence to take it up, that no person about her could prevent him in doing her that little peice of service. Serenus durst not refuse the Book at Stilicon's hands, but she blush'd when she receiv'd it; and after she had return'd him a cold thanks for his civility, with a countenance that denoted vexation and a constraint of kindness, she turn'd her eyes away from Stilicon, and fix'd them upon her Book. That behaviour of hers had almost daunted Stilicon, but necessity constrain'd him to make use of his courage; and therefore standing behind the Princess, he laid his head to her ear, and speaking to her with a guilty utterance; "Do you believe, Madam, said he, that that Divinity which we adore, and to which you pray, approves the cruelty which you exercise toward a miserable person, whom you condemn without hearing, and execute the sentence of his death before you let him know his crime. Serenus's colour chang'd upon Stilicon's words, though she alone understood them; yet believing she could not put him off without speaking to him, not so much as turning her face toward him, "I am less cruel, said she, than you ingrateful and perfidious; but since you are no less presumptuous to persecute me, I shall perhaps find out a way to defend my self. "Ah, Madam, said she desperate Stilicon, I protest unto you in this sacred place, that I will for ever deliver you from that trouble; and that after I have sworn to you upon these Altars, that I was never ingrateful or perfidious, I will betake my self where I will never molest you more as long as I live. "You will do me a kindness, (replied the Princess very smartly) and it is the only favour that I can now expect at your hands. Stilicon saw well that he could not urge her any farther at that time, and therefore retiring without making any other replies he went out of the Temple with a countenance wherein you might read all the characters of despair,

Hardly was he got forth without discerning whether his passion guided his steps, when he met Ruffinus, who came from the Emperour, where he had done a very ill office to Arbogastus. Some days before one of the most considerable commands in the Army became vacant upon the death of him that enjoyed it; and Arbogastus having begg'd it of the Emperour for a person that he had a kindness for; but the Emperour, who was not wont to deny him requests of the greatest consequence, refused it him, as a Boon which he had already promised. However, he excused himself, by letting him see his engagement, and that in such language as would have contented another person. But the fierce Arbogastus, who believ'd all things due to his Merit and Services, could not with patience brook that denial: so that after he had testified his discontent before the Emperour himself, in such language that was enough to provoke him; he muttered also in other places, and out of his turbulent and proud humour, he intermix'd such expressions with his complaints that seem'd to resemble threats, sufficient to make him suspected of some traiterous resentment; Ruffinus, to prejudice him, being frankly advertis'd thereof, in the report which he made immediately to the Emperour, added much of his own to the truth of these things whereof he had been inform'd; and not content to tell the Emperour of Arbogastus's muttering; and to aggravate upon it as much as in him lay, he omitted nothing to persuade the Emperour of his evil intentions, and how he practis'd with the Soldiers to stir them up to sedition, and that in all likelyhood he should soon see the effects of a disgust which he could not dissemble: and at length he said so much, and confirm'd his discourse with so many appearances of truth, that if he could not oblige the Emperour to such a distrust of Arbogastus's intentions as he desired to infuse into him, at least he provoked him against the insolency of his behaviour, and so exasperated his mind against him, that Arbogastus coming into his presence that day (having been wanting, contrary to his custom, for two or three before) the Emperour not only look'd fowrly upon him, but spoke to him after another manner than than he was wont, and gave him to understand that he should not be always in a humour to suffer his extravagant behaviour. Ruffinus after he had given the blow was gone out of the way but a few minutes before, and then it was that he met with the afflicted Stilicon. As that despairing Lover only fought for an object at which he might let lie the effects of his fury, at the sight of Ruffinus, he could not look upon him but as one of the authors of his misfortune; so that the first motion of his anger made him lay his hand upon the hilt of his Sword; and it was ten to one but that politick Rival had felt his blows before he had apprehended his words; but in conclusion, with much ado, he moderated his passion; either because he thought it more convenient to expostulate with him before he betook himself to use extremities, or else that his anger demanded a more noble conquest: however, spurring his Horse up to him (for they were both a Horseback, with only some slaves attending them on foot) he stopp'd his way, and looking upon him with eyes that might have terrified a Champion more valiant than himself, "Is it you, said he, Ruffinus, that have ruined me in Serena's favour? And is it from you that I am to demand satisfaction for so great an injury?"

Ruffinus was troubled at Stilicon's words, so that he had much ado to recover himself so well as to give him an answer. But as it was ordinary with him to stoop to rebukes, at this time his wit assisted him as much as he could desire, and as much as was necessary to draw him out of that inconvenience, and looking upon Stilicon with a confidence which it may be lay not then in his courage, "I might possibly, said he, be excus'd for not giving you an answer to what you desire of me, especially considering the manner in which you demand it. Nor do I want courage to give satisfaction to such persons as you are, when I shall do them any injury; but besides what I owe to the commands of the Emperour, of which you are not ignorant, I have more reason to joyn with you in your resentment, rather than give you satisfaction; and though I lose not hopes in the service of Serena, equal to yours, yet I am depriv'd of those which I might have justly conceiv'd, and I lose them them through the happiness of a Rival that triumphs over us both, rather by his good fortune, than out of any merit. In short, Stilicon, besides what the report of the Court daily informs you, your eyes themselves may perceive what favours Arbogastus now receives from Serena, whom before she so apparently disdain'd; and you will apprehend, it may be, in a few days that he is the only person, and no other that has done you this prejudice with Serena."

At another time this discourse of Ruffinus had made but little impression upon Stilicon to whom he was egregiously suspected. But besides that he had but too well observ'd Arbogastus's double diligence near Serena, he had also perceiv'd that the Princess look'd upon him very graciously, and that she shewed him more countenance now than before his disgrace; and that it was moreover true, that to spite him she did in his presence more civilly treat that Rival of his, than in other places, and most apparently so well and civilly, that thereby he might easily flatter himself with hopes of good success. Through that remembrance of these things which he himself had seen, and which had pierc'd him to the quick, the afflicted Stilicon receiv'd but too easily the impression that Ruffinus endeavoured to make, and out of the knowledge of his own innocency, he suffered himself to be perswaded to believe, that that change in Serena proceeded from her favourable opinion of Arbogastus, rather than from any distaste she had taken against him; but at the same time calling to mind that he was accused of perfidiousness, and that they had shewn her Letters to convince her, he began to think that the happiness of his Rival had not created his misfortune, and that there must of necessity have been some contrivance of cunning to subvert him, and with these thoughts beginning his discourse: "That which you say, said he to Ruffinus, might carry some face of truth, did I not know Serena to be no fickle person, and that Arbogastus has not merit sufficient so suddenly to produce the effects which you would make me believe: and which is more, Serena accuses me of infidelity, and she has Letters by her that give her some ground for that accusation, which in my opinion she would not receive from any person, but either from you or Arbogastus. "It may possibly be, replied Ruffinus, that she received them from one of us; but you well know that it was not from Ruffinus; for if you will but ask Arbogastus, I dare say he will not disown the truth. "I hope then, replied Stilicon, that I shall know it from him; and as I expect that he should tell me more plainly than you, I suppose it is rather from him than from you that I must require satisfaction."

In concluding these last words, which Ruffinus would not seem to take notice of, he parted with him without any complement, and rode towards the Palace to find out Arbogastus; when, as fortune would have it, he saw him coming forth of the Palace-yard, in a condition much like himself, with a countenance wherco appeared no less the signs of anger than in his own. He had just parted from the Emperour, who as I told you before had but roughly rebuked him, and as he could accuse none but Stilicon or Ruffinus of that disgrace, he went on full of disgust and with a desire to make it soon appear. Stilicon very fiercely accosted him, but before he could open his lips to speak to him, Arbogastus prevented him with a behaviour no less furious. Is it you, said he, or is it Ruffinus, that has been doing me ill Offices with the Emperour. It may be both Ruffinus and I too, replied Stilicon, but whoever 't be, advise you to seek your satisfaction from me and not from Ruffinus: for besides that 'it will be more for your honour, I will spare you the pains to begin, if you will but 'say that it was you and not Ruffinus, that have done me so much injury with Screax. You need not doubt, said Arbogastus, but that it was I who wrought you all that mischief, and you ought to accuse me, for I fear you not like Ruffinus, of all that Ruffinus had not the courage to undertake. I confess, replied Stilicon, I should less fear a man of courage than you, for I only endeavour the ruine of my Enemies, by ways that are honourable, but you to mischief yours, make use of treason and impajure. But (said he, beholding him with a menacing look) we are too near the Palace to determine our differences, and therefore we should have more liberty, if thou hadst the courage to follow that person whom thou fearest so little.

As Arbogastus was naturally full of fury, and of less consideration than Stilicon, he had laid his hand upon his Sword and had drawn it, when he had heard those last words: But judging afterwards, as well as his Enemy, that it was more convenient to go farther off from the Court, he spurred on his Horse without giving him any answer, and Stilicon also following at the same rate, they left their slaves at a distance, and after they had passed through some streets they came to the Hippodrome: where finding a convenient place, and having defied each other with a loud cry, they ran one at the other with a kind of headlong fury: And because they had no Arms on to defend themselves from either the points or edges of their weapons, but fought with more fury than discretion, the Combat was very bloody: so that before those persons that ran from Court after them could come to part them, they had given one another four great wounds, which cost them a great quantity of blood, so that it was only their own febleness, that hardly permitted them to sit their Horses, that compelled them to give over. They were both carried off and put to bed: And their wounds being feared the Chirurgeons found them so dangerous, that they could hardly tell what to think of their lives.

The report of a Combat of that importance, fought before so many witnessers, was immediately spread abroad, so that the Emperour hearing the news, fell into a very great passion against them, who had so ill observed the commands which he had laid upon them: and for some time he continued in his resentment of an injury done to his Authority: but when he understood that those two persons, against whom he was provoked through the little respect they had given to his commands, were both in danger of their lives: or to say better, that he was like to lose, by reason of their wounds, the two persons of the Empire, whom he best esteemed and loved, and who had done him the greatest services, his Anger could not oppose it self against that consideration. So that when Ruffinus, who by that time was come into his presence, began to lay before him the greatness of the injury that he had received, to aggravate the contempt which they had put upon his authority, with all the arguments most prevalent to provoke him; Forbear Ruffinus, said he, *to incense me against two persons, that are not perhaps in a condition to give you any farther cause of jealousy: I am troubled as much as you that they did not obey my commands, but I am more perplexed for the pain which they endure, than for the offence which they have committed. For the danger that threatens the lives of two such persons as Stilicon and Arbogastus, is sufficient enough to make me forget greater wrongs than they have done me.*

At those words Ruffinus was so abashed, that he could not make any answer: And indeed the Emperour bestirring himself, upon that unfortunate accident, with a fatherly goodness and care, not only employed all his officers for the cure of the wounded, but he made it his own business, with all the earnestness that he could have testified, either for Arcadius or himself. He forgot at the same instant all the distaste, which for some days before he had taken against Arbogastus at the instigation of Ruffinus: and believing that the resentment of the disgrace which he had put upon him that day, had in part produced this sad effect, he repented the words which he had said, and testified to all that heard him that he was sorry for what he had done. For Stilicon, as he loved him more tenderly, in regard he understood that Arbogastus had first provoked him in words, and had first laid his hand upon his sword, he grieved beyond consolation for him, and omitted nothing that might testific to all the Court how much he was concern'd for his preservation. As for Serena, she being very prudent, and having a great command of her self, it was not ealie to judge what were her thoughts of an accident in which she had so great a share. For though she were provok'd against Stilicon as much as it was possible for one to be, and had nothing of a real disgust against Arbogastus, they who were most intimately acquainted with her thoughts, which she kept to her self, observ'd that she was less concern'd for the life of him that was innocent, than of the person that was the offender, and that all her anger would not permit her without sorrow to behold the danger to which Stilicon was expos'd.

The first day there were none that were admitted to come near the persons that lay wounded, except the Officers that attended them. The second day, wherein they could nevertheless make no certain judgment, the Emperour took the pains after they were dress'd to go and visit them, but for fear of giving them occasion to speak, and by the sight of his presence of increasing their Fever, he went not near the Bed, but contented himself only with recommending them to the care of those that look'd after them, with such a zeal as denoted the affection and esteem he had for them. Some days pass'd before any judgment could be given of the event. But at length the Chirurgeons were of opinion, that by the assistance of Heaven, the vertue of their Medicines, and the vigour of their youth, they might recover, provided they were not wanting to themselves, and that the dittemper of their Minds did not increase the dittemper of their Bodies.

They had that opinion more particularly of Stilicon, in whom they did not find the same willingness to preserve his own life, as in Arbogastus, nor the same readines to take their remedies; for indeed after he was recovered from that extremity of weakness which the loss of so much blood had caused, and that the remembrance of his misfortune was return'd to his mind, he look'd with disdain upon that life which they labour'd to preserve, and would hardly suffer them to dress his wounds: he sigh'd often, and shed tears in abundance, accompanied with many sad moans and complaints; and when his Fever caused a kind of Delirium, the image of his misfortune having then the command of his Soul, which reason had forsaken, made him talk those things which easily discovered that his mind was in a worse condition than his Body. They who attended him advertised the Emperour thereof, who sent several times in a day to know how he did, and who hop'd that through the power he had over him he should perswade him not to be wanting to himself to hinder the operation of the Medicines that were applyed for his recovery. And therefore so soon as the Emperour understood that he might see him without any prejudice to his health, he went: and Stilicon being advertised of the care which he had taken of him, and of the testimonies that he had given of his tender affection toward him, carried such an acknowledgment thereof in his mind, that it made him receive his visit like a person more oblig'd to him for that than for all his former favours; and when the Emperour sitting by his Bed-side had taken him by one of his hands, with a behaviour that manifested how much he was concern'd for him, the passionate Stilicon laying his lips to the Emperour's hand that held his, and bedewing it with tears which he could not refrain: It is you, Sir, said he, it is you that do Stilicon the honour to come and see him; but it is not Stilicon, guilty as he is, who presents himself before you; yet it was Arbogastus that assaulted me, and I hope you have been informed of the truth. Yes, Stilicon, I understand it, said the Emperour, but it is the condition wherein I now see you, and not your disobedience to my commands that now offends me; for I was more covetous of your life, than jealous of my authority. Ah, Sir, (replied Stilicon, kissing his hand a second time) why was it not the will of Heaven, that all the blood of which you are so sparing, had been sacrific'd to the service of your Majesty, before I had incurr'd the hazard of displeasing you? And why did it not permit me to let you see that all the despair that reigns in my heart was not able to make me fail of my Duty? And what is that despair, replied the Emperour, of which you tell me, what misfortune can have caus'd it? For what indeed can befall you that can create despair in a Soul like yours? No other, Sir, said Stilicon; but the unhappines to have displeas'd you.

He stopp'd at these words, troubled to have spoken so much; and that he was thereby become engag'd, to inform the Emperour that which he thought to have concealed from him; but his behaviour too well discovered what his language intended; for his last words were accompanied with many sighs, fetch'd from the bottom of his heart, and at length with a deluge of tears that he could not stop. The Emperour was touch'd to the very heart; and tenderly grasping Stilicon's hand, No, Stilicon, said he, you must not think so to deceive me; for besides that which you tell me of a despair that cannot be attributed to the reason which you give me, both what the persons that attend you have informed me of, and the signs which I have for some time since observed in your looks, of a grief that you would con- ceal from me, have already given me so much disturbance as to deserve that you should have some kind of respect to it, and that you should not dissemble with a friend, who may complain of your dissimulation, if you continue to practise it any longer. It must of necessity be that your evil must be very extraordinary, if all our pains and travel can afford you no relief; for you may perhaps have already understood, that I have so great a kindness for you, to employ for your good all that lies within my power. Ah, Sir, replied Stilicon, if there yet remain in your Breast that goodness for me, of which you have given me so many proofs, make not use of that power at this time, but permit me to conceal till I die that which it behoves me never to discover, and that which perhaps I cannot reveal without rendering my self more miserable. No, Stilicon, replied the Emperour, I will not give you leave to conceal any thing from me; for I know very well that no information that you can give me can increase your misfortune.

Stilicon continued a long time without making any answer to those last words, otherwise than by the language of his sighs that frequently issued from his Breast; but the Emperour pressing him a second time with such words wherein he only found authority, commanding with an excess of affection. But, Sir, said he at length, if I commit a fault that will not permit me to call my self innocent; if I cannot let you understand my misfortune without wounding the respect which I owe you, by betraying my own rashness, or letting you see how it may be I may have abus'd more than I ought to have done that goodness of yours that gave me pardon, shall I not render my self perhaps unworthy of that which now you promise me. And instead of that assistance which you assure me of, shall I not merit all the punishment that I am able to suffer, and all that is due to my audacious misfortune? But, (said he a little while after, struggling with certain sobs that interrupted his speech) what condition can I fall into more deplorable than that to which I am now reduc'd? So that if I can obey my Sovereign without displeasing him, what prejudice can I fear in my fortune, at a time that death is more acceptable to me than ever life was? In short, Sir, since you command me by vertue of that authority which I cannot resist, it behoves me to confess that it is the Princess Serena, not the Sword of Arbogastus that hastens me to my Grave, through your Majesties forbearance that sav'd my boldness, but would not punish me; once she gave me leave to live, and to live enjoying the honour to serve her; but as it was a happiness which I never could merit, she has repented that ever she advanced me, and in doing me justice she has condemn'd me to death. I shall never complain of a condemnation which may be so just for the presumption that I had to cast my eyes upon our Princess. But, Sir, my Enemies have added another crime to that, and by their cunning contrivances have render'd me guilty, and will not let me know what my crime is. This is the only favour I have desired, and the only kindness that I request while I live. And this, Sir, is all that I can desire from the assistance which you do me the honour to promise me.

After these words and some others, when the Emperour had confirm'd the promise he had made him of his assistance, he inform'd him all that he knew of his disgrace, and related to him all that had happened to himself in reference to the Princess, but in such passionate expressions, and with so many sighs and tears, that the Emperour, who entirely lov'd him, and infinitely esteem'd him, was sensibly mov'd with his grief; and after he had patiently listen'd to him, interrupting the course of his words, when he thought he had said enough, as believing a tedious discourse might be prejudicial to his health; I am glad, said he, that your misfortune is not so great as you made me fear it was, and I am troubled that you did not let me understand it before it had produc'd such effects as these, as well to grieve as to displease me, I make no question but your Rivals have done you an ill office; and among persons that make an exact profession of virtue, foul play is more to be pardon'd upon such occasions than many other contexts. However, I believe I shall make your peace with Serena, and since you desire to clear the innocency to her, I promise you to give you the opportunity, and that she shall hear you with kindness, after that assurance which I shall give her of your innocency, but this shall be only upon condition that you admit nothing to disturb your mind that may delay the cure of your body, and that you spare the resentment of your Rivals injustice till you know the truth. By these words the compassionate Emperour recovered Stilicon into a far better condition than that wherein he found him, and out of the assurance of his goodness, the power which he had over Serena, and the confidence of his own innocence, he was in good hopes to be as happy as he was before, having now no other fear but that he had displeas'd Serena by his contellation to the Emperour, for which he was in the same hopes, that by the same power, and the same intercession he might obtain pardon.

If this hope made Stilicon submit to whatever they did in relation to his cure, and as it promoted his recovery, the just Emperour was not wanting to give him that assistance which he promised. We could never learn what discourse he had with the Princess upon that subject; but by using his endeavours sincerely with her, by reason of the authority he had over her, and for that the sorrow which she had for Stilicon's wounds had awak'd her anger, he perswaded her easily to hear a justification, and to give her the opportunity he not only went himself; but took the Empress and Serenus along with him to accompany him in that visit. Stilicon, whose health began to be in a better condition, with many signs of balsfulness complemented the honour which the Empress did him; but when, after he had testified his acknowledgment to her in most submissive language, he saw Serenus behind her, his words died in his mouth, his colour chang'd, and he look'd like a man forlorn and stupified: the Emperour and the Empress most obligingly testified how glad they were to see him mend. But the Emperour being willing to do more for him, took the Empress by the hand, telling her that he would shew her what excellent Pictures Stilicon had in his Closet, and commanded Serenus in the interim to stay with him till their return. Serenus blush'd to hear the Emperour's charge, though 'tis very probable she might be willing to obey it, and Stilicon, who understood the Emperour's kindness, which he had desired beyond his life, remain'd for a while in a condition which suffer'd him not to make use of it; for seeing himself alone with that person who had so severely forbid him never to see her more, his fear was at least equal to his joy, and scarcely left him courage and strength enough to employ an opportunity so favourable for his justification. However, he strove with himself to shake off that which hinder'd his intentions, and sought to make him lose so fair an occasion; and after he had beheld the Princess for some time without speaking a word, at length with a guilty countenance opening his trembling lips, with an utterance that sufficiently denoted his fear, "I beg your pardon, Madam, said he, not for a crime which I never committed, and of which I cannot repent till I have knowledge of it, but for what I have been forc'd to do in the extremity of my life, in confessing my misfortune to the Emperour; you have perhaps understood from him how he engag'd me to it by all his authority, an authority so much the more powerful over me, as being accompanied with all those marks of his affection: yes, Madam, the Emperour commanded me to speak, and though I should have as often disobey'd him as he laid those commands upon me, I thought my self oblig'd not to rebel against him at such a time when I lay in despair of my life, and that I ought not to die without endeavouring what lay in my power to let you know my innocence. And to that end he may have also possibly inform'd you, that of all that assistance which he did me the honour to promise me, I never request'd any other effect thereof than that I might understand what my offence was towards you. No, Madam, neither from the Emperour's goodness, nor your favour, did I desire, nor do I desire but only to know that: and if it be true that I am guilty, I shall condemn my self to punishments more severe than those which you would ordain me. Do not then refuse, Madam, to the Emperour's intercession, who without doubt has perform'd his promise as I have reason to hope, and as I find by this effect so unexpected, that which you have denied to the unfortunate Stilicon; and be pleas'd to believe, that if after I have understood my crime, you shall then conclude me to be ingrateful and perfidious, as you have branded me to my reproach, or that if it be the happiness that insolently triumphs over my misfortune, which hinders the effect of my justification when I shall know from what offence I am to vindicate my self, I will not only discharge my self of that vow which you have commanded me to make, but I shall most willingly sacrifice to your just revenge the remainder of that miserable life which the weapons of my happy Rival have left me.

In this manner Stilicon express'd himself with a behaviour wherein the Princess might easily observe all the signs of a true passion: so that she was a little perplex'd to find out a conformity between that which appeared of Stilicon's love, and the proofs which she believ'd she had of his infidelity. The diversity of thoughts which arose in her mind upon this subject, oblig'd her to look upon him, during his discourse, with an observing eye, and with some marks of admiration. So that when he had done speaking, preparing her self to answer with a forc'd countenance, "True it is, Stilicon, said she, that you have given me some cause to complain, by discovering to the Emperour what has pass'd between us, and that it was not necessary to give him the knowledge of what should have been conceal'd from all the world: but I confess I have deserv'd it by my own fault, seeing that I had not been expos'd to that discontent that I may find thereby, had I with more moderation receiv'd the information of that infidelity of which I may have accus'd you. It had been perhaps enough to have let you understand without being so outrageous, that I had discovered your intentions, for had I been less apprehensive of that knowledge, you had had less reason to believe that you were not a person indifferent in my esteem. It is true, Stilicon, that I was in an error, and by that resentment which I imprudently

" imprudently made known, I let you see something more favourable in your behalf, than " all that you could have discern'd in my more obliging behaviour. But if I committed that " fault, do not you commit another no less unpardonable, in reducing me to a necessity " of unfolding to you, that which I have already let you too apparently perceive. And " would you be more satisfied, when rather to obey the Emperour than to convince you, I " must be forced to confess, that I am not to be a cover for your real passion, since another
 " possesses your heart, while in outward appearance you address your ambitious services
 " the Niece of Theodosius. However I have still so much respect for you, that upon no oc" casion that may seem to oblige me, I shall ever discover the truth to the Emperour: For
 " had I done so, Stilicon, it may be you would not have found him so favourable as now you
 " prove him, at least if he should not concern himself in the offence, so much as either side
 " might expect, he would however stand neuter between us. " But, said Stilicon inter- " rupting her through the violence of his passion) why do you spare a criminal by delaying to " convict him of a crime, the knowledge whereof would shame him to death? who is that
 " who possesses my heart, while the Princess Serena serves only for the cloak of my real " passion? Which is that among mortal beauties, that can make a counterfeit of the fairest " person of the world, and the niece of Theodosius? " I did not think, said Serena very fierce-
 " ly, that you could have been ignorant of that, having shewn you the Letters that you had " written to her, and which you have confessed to be your own hand: besides that it would " be a vain thing to inform you, that which your heart and your conscience sufficiently con" vince you of. But since you desire it and the Emperour has commanded me, I will let " you see that which you little regarded when I shewed it, and no question but having had " so much time since, you are now prepared against that trouble, which was not so favour" able to you at the first sight, as a thing that does not usually accompany innocency.

After she had spoken these words, she presented him the Letters which she had brought with her on purpose, as knowing before that she was to come to hear his justification.
Stilicon desiring leave to peruse them in her presence, had no sooner cast his eyes upon the first, but without reading it he opened another, of which when he had seen the first words and the subscription, he did the same with all the rest, without troubling himself to read them, and putting them up as they were before, and looking upon the Princess with a countenance, full of all the signs of joy and tranquillity, that had not appear'd in his face for some days before; " Thanks be to Heaven, Madam, said he, that my misfortune is no sadder, " than it appears to me this day: and that the cunning of my adversaries who intended my
 " ruine, will now serve to make me more happy, by giving me to understand as you have " done me the honour to tell me, that I am not a person indifferent in your thoughts. But " if it were lawful for me to accuse you, of any cruelty upon this occasion, I might complain " of the miseries which you have so long made me endure, and which without all question,
 " had been at an end as soon as they began, had you had so much kindness, as then to have
 " let me know what I this day understand. " How Stilicon, said Serena, will you deny
 " to have wrote these letters to Irene? " No Madam, said he, that is none of my intention:
 " For since Irene, for whom I had a respect, is willing to make that known which I always " kept private; I must confess that I did write to her those Letters, and many others which " they have not shewn you, as not perhaps for their purpose, and that I wrote according to " my real intentions, for I had a love for her: But Madam, Irene is at Constantinople, and
 " though for giving those letters to my Enemies to do me a prejudice, I ought very much " to suspect her; she knows that there are persons in the Court, who are not ignorant of e" very particular that passed between us. And I submit to all the punishments, that a per" son truly guilty can deserve, if she dares affirm that for these six years last past, there has " been any correspondence between us. True it is, that some time before Theodosius came " to the Empire, I saw her, I found her amiable, and did really love her. Nevertheless be" cause the Emperour had manifested to me, an intention which he had to marry me to Isi-
 " dora, the daughter of Maximinus; I concealed the love I had for Irene, for fear of dis-
 " pleasing him. But because Flavian then courted her to espouse her, and that I was un" willing to hinder a match which her Father desired, she took it so ill that she gave her con" sent to him, and broke off with me, and in a short time after she married Flavian, and " went with him to Rome. You know very well, Madam, that she was there a long time, " before I had devoted my life to your service; nor will you ever find, that since that time
 " I ever wrote to her, no not after the death of her Husband, which gave me opportunity
 " enough had I minded it: nor did I ever see her since but in publick, either during my " stay at Rome with the Emperour, or since her return to Constantinople. This is a truth
 " which she will not presume to deny, besides that, Leon, Justinus, her woman Sabina, " who

“ who were the confidents of our affection, and present when we broke off, as being done
 “ at their house, can inform you of all that ever pass'd between us. Rufinus himself had “ some knowledge thereof, whom I consulted then, as not being in a condition for me to “ look upon him at that time either as my Rival or competitor: since that time he him“ self has kept an intimate correspondence with Irene, for since she came to the Court, he “ was employed to treat with her about certain affairs of concernment, wherein she her self “ desired rather to make use of him than of me, which makes me really assured that it was “ Rufinus that got these letters from her, and who has contrived the whole treachery.
 “ only that Arbogastus, more gallant than he, would needs take it upon himself. Ira, said Serena, (interrupting a second time) how do you explain that letter, which makes mention of a Tournament, wherein you were to be the Champion of Irene in private, though another was to give you the honour of it: and where you speak of an imprese that carried a dubious meaning, which I cannot but take for that Syren which you bare at the last tilting, and which has no less a relation, to the sound of Irene's name than of mine. Ah! Madam, cried Stilicon, in the very explanation of the words I perceive the comment of Rufinus, and there is nothing more palpable but that that very day wherein he gave you them, he contrived this piece of treachery. I confess his interpretation is very ingenious, and that though my misfortune in not having dated my letters, as it is not usual to date such kind of Epistles, it might have perplexed me more than all the rest, by means of that unlucky explanation of my dubious imprese, were it not easy to illustrate the truth as well in this particular as in the rest, and to make it appear to you by a thousand witnesses, that this happened at a Tournament that was held presently after the Death of Prince Arcadius, when it was the Emperor's pleasure that I should enter the Lists, as the Champion of Hidora. And though I loved Irene better than Widora, I not only wrote her that letter, but I enter'd into the Lists with a great Y for my Cypher, the letter with which as well the name of Irene, as of Hidora begins, and upon my shield I bare a Heart, pierced through with a dart with this Motto,

MORE FOR LOVE, THAN OUT OF OBEDIENCE.

Whereby Hidora might believe that it was my inclination, as well as the command of the Emperour which engaged me to her service: and Widora might judge that the love which I had for her, was more prevalent than the commands of the Emperor. But Madam it is not enough for me to justify myself by the words of my own mouth: For since you have the goodness to know the truth of my innocency, though it be no difficult thing to apprehend it by reason, by my actions and by all outward probabilities, you may be pleas'd to inform your self further, from the mouths of Irene her self, of Leo, Justin and Sabinus, who are all alive at Court, and know all the particulars of that Amour, that neither made a very great noise, nor was of any long continuance. Rufinus himself, though in my opinion he has divided this scandal against those persons as well as my self, will not have the impudence to contest the truth, or to disown what at that time he understood from my own mouth: Be pleas'd Madam to let me entreat the Emperor, that they may all appear face to face: and though he be ignorant to this day of the offence that I committed, in preferring my own inclination to the obedience which I owed to him, I hope his goodness will pardon me, and will not refuse to assist me with his power, to illustrate a truth on which my life depends. “ No, (said Serena with a mild and cheerful look, and different from what it had been ever since his “ misfortune) there is no need to engage the authority of the Emperor, or the testimony “ of so many witnesses in your justification, for I am satisfied of the truth thereof, as well
 “ by the discourse as by your behaviour, without seeking after any farther proof to make a “ great noise in the world. The error wherewith cunning and subtilty has lead me, has proved “ very hurtful to my repose and it may be to my honour: and I should be sorry beyond mea“ sure for it, did I not believe that you will forget it, and that I shall be able to make satis“ faction. In the mean time be assur'd, that your Enemies have not no advantage by their “ imposture, and therefore if you will but seek to recover your self, as speedily as I desire “ and earnestly request you to do, you shall have me the last Person to observe that it has but “ augmented my contempt of my self, and my disdain of Arbogastus.

Stilicon heard those words with such a transportation of joy, that he was like to have done himself a mischief, for his health not being in a condition well to support it, he was upon the point of swooning. Serena perceived it by the several changes in his countenance, so that she began to be afraid, and to take care to call for help, when Stilicon struggling to overcome that weakness, which the excess of his joy had caus'd, on a sudden laid his hands upon one of Serena's that he saw next him, and laying his lips thereto with a transportation of mind, that he could by no means master, he better and more plainly interpreted his

Meaning by his gesture, than those few minutes would have permitted him to have done in words. Serena, who probably at another time would not have so patiently endured such a rudeness, though that she might easily bear with it now, and that she owed that reparation to the mischief she had done him, and to the blood which she had caused him to lose. However, she took away her hand in a short time, when the transported Lover beheld her with eyes that spake to her at once both of his love and innocency, and yet hardly finding words to express his thoughts in the disorder of his mind, Now it is, Madam, said he, that I am more confirm'd than ever, that it is my Duty to die for you; and as I was about to lose my life through the excess of my grief, now I feel that my joy threatens it with the same danger; however, I will do what lies in me, that I may enjoy the favours with which you bless me, and I have hopes, if you permit me to live, that I shall live both to adore and serve you.

He had said more, but that the Emperour, who by this time believ'd he had given him leisure enough to explain himself, return'd into the Chamber with the Empress: Serena retired from the place where she was sitting, to give her way. And the Emperour knew well by her looks, and by Stilicon's countenance, that they beter understood one another than they had done before. However, being resolv'd to be farther inform'd, laying his head to Stilicon's, he ask'd him in his ear whether he had made peace with Serena, "Yes," "Sir," reply'd Stilicon in an extasie, and I should be the most ingrateful and treacherous person in the world, if any thing could be more dear to me than the opportunities of sacrificing to your service, that life which this day is mine through your only goodness. The Emperour testified his satisfaction, and after he had desired him not to seek any revenge upon two persons that would be sufficiently punish'd by their own shame, he went his way together with the Empress and Serena, who at her departure by a favourable glance gave him hopes of being now more happy than ever he was before.

The same day, the Emperour having heard the particulars of all that had pass'd from Serena's lips, and being confirm'd in what Stilicon had had said for himself, by the proofs which he understood thereof, rightly apprehended that all the whole contrivance proceeded from the management of Ruffinus, though he had intigated Arbogastus to act; and he attributed all the kindness which he had observ'd him to shew Irene, to be but the plot he had to make use of her in this design. As the Emperour was full of virtue and true plain dealing, the whole contrivance displeas'd him; and though Ruffinus for his wit, and his compliance with the Emperour in those things which he most affect'd, was in great credit with him, yet he no sooner saw him but he gave him a very sharp reproof, telling him plainly, that such cunning tricks of knavery were not only displeasing to him, but unworthy a person that pretended to any reputation, or made any profession of virtue; that by his abominable subtilties he had like to have lost two men of great merit, and great service, and that if he persevered in those kind of practices, he should not continue that kindness which he had for him. Ruffinus was very much astonish'd at the Emperour's discourse, though he had all the reason in the world to expect it; however he heard it with all the patience and submission imaginable. So that when he saw himself convinc'd of the truth, and found that the Emperour, instead of suffering himself to be deceiv'd by his endeavours to lay all the blame upon Arbogastus, revil'd the lowness of his spirit, for joyning interests with him against Stilicon, at that very time when he endeavour'd to throw him out of his favour by his own sly reports and tales, easily mastering the shame of what he had done by his prompt impudence, and affecting more courage than indeed he had, I must confess, Sir, said he, that I have committed a fault, but it was through that presumption that made me so bold as to think I might deserve the Princess's favour, and if that fault might be pardon'd me, though my Rivals, to whom your Majesty, by your goodness and your favours, has made me equal, committed the same offence, I may have some reason to hope that the same goodness will pardon all other faults which that error led me into; in regard that policy and deceit, though not allowable in other things, are not so criminal in love proceedings. I must confess, said the Emperour, they are more pardonable in love, than in all other acts of enmity and hostility, and for that reason I shall more easily forget them. But seeing they are altogether fruitless, and to no purpose in love affairs, and that you to so little effect made use thereof in that love which you had for Serena, 'tis my pleasure that you think no more of her; for in short, Serena is not for you; not but that I will advance you as high as he that shall espouse her, and uphold you up in a condition, if you continue faithful wherein you shall have no cause to envy the Husband of Serena. But because her inclinations are no way favourable to your thoughts, and for that you always knew that I never would put a force upon them, besides many other reasons, that had I any such intention, would not permit me, therefore it is my pleasure that you think no more upon Serena.

Upon these words of the Emperour, Ruffinus stood like one bewitch'd: and though for a person of his humour there was consolation enough to be found in the Emperour's promises; nevertheless, whether it were through his ambition, which made him look upon the quality of being the Emperour's Nephew, to be a dignity beyond all others, or through that love which Serena might infuse into a heart more ambitious than his, he could not submit without feeling a mortal grief for the severe Law which the Emperour imposed upon him. However, his answer, with a great deal of submission, was, that he would obey him as he ought, and though it were impossible to remove Serena's love from his heart, so long as he lived, he would sooner die than fail of his Duty and Obedience.

In the mean while Stilicon had receiv'd such considerable help from the change of his condition with Serena; and the Princess her self, to make amends for the injury that she had done him, confirm'd the affection that she had for him with such obliging proofs, and so different from those which she had been accustomed to give him, that in a few days such a progress was made in his cure, as surpass'd their expectations. And to shorten my story, in a few days after he was perfectly healed, and found himself in a condition to quit his Chamber, and go abroad. Arbogastus grew well much about the same time, though he was infinitely vex'd and disturb'd at the news which Ruffinus told him of Stilicon's happiness, and the ill success of all their Stratagems.

The Emperour had visited him several times as well as Stilicon; and though there were a great difference in the friendship he had for both, yet it was not apparent in the value which he put upon them, so that he believing himself to be in as good a condition as ever with the Emperour, and vanquishing by the greatness of his courage whatever might seem terrible to another, he shew'd himself at Court with more boldness than ever, and with greater hopes to attain the enjoyment of Serena. She entertain'd him by the Emperour's order with the same civility as formerly, nor did she ever speak to him of the fraud he had practis'd; but she treated him so indifferently, that thereby he easily perceiv'd the bad effect which it had produc'd; for at the same time, and in his presence she carried her self toward Stilicon in so obliging a manner, but still within the bounds of a severe reserv'dness, so that he found that his juggling had but made his condition worse, and that Serena's carriage towards him proceeded only from the directions of the Emperour, by whose command Stilicon and he were once more reconciled in his presence; and after that he enjoy'd them no more to venture upon those extremities one against another, and that with so much earnestness, and that in such language, that there was little likelihood that whoever by disobeying his commands should run the hazard of incurring his displeasure, and of drawing upon him his disgrace, would find him so easie to be appeas'd: but though Arbogastus had for some time a respect to that consideration, which kept him from listening to the provocation that incited him to challenge Stilicon, and to venture a Duel with him, it could not however oblige him to have any converse with him, nor so much as to give him a good look; and Stilicon observing his carriage, behav'd himself towards him in the same manner, so that they met every day at the Emperour's and Princess's Apartments without speaking one to another, and in all proposals and all contests that happened at Court they always took the opposite part, by which all the world might judge that they would not long remain in that condition without embroyling themselves more than ever they had done.

As for Ruffinus he did not openly bustle either with the one or other, but privately he watch'd all opportunities to do both a mischief. And his greatest animosity being then against Stilicon as the most happy, and apparently the person for whose sake he was to renounce Serena, and being also, in regard of his love, link'd with Arbogastus in a common interest against him, it appear'd that he was still inclin'd for the Gaul against the Vandal, whom he would by his devices have ruined in the favour of Serena, and against whom without doubt he had not dissembled his malice, but out of respect to the Emperour's commands. But however, he acted with so much caution, that he discover'd his intentions to Arbogastus so closely, that Stilicon could not perceive how he mov'd against him. And for that the Emperour out of his goodness had always conceal'd from Arbogastus, that it was Ruffinus that had done him all the ill offices which Stilicon was charg'd withal, he had therefore some confidence in him, and accepted of his advice, as a person interest'd equally to himself in the ruine of his enemy, and he embrac'd it the more willingly, as not suspecting him upon the score of his love, as knowing that it was the Emperour's will that he should renounce his pretences to Serena. All this while the Princess entertain'd Stilicon with all the kindness which her wisdom and her virtue would allow her to shew: Arbogastus she treated civilly, but indifferently, and with little sign of any inclination for him. And for Ruffinus, who had left off his suit, she looked upon as a person whom she little regarded. But it was time that Arbogastus should follow his destiny, to those bloody tragedies which he has caused, to be acted upon the Theatre of the world, and of which, Madam, by what I have said, and what remains for me to tell you, you understand the true original, not known to the greatest part of the world, though it hath severely felt the effects of its fury.

Arbogastus clearly understood that Serena's inclinations, were remote from any kindness to him, as they were favourable to Stilicon: and therefore seeing there remained but little hope one way, he turned his thoughts another; when the politick Ruffinus, who bent all the force of his wit to disturb Stilicon's happiness, and sought either to make use of Arbogastus to cross it, or to set 'em together by the ears, out of the hopes he had to be quit of them both, laid before him how that since he had laboured so long in vain to bend the heart of Serena, he was not any longer to employ his pains where he should reap no benefit: and therefore since there was nothing to be done that way, if he would follow his advice, he counselled him to make his addresses to the Emperour, who how favourable soever to Stilicon, would rather chose to admit into his alliance, a person descended from a long race of Kings; than a private Knight who was only what he had made him: that though he lov'd Stilicon, and had procured his justification before Serena, he had not however declared or signified by any discourse, that he intended to bestow her upon him; and that if he had had a design to to have depriv'd Arbogastus of all hope as well as Ruffinus, he would as well have forbid him to think any more upon Serena, seeing he could not doubt but that Corrivallship would every day enrage him against Stilicon: and that in leaving him the liberty to court Serena, when he had forbid the same to a person no less in his favour than Stilicon; it seem'd that he himself open'd a way to the means of obtaining her. In brief, he insus'd into him so many things, wherein he found so much probability, that Arbogastus, bold enough of himself, and sufficiently conceited of the merit of his own deeds, and of the nobleness of his extraction, wherein he thought he surpass'd Stilicon by many degrees, easily perswaded himself to follow his advice, resolving without delay to address himself to the Emperour, and to demand his Niece in recompence of his services. It would not be only very difficult but little to the purpose, to repeat to you the language which he used to obtain his desires, but 'tis very probable that he did not forget, to insist upon the advantages of his birth and services. The Emperour was not at all offended at his discourse, for as he had not forbid him to wait upon Serena, he nothing admir'd to hear him make such a request. Therefore gave him this answer, that in respect of his birth and services he well deserved his Niece, for that he did not think him inferiour either in the one or the other, to any person upon whom he could bestow her: But he had promised Serena not to force her inclinations, and that if they were not favourable to him, he could not put any violence upon them for his sake. This language very much astonish'd Arbogastus, who knowing already that Serena had no kindness for him, but that Stilicon possess'd all her affection; took this answer of the Emperour for a denial: so that after he had paused a while to find out words, to express what his resentment insus'd into him; "How Sir, said he, ought not Serena's will to submit to yours? do you not reign, and are not you her Emperour?" I am an Emperour, replied the mild Prince, but I am no Tyrant, and though I were as much concern'd for my self, as you would have me concern my self for you, I would neither force my Niece nor any daughter of the Empire to marry. I suffered you to wait upon her, when I forbid the same privilege to another, because I thought you not unworthy of her; and could you have gained her affections, I should readily have consented to the choice she had made: But if it be so, that she does not freely consent to what you desire of me, I advise you and request you to think upon some other rewards, which you may as easily demand, and which I will easily grant if they be within my power to bestow. All other recompence, replied Arbogastus, is low and contemptible to him that has the courage to aspire to the Princess Serena, and perhaps there is no other recompence, can reward the services of a person equal to my self. I confess, (said the Emperour with a great deal of moderation) that your services are highly to be valued, and that there are few commands in the Empire which you may not aspire to, and you shall find a' so that I will deny you nothing, which my honour or my justice will permit me to grant you: but it beoves you not to think it strange, if I do not that for you which I would not do for my self in the same case. I see Sir, said the audacious Arbogastus, that Serena is ordained for Stilicon and not for Arbogastus, but though by many probabilities I had reason to believe it, I had thought Sir, that having been as prodigal of my blood and my life, to serve you as well and as often as ever Stilicon; and that being descended from an extraction less disproportionable to yours, than that of a Vandal Knight, you might have done justice to the birth and services of both the one and the other, by honouring a Prince with your alliance, and recompencing a Knight with such dignities as I should not have enjoy'd him.

Those words displeas'd Theodosius, who as all the world knows was as apt to be provok'd, as easie to be appeas'd: however moderating his passion through the knowledge which he had of his humour; I did not believe (said he to Arbogastus very coldly) that I had till now needed your instruction, for the distribution of my rewards: nor do I yet think that I have been so sparing of them as to your self, to give you any reason to complain or to taunt me with your services. But however it were that you deserv'd what I did for you, I am of opinion that I have done for you as much as you deserv'd. And for Stilicon, as I do not make so much difference between you as you pretend, as I am satisfied in his services and am convinc'd of the nobleness of his Extraction; I cannot think I have done any injury to my own, in permitting him to serve my Niece. And if he have been more fortunate than you to gain her affection, I think I may do for him what I would have done for you upon the same occasion, without your having any reason to murmur at it. No Sir, said Arbogastus, I shall not murmur at it, for murmuring is beneath a spirit like mine: But it may be I shall not endure it with patience, for while I live and wear a sword by my side, Stilicon perhaps may not be so sure of his happiness. You forget the respect you owe me. (said the Emperour, calling an angry look upon him) but had I not some regard to the passion that makes you thus fly out, I would perhaps make you an example to those, that suffer themselves to be transported with presumption and arrogance: and so get you to your own home and stir not thence without my order, till you hear what course I shall take. Sir, replied Arbogastus, give me leave to tell you that I was not born among your subjects, and though the Roman Emperours brought the Gauls and Germans to submit to their yoke, yet my Country was never subject to it, nor endured their dominions; and you know well that it is from their Franchise or freedom, that they retain the name of Franks as well as that which our Ancesters gave it: be so kind then as to let me go to receive commands in another place from my Sovereign, and such a Sovereign that will be the more favourable to me, as being of his own extraction. Be gone then Arbogastus, said the Emperour; and rid a quiet and peaceable Court, of one that will eternally trouble its repose. But quit Constantinople in three days, for I give you no longer time to stay.

As he was a person ill beloved, and whose turbulent, insolent and fiery spirit every body hated, there was not one that offer'd himself to make his peace with the Emperour, nor did he signify any inclination to desire it, but on the contrary he meditated in his mind a thousand mischievous designs, the mildest of which was to carry away Serena by force, or to kill Stilicon and Ruffinus: (for by that time he had found out the tricks which the latter had put upon him, and the ill offices which he had done him, at a time that he pretended the greatest friendship to him:) but finding that he could bring none of them to perfection, seeing that the Emperour knowing the impetuous fury of his spirit, would not let either Stilicon nor Ruffinus stir, but where he went himself or else very well guarded, he committed his revenge to other contrivances which he had in his head, and departed out of Constantinople with a numerous and magnificent Train, such as a person truly noble, and who had held the most honourable commands in the Army, and had received all the most bountiful favours, that a most grateful and most liberal Emperour could bestow upon him, could have to attend him. Two days after his departure, an Officer of the Emperour's Guards, presented him a Letter which an unknown person, and one whom he could not lay hold on, had thrown in the street as he rode along: wherein after the Emperour had open'd it he found these lines.

Arbogastus to the Emperour Theodosius.

Since I have received no less injury from the ingratitude of a Prince, than the fortune of his subjects, I scorn to take my revenge upon his subjects, to let a Prince understand that he did not know me, when he thought he could scotfree provoke me. He shall find that it is no more in Stilicon or in Ruffinus, that I seek the object of my just resentment, that is no more the love of Serena that busies my thoughts, but 'tis at the Emperour and the Empire that I aim; and as low and miserable as he thinks me, I will arm such a force against him as shall shake the Empire, and make the Emperour tremble.

The insolency of that Letter, enflam'd the best part of the Court with anger, others contemned it, nor could the Emperour chuse but smile at it: and without doubt they had despis'd it more, had they foreseen the effect of that menace, which they saw happen in a short time after. The Emperour declar'd to all the Court how he had dealt by Arbogastus, not being willing that they should suspect that he had given any just ground of discontent to a person whom he had at other times thought worthy of his esteem; a person who had great skill in war, and who had done him most considerable Services, but such as had been liberally and magnificently rewarded. So that at last as he had for some time before dislik'd his violent, seditious and incompatible spirit, he shew'd himself glad for his departure; and all the Court, whether from his example, or for other reasons, did the same. In short, the Court appear'd as if it had put on a more calm and serene countenance after he was gone, all consultations and all affairs being managed more peaceably. But if the separation of the two Favourites caus'd by Ruffinus's envy against Stilicon, and Stilicon's disgust against the wiles of Ruffinus, occasion'd at any time any disturbance in Council, it was pacified by the prudence of the Emperour; so that no blood was shed, nor no extremities ventured upon, to which the violence of Arbogastus often transported them. Ruffinus forbore to visit Serena in her Apartment, for which he was made amends by the favours of the Emperour, who contrary to the custom and humour of many other Princes, never took off his love from those whom he once thought worthy his affection, but in his heart he burn'd with jealousy against Stilicon, while Stilicon happy in the Emperour's favour, and the affection of the Princess, not being molested by Arbogastus, nor openly by Ruffinus, liv'd a life the most comfortable in the world; and out of the reliance which he had upon the Emperour's goodness, who had openly declared himself in favour of his pretensions to Serena, he doubted not but in a short time to complete his felicity, when all his hopes were dash'd, and all resolutions overturn'd or delayed by the cruel effects of the threats and disgust of Arbogastus which begun to break out, when it was least thought upon, and that into such a rage that made all the world feel it. It would not be necessary, Madam, for me to repeat the story, as well for that it is so well known to all the world, and because there are so few particulars of importance which either you or this illustrious Society can be ignorant of: but since it behoves me for the compleating my rehearsal to make some mention thereof, I shall only run it over so succinctly that I may not tire you with prolixity.

The Eighth Part.

BOOK I.

Arbogastus made haste to the Port where he intended to take shipping, and the farther he travelled from the Magnificent City of Constantinople, the more he felt his love and jealousy to wear away. But if those two passions lost their vigour in his Soul, as their fury slacken'd, the fierce Gaul reforc'd the violence of his implacable malice. He was mightily pleas'd in having propos'd the Emperour for the only object of his revenge, and his proud humour that chiefly delighted in such enterprises as promised him the loudest fame, causing him to look upon Stilicon and Ruffinus as Subjects too mean for the exercise of his courage, he scorn'd to take them for the mark of his mutinous thoughts, or to aim at any thing less than the death of the Great Theodosius, and the overthrow of his Empire. For the accomplishment of a design so extraordinary, he resolv'd in his mind various bold and violent resolutions. And having examined them severally with all the consideration that his natural rashness would give him leave, at length he pitch'd upon that which he thought most conformable to the Grandeur of the Enterprize. In order thereunto he determin'd to go among the Gauls, where, by vertue of his Birth, he had great power, where in all likelihood he had hopes, that since they were a warlike Nation that lov'd liberty, they would be easily incited to take up Arms for the recovery of their freedom, and to shake off a yoke that they so impatiently endured.

After a long Voyage he arriv'd at the famous Port of Marseilles, and finding the Province of the Romans full of armed Soldiers, he understood that Valentinian with a powerful Army was march'd into the Country of the Gauls, to fix himself in the Center of his Empire, either to render himself more formidable to the Nations under his Dominions, or to be nearer at hand to defend them from their Enemies. Arbogastus therefore contrives the death of the young Emperour, that he might afterwards employ his Forces against Theodosius; to which purpose he thrusts himself into his Army, is extremely diligent about his person, gains the Soldiers by his liberality and good management; and to make himself more considerable, he levies Soldiers in his own Country, and reinforces the Roman Army. Fearing however that for want of the love of the Pretorian Guards, he should not be able of himself to bring to pass those strange revolutions which he intended, he casts his eyes upon Eugenius, a person of a good aspect, bold, eloquent, and a lover of change. Nevertheless he does not presently enter into a particular league with him: he sees him seldom, that he might speak well of him without being suspected; and praising all his actions from the highest to the meanest, he appears so generous, that the Romans esteem him the more. Eugenius acknowledges his kindness, and desires his friendship, which after Arbogastus had accepted, he does him all manner of good offices upon all occasions, discourages to him a good part of his secret, the better to inveigle him into a confidence of his fidelity. They mutually bequeath their Friends one to another; and their Faction growing powerful, they soon after begin to talk openly of the cowardise and simplicity of the Emperour. In the mean while they deal underhand, to have the most important charges of the Household bestowed upon their own creatures, and by presents and promises gain'd to their party the Officers already preferr'd.

But, Madam, since it grows late, I know you are not desirous that I should relate every particular of a dismal attempt, the news whereof has already spread it self through all the world. It will suffice to let you know that the Emperour was strangled at Vianz upon the Rhine, and that the Officers of his Chamber Committed that Parricide by the orders of Arbogastus. That Barbarian having satiated his eyes with so horrid a spectacle, gave it out himself, that Valentinian, struck with a panick terrour, had slain himself. That that Prince who was so fainthearted at another time, as to flee to Constantinople upon the bare report that Maximus was marching against him at the head of an Army, was not so much master of his grief as to hear a little bad news which they reported to him, and that he had kill'd himself for fear of being expos'd to misfortunes, the danger whereof he only fancied to himself: presently, Romans, he cry'd, the Heavens declare, that they do not in such an extraordinary manner deliver you from Valentinian, but only to shew you, that they themselves take care of your honour, and that they were weary to see the noblest Nation the world to groan under the Sovereignty of a Prince unworthy to give them Laws. Think not however, that in depriving you of an Emperour, they intend to expose you to any disorder that may breed confusion in your Government. They present you a renowned personage to fill the Throne of the Cæsars, they present you Eugenius, the famous, the belov'd Eugenius: he was born for you, he will be your companion, rather than your master. Through his wit, his courage and experience you shall enjoy under a fortunate Reign, whatever happiness your predecessors tasted under Augustus, Trajan or Constantine.

The Soldiers assemble in great numbers, and as they were all gain'd before, they by their acclamations applaud the proposal of Arbogastus. The bold Gaul loses no time, he takes Eugenius, he seats him upon his Target, commands him to be lifted up, and having shewed him to the Romans, caus'd him to be proclaimed Emperour. Though his Soul was capable of an unlimited ambition, and that his boiling humour hinder'd him oftentimes from acting with circumspection, at such a time as this he would not suffer it to dazle him, out of prudence, not being willing to hazard the usurpation of the Sovereign power; he set before his eyes all the obstacles that could oppose him in so great and ticklish an undertaking; he considered that he was not of the same Religion as the Romans, nor had he for a long time been known in their Armies, to hope for their consent and submission. So he gave way to another to undergo the danger, not doubting but to govern the Empire, while Eugenius carried the Title of Emperour. A lofty Title, that only serves to draw envy upon those, that not being able to obtain it by election, lay violent hands upon the Sovereignty. The event of his design was very prosperous, for he got the good will of Eugenius, either by reason of the service which he had done him, so important and fresh in memory, or through the prevailing power that he had over his affection. And though revenge were the mark and goal to which all his actions tended, yet seemingly he pretended to make no other use of the Forces and Treasure of the Empire, which were all at his disposal, but for the establishment and honour of the Empire. But foreseeing that the generous Theodosius would soon take Arms in revenge of Valentinian, and to the destruction of Eugenius, he distributed new Largesses among the Soldiers, and after he had made a general Muster, and strengthen'd the Army with an addition of Auxiliary Troops. As soon as he found himself strong enough, not only to settle Eugenius at Rome, but also to assail the Eastern Empire it self, he took the command of the Army, and after he had given all necessary orders, he march'd directly toward the Alpes.

The great Theodosius with no small sorrow receiv'd the dreadful news of this revolution; and because he hated injustice naturally, and had ever loved Valentinian, for those reasons which you have already heard: he rendez vouz'd his Forces together with all the speed he could, giving out Commissions for new Levies: Stilicon and Ruffinus encouraged him to this enterprize, and whether it were that they design'd to supplant one another at the Council-Board, or in Severna's favour, whom they desperately loved, or whether they were incens'd against their Rival, they redoubled their pains and care, and contributed large sums toward an Expedition of so much consequence. The Emperour, who well knew the nimbleness of Arbogastus, would not stay for so numerous an Army as he might have had, but fearing lest the fierce Gaul should enter into his Provinces, to make them the Seat of the

the War, and move his Subjects to sedition, he took the Field with an Army in number inferior to his Enemies. He gave Stilicon the leading of the Vanguard, composed of three thousand Romans, two thousand Vandals, as many Alains, and ten thousand Goths: and keeping Ruffinus near his person, he followed Stilicon with the Body of his Army, consisting of about sixty thousand fighting men. The eyes of the whole world were fix'd upon this war, attending the success with terrour, while all good men put up their Prayers to Heaven for the great Theodosius, with little hopes of seeing him a Conquerour. While the two Empires with grief beheld from the top of the Alpes all their Forces ready to give battel, and to destroy one another, Eugenius and Arbogastus having possessed themselves of the most advantageous Posts, Ruffinus sends one of his Confidants laden with Gold and Jewels into the Enemies Camp; and Stilicon sent his Squire, called Barbarius, upon the same errand. Theodosius adjoyned Piety to his Courage, he lifts his eyes to Heaven, and looking upon that as the fountain of all success, he begs relief and succour from the God whom we adore and whom we often call the God of Battel.

This Battel which was fought between the two Emperours was so far famous, that all the earth having heard the event and circumstances thereof, it will not be necessary, Madam, to give you a farther description. I shall only say thus much, that neither Eugenius nor Arbogastus wanted either courage or discretion; that their Soldiers were well disciplin'd, and in number so far exceeded those of Theodosius, that there was little likelihood that he could have sustain'd the weight of such a war, much less have obtain'd the victory. All the famous and brave Actions of Stilicon that so signaliz'd him in the first onset, could not preserve the Vanguard which he led, for that was defeated, and ten thousand Goths cut in peices, and Theodosius himself found himself surrounded in the midst of four and twenty thousand men. In this extremity that great personage lost neither his courage, nor his judgment; but resolving to die with his Arms in his hand, or to open his way with the point of his Sword, he encouraged his men to follow him, and valiantly to believe themselves. In the interim Arbatius one of the principal Commanders of Eugenius's Army revolts to Theodosius, followed by the Confident of Ruffinus, and those Soldiers whom he commanded, and immediately after in came Barbarius with a reinforcement of twelve thousand Vandals, and four thousand Spaniards. At their arrival the Easterlings took heart; but being yet inferior in number to Arbogastus's Forces, neither the industry nor valour of Stilicon could have secur'd an entire defeat, if Theodosius, having rallied a great part of the Army, had not come to the assistance of his Favourites with a greater power than theirs, thundering in upon his enemies with a valour beyond wonder, which rendred him equal to the virtue of the ancient Cæsars; Stilicon also seconded him vigorously; nor was Ruffinus wanting to perform such deeds as were worthy to be registred in the book of fame. On the other side the furious Arbogastus forgot nothing to accomplish his revenge, enlivened by the presence of his illustrious Adversary, that gave a new heat to his anger, running from place to place to encourage his Soldiers by his words, and by his actions. He sought also every where to find out Theodosius; and because that valiant Prince did not forbear to thrust himself into the midst of his Enemies with such an undaunted resolution that I am not able to express, they did not fail to meet, to know one another, and to come to handy blows. Arbogastus puff'd up with the honour which his good fortune had given him, endeavours to overcome the greatest man living, and the illustrious Theodosius, fired with a just indignation, prepares to punish the rash Gaul, when their Troops coming to engage, caused them to separate, and carried them another way. They fought on both sides so obstinately, that their losses were little different: so that the Forces of Theodosius being inferior to those of the Gaul, Virtue had yielded the victory to number, had not the pious Emperour, casting up his eyes to Heaven, invoc'd the assistance of that Supreme Power that disposes as it pleases of the fortune of Empires. All the earth understands it with joy, and posterity will read it with admiration, that at that time there arose a most dreadful Tempest, that bore off the Enemies Darts, and gave new vigour to the Easterlings. The Army of Theodosius encouraged by such an extraordinary succour, and as it were sustain'd by an invincible Arm, redoubled the fury of the Combat with so much vigour, that at length the valiant Theodosius became entirely victorious: he takes Eugenius, cut in peices all his men; and the desperate Arbogastus being wounded by Stilicon, and seeing the entire defeat of his Army, sav'd himself by flight; but carrying along with him his punishment in his heart, and not knowing where to find a Sanctuary after such an attempt, and such a misfortune, he cut his Throat with his own Dgager, and punish'd himself for his own crimes. By the Emperour's command Eugenius lost his head. After that they gave thanks for a victory of so great importance: so that now the troubles of both Empires being absolutely appeas'd, all the potentates of the world sent Embassadors to Theodosius, according to their several interests. In the mean while that great personage, thought of nothing more than to establish his successors and to dye in peace: he retires to the pious and learned Ambrosius, a person of immortal reputation, and sends for his Son Honorius and the charming Serena his Niece: he bestows her upon Stilicon, as the most precious reward to which he could pretend, leaving that famous Vandal Tutor to his Son, whom he declares Emperour of the West, and sends back Ruffinus to Constantinople, to take the same charge of Arcadius who was to possess the western Empire. And thus Madam I am to finish a relation, that has taken up too much time, since you know that Theodosius dyed full of honour, and that Stilicon and Ruffinus, afterwards abusing their Authority, and the young years of their Masters, would have aspir'd to the Empire, but were punished for their Attempts, with the loss of their lives.

Martian had no sooner made an end of speaking, but the fair Queen of the Cimbrians return'd him thanks, with that most charming grace with which she was wont to gain all hearts: but as they were about to retire, they were surpris'd to see the King of the Suevians enter, whose new troubles gave him not a moment of repose. He saluted the most divine Rosamond, and the pensive Queen of the Turingiens: and not being able to conceal the marks of his disquiet, he told them with a kind of surly melancholly, that it was already day, and that such extraordinary sitting up would prejudice their health. He began to look sowlily also upon his lovely daughter, and was visibly about to have given her some severe language, at what time three or four of the Officers of the Queen of the Cimbrians Army, entred in a very great consternation, not minding that respect which they ought to have had in the presence of so many illustrious personages. The most considerable among them drew near to Balamir, and applying himself to him with a very earnest behaviour; "Sir, said he, yonder is a certain unknown Knight, followed by about five hundred men, who has defeated above a thousand Cimbrians in our Quarter, and defends himself at this present against a greater number, with a most admirable valour.

Balamir durst not take upon him to speake before Rosamond, but presented the Officer to the fair Queen, who while he was giving a more exact accompt to his Sovereign, the King of Suevia look'd upon him with a sparkling eye: For as the two opposite passions, that equally reigned in the heart of that violent Prince, filled him no less with the formidable Image of Pharamond, than with the fair Idea of Polixena, he presently bethought himself that such a Champion, could be no other than the invincible King of the Franks. This belief augmented his disdain, and looking upon the astonishment of the Cimbrian, to add new honour to that great Prince whom he mortally detested, he resolv'd to hasten to the revenge of his dear Son, believing that while he made use of part of the Army, he might oppress that valour by multitude, which would have drawn veneration from a person not prepossessed with hatred. Balamir, whose thoughts were quite different, as in whom his love for the Cimbrian Queen, was found intermix'd with all other laudable passions; conceiv'd a more generous esteem for the valiant Knight, and instead of desiring his death, he was willing to labour for his preservation: to which purpose he opposed the King of Suevia's design, as soon as he had knowledge thereof. He prayed him therefore to give him leave, that he might go and encounter that unknown Knight, he laid before him that such an occasion rather required some young man, than the presence of a great King: and that he in short desired it before another, as having the honour to command the Army of the Cimbrian Queen. The Princess Albisinda, whose natural sweetness rendred her an Enemy to violence, easily consented to Balamir's resolution: but though she durst not approve it before the King her Father, she had the satisfaction to see all that illustrious society of the same opinion. The two Queens who were not obliged to the same respect, undertook to speak: and being afraid of Pharamond's life, whose merit had made a strong impression in their souls, they were not wanting to joyn their entreaties and reasons with Balamir's. The rest of the company, unless it were the King of the Burgundians, were of the same mind with the two Queens, that the Prince of the Huns was to hasten to revenge the Cimbrians, and averr'd to the King of Suevia, that that strange Prince whom they talk'd of, could not be Pharamond. They told him that the generous King of the Franks, was no such person to follow the Example which he had set him to break the treaty, or at least that he would not be so imprudent to break it, with such an inconsiderable force. The King of Suevia provok'd, that he could neither give them an answer, nor moderate his choler, flying furiously out of the chamber; and Balamir also leaving the company, got to horse, and being followed by such Troops as he could hastily get thither, he flew to the place where the fight was maintained.

The day beginning to appear, gave them opportunity to discern what was done, so that

Balamir

Balamir no sooner observ'd the odds of the parties, and the valour of the Stranger; but that he chafed at the Cimbrians, and found the esteem which he had conceiv'd for his valiant adversary, to increase. He perceived nothing but what was brave in his countenance, and in his manner of fighting: he saw that he wounded, that he killed, and struck fire with his terrible sword, upon the bucklers of those that oppos'd him: and that carrying a terror wherever he bestowed his furious blows, he made the event of the skirmish doubtful; when the Cimbrians redoubling their strength, in the presence of the Prince that commanded them, pressed to kill the unknown Knight, laying their blows thick and threecfold upon him. But the undaunted Champion defended himself with a matchless force, and an extraordinary judgment: so that the generous Balamir, having encreased his good opinion of him, was resolv'd to hinder him from being oppress'd by the multitude. Hold Cimbrians, hold, cryed he, and if ye will not deserve the name of Barbarians, as ye are called in most countries, forbear cowardly to overwhelm with number, a valour which ye ought to reverence. These words had great authority among the Cimbrians, and they had hardly produced the effect which he expected, when that obliging Prince addressling himself to the Stranger; Invincible Knight, said he, pardon our Soldiers, if they had no respect to a virtue that did them so much damage. Tell us if you can, what it is you seek for in these parts.

The stranger testified his astonishment by the silence which he kept, at a time that he was obliged to return an answer, to the civilities of the Prince, and Balamir as accustom'd as he was to the sight of extraordinary personages, could not behold the Stranger without being struck with I cannot tell what to say of grand and heroick, which he had observ'd in few among many illustrious Warriours. While he was seriously considering him; the Stranger brake silence: and in answer to the most obliging language of Balamir; Most generous Champion, (said he, moderating the anger that had incens'd him) can you think that I am your Enemy, without believing at the same time, that I am the most ungrateful among men. What judgment can you make of my heart, if you can doubt of its acknowledgment. It hath been moved as it ought to be with your carriage, which together with that which I have admir'd in your person, has entirely gained it. I am strangely covetous to put my self into your Army, and to try my fortune there, provided that the great Constance, to whom I am infinitely oblig'd, and whom I seek for every where, be not engaged in that of the King of the Franks. But as there is little likelihood, that he fights against the Allies of Honorius, or that he sides with Pharamond the most formidable Enemy of the Empire, I hope that without being wanting in my duty, I may offer you a life to which you have purchased a glorious right, by defending it in such a manner. You defended your self with so much valour, replied the Prince, *that I laboured less for the preservation of your life, than to preserve my souldiers. Nevertheless I may not be altogether unserviceable to yours if you think good: and therefore since I see you bleed through your Arms, whereby I find you are wounded, we will if you please make hast to our Camp. There you shall find all the assistance you stand in need of, and after you have rested your self as much as you think requisite, you may depart for Francfort where you may find the illustrious Constance. If then the value which you have, for Constance that famous Roman, will permit you to take part with the fair Queen of the Cimbrians, you may joyn your self with many great Kings, and valiant Princes who have embrac'd her quarrel, and we shall be glad beyond measure, to have purchas'd so great an assistance, with the loss only of a thousand men.*

Concluding these words, without expecting an answer which could not but have been very civil, he began to take care for the relief of the unknown Knight, and finding in his looks the effect of his weariness, and the loss of a good quantity of blood, he caused him to be disarm'd, and such remedies to be applyed to his wounds, as were most ready at hand. He order'd a fresh Horse to be brought him, and causing a Soldier to get up behind him to sustain him in his Saddle, he gave all requisite commands for dressing the wounded, and burying the dead. The stranger had lost two hundred men, few of those that were left escaping without wounds, but the Cimbrians lost many more by far. The Prince who commanded them, had no sooner executed all those things which his charge oblig'd him to take care of, but he had a desire to know the name and quality of the unknown person: and therefore riding up to one of the Officers of his party, Will you do me the kindness, (said he very civilly) to tell me whence you come, and the name of that valiant Knight under whom you march? "Sir, (said the stranger very submissively) we are Britains, Natives of Gallia Armorica, lying upon the pleasant Banks of the Loire, and our illustrious Captain is called Viridonix: I neither know the name of his Country, nor what is his true quality; all that I can tell you, is, that he speaks our language, which is peculiar and difficult, which makes me think that he was certainly born a Subject of Aldroec, King of little Britain. As for the endowments of his person, I dare assure you, that how eminent so-

“ ever he appears for that valour which you have already observ’d, you will discover in “ him sundry other virtues more worthy of your esteem. But, Sir, (said he, shewing him
 “ a Britain more advanc’d in years) behold there an Officer, whose name is Dinocus, con“ siderable both for his birth and merit, who can tell you more. He it was that lead us to “ follow the valiant Viridonix, and he is the only person among the Britains that can inform “ you of all the particulars which you desire to know. Since he confides in so few persons,
 “ (said the discreet Prince of the Huns) I shall not make any farther enquiry: for though the great qualities of Viridonix made me a little curious, the knowledge of his design, and the consideration of his virtue prohibit me from being desirous of that wherein I cannot satisfy myself without displeasing a Knight of so much merit.

He had no sooner spoke those words, but he return’d to Viridonix, and that illustrious Stranger receiving him with a double measure of civility, and a redoubled joy, I am infinitely pleas’d, Sir said he, to understand that it is to the great Balamir that I owe for the succour which I have receiv’d. But as I have the satisfaction, of not being oblig’d to any but an illustrious Prince, I hope you will not repent of the good offices which you have done me, when you shall better know me. I will tell you who I am, and will disclose to you the very thoughts of my heart, when I shall have a convenient opportunity: and if you find that my Birth and Dignity prove not altogether unworthy the care of the Prince of the Huns. you will it may be see that I have not so mean a name among men, but that fame has publish’d among you some report of my Actions.

They continued their discourse as they rode along; and Balamir being willing to appoint the Stranger a convenient Lodging, conducted him to the Quarter of the Princes, which was the strongest part of that formidable Fortification, which they had rais’d against the King of the Franks. They cross’d the Camp, view’d the Soldiers in Arms, and following the Bank of the Rhine, they at length arriv’d at that Village which the residence of so many Kings had made famous through all Europe, which was commanded by an old Castle, so much the more glorious, and more famous, because it enclosed those transcendent and fatal Beauties, whose fame the whole world was not able to contain. In that Camp, in that Village, and in that Castle, every one extoll’d the valour of the Stranger, every one admir’d his noble aspect, inasmuch as the seditious Prince of the Huns had much ado to get him to his Chamber, such was the multitude that press’d to see him, and speak to him. As soon as they were retir’d to put off their Arms, all the rest of those great personages sought to take some repose, but alas, if they took any, it was soon again interrupted: for though the calm that follows an alarm, and the pleasing freshness of the morning sweetly lulls us to rest, every one did not find repose in that numerous Army. Therefore though the Soldiers, whose Bodies were tired, and their minds undisturb’d, slept without any trouble, their illustrious Commanders feel the torments of cruel disturbances, their Souls being continually turmoil’d by their passions.

The fierce Varanez, and the generous Martian, who were design’d for Franckfort to see the great Constance, made haste to be up, and having receiv’d their necessary Passports which Pharamond had caused to be given them in the most ample and most obliging form that might be, they took their way toward the River Rhine, attended by those Envoys which the two Queens and the greatest part of the Princes had sent to visit the famous Roman. Though these two great personages were far less unhappy than many of their Friends whom they had left behind, yet they did not permit themselves to believe the rest altogether miserable; for Martian himself, who was naturally moderate, and had the honour to be esteem’d by Pulcheria, yet many times felt the rigour of absence. He measured the greatness of his misfortune by the infinite merit of the person belov’d; so that without an extraordinary melancholy he could not see himself so far distant from a Princess whom he admir’d, and of whom he was by no means hated. While the admirable Pulcheria, who was the wonder of all the earth, takes up Martian’s thoughts, Prince Varanez believes himself as unfortunate among Lovers, as he saw himself great among men. He could not endure that the Queen of the Cimbrians should ponder upon the choice which she had to make; for every time that he consider’d the rare qualities which he too well knew adorn’d his own person, and that from that consideration he pass’d to that of the fair and puissant Monarchy of which he was to wield the Scepter, he felt a redoubled vexation which his fierceness rendred insupportable: How, said he to himself, shall I find Competitors in the Barbarians Countries? What shall Princes that but now begin to make known their Names and their Dominions dare to dispute with me the enjoyment of Rosamond? And will not Rosamond her self whom I so passionately love at first sight, prefer me above all my Rivals? Will she be so unjust as not to separate out of the croud of her Lovers, a Prince that is one day to sit upon the Throne of Cyrus, and who in all likelihood will as worthily become it? While

While he thus afflicts himself, and Martian muses upon his incomparable Pulcheria, both being on their way to Francfort, Let us stay a while upon the Banks of the Rhine, not to depart from the Scene which the famous writer of this work has prescrib'd to us that continue it. Love seem'd there to have settled the Seat of his Empire; for among all those illustrious persons that there were assembled, there was not one who was not enthrall'd under the fatal Laws of that puissant Divinity. A thousand Breasts breath'd forth sighs, a thousand hearts carried in them the cruel arrows with which they were pierc'd. And Albifinda, how sweet soever were her disposition, was her self the cause that more than one Lover complain'd. The young King of the Baltheres, though he were neither despis'd, nor ill treated by that amiable Princess, felt however no small vexation when he thought upon his two Rivals, Marcomire and Gondemar. And if Gondemar remember'd with delight those happy hours which he had spent in the presence of Albifinda, what think ye was his anguish when he saw Eriolea prefer'd before Theodora? From this afflicting thought he pass'd to other reflections more sorrowful: he could not call to mind without being sensibly tormented, that he had assaulted the Brother of Albifinda, that he had nourish'd suspicious injuries to that amiable Princess, that he had drawn upon the person whom he ador'd the anger of a violent Father, and that he had been the occasion of Viridomar's imprisonment. But if the Lovers of the Princess of Suevia could not be happy, how much more unfortunate were those Princes that sigh'd for the most divine Queen of the Cimbrians? Araxie for his virtue was truly esteem'd of Rosamond; but he had the unhappiness to see that she could not endure the evidences of his love. Godegesile, by reason of his inconvenient and ill to be endured haughtiness, and the insupportable rudeness of his disposition, had drawn upon himself the utter dislike of the fair Queen. And for the King of the Burgundians, she hated him, both because he had made war upon her, and because he then made war upon Pharamond; nor can I tell whether he was not as much hated by Rosamond for being ingrateful to the King of the Franks, as for that he had been an enemy of the Cimbrian King. So that if the charming Queen had consulted no other but her own heart, and that she had not labour'd to disguise her own thoughts to her self, out of a scrupulous niceness that was the adversary of her repose, the hatred which she had against Gondioch had soon let him see that she had a quite contrary passion for the most illustrious of her Lovers. Balamir, who was little inferior to that renowned Suitor, was however not the less esteem'd by that divine Queen, and he had that advantage over Pharamond, that Rosamond shew'd him the marks of her good will without constraint, while the severe Laws of correspondency too cruelly engag'd her to assault the life of the King of the Franks. Nevertheless that satisfaction of the Prince was intermingled with a world of disquiet; for it was a most sensible affliction to him that Balamir had but one heart to give the Queen of the Cimbrians, and that he was in a condition together with that heart to offer her a Crown additional to that of the Bohemians. This affliction was followed by another, for the generous Hun reverenc'd in such a manner the virtues of Pharamond, that he could hardly sometimes wish himself happy, lest he should render the illustrious King of the Franks unfortunate: to corroborate that thought he call'd Hunnimonda to mind, he perswaded himself that he ought to be faithful to her, and that he was oblig'd to love a fair and unfortunate Princess whom he had once ador'd: But, said he presently, did not Mundific espouse Hunnimonda? Is not Hunnimonda dead? Ah, cruel Brother! (cry'd he immediately after) Ah, cruel Death! Wherefore did you deprive me of the only person that could render me happy? But pursuing his complaint, Wherefore, said he, should I repent of loving the most amiable creature in the world? Is Balamir so much a coward to fear his Rivals? Is he so unjust to deny a heart to Rosamond, whose right it is to command all other hearts? And is it not an honour for Balamir to wear the fetters of a Queen who numbers among her Slaves the greatest Princes of the Universe? This was the language of his sighs, with little hopes of cure, or to see his passion satisfied: nor could his virtue hide the persecutions of love, at such a time when that formidable Divinity exercised his tyranny over a whole Sex of mankind obedient to his power.

Albifinda, the lovely Albifinda, was not only afflicted for the imprisonment of her dear Brother, but wasted many tedious hours in sorrow, when she thought that the King her Father would never consent to make Marcomire happy: but while she thinks upon Eriolea, and by that thought labours to allay her grief, the Queen of the Cimbrians, whose passions were more vigorous, is yet more unhappy. She is haunted by a number of Suitors that are odious to her, whose importunity however she is forc'd to endure, though they have nothing in their persons that renders them more worthy to be belov'd than Pharamond. Their defects were but a foil to set off the virtues of the King of the Franks, and those virtues which they severally possess, do but augment the Glory of a Prince who possess'd them altogether. Rosalind, who is neither blind, nor insensible, saw but too well all those rare qualities of Pharamond, she is but too deeply touch'd therewith; and so passing from the consideration of so many merits, to the remembrance of a thousand noble proofs of a violent and respectful love: "Alas! she cry'd, it is but too true that Pharamond loves us, and "we know, too well for our repose, that he is the most lovely person in the world: But, "(said she, perceiving some tears to trickle down her cheeks) why is it not permitted us to "have some affection for this Prince? Is it fitting that a cruel destiny should oppose eternally the happiness of two persons that seem to be born one for another, and who by no "offence have merited their misfortune? Must a malignant Star force from a generous Prince's actions contrary to her designs, and compel me to persecute that which I cannot "hate? Feeble heart! irresolute heart, (she cry'd, redoubling her sighs) it behoves us at "length to act without constraint; we must either hate Pharamond according to our Duty, "or love him according to our inclinations: Sovereign Arbiters of my resolution, maintain the resolutions which I take, calm the Tempests that so cruelly shake and disorder "my Soul. And thou Theobaldus, the unfortunate Brother of a more unfortunate Sister, "forbear to incense me to your revenge; consider that I am a woman, and weak, or rather that I am apprehensive and grateful: the Prince that slew you knew you not, and "ventur'd his life at the same time in my behalf, and would have expiated with his own "blood the cruel crime that he had committed contrary to his intention. Ah, Theobald! "you sell me a Crown at a dear rate; your gift is fatal; for it had been better for the repose of Rosalind, that you had left her at liberty to enjoy Pharamond, rather than the "right of reigning over the Cimbrians. But why should we accuse Theobald, who understands things without disguise, and who beholds at this hour without a cloud the lustre of "Pharamond's Virtue? Let us accuse rather the revengeful King of Sucvia, the unjust Gondioch, and the furious Balamir. They are the Authors of my Sufferings, and persecute "the Queen of the Cimbrians more than they persecute the King of the Franks, while the "faint-hearted Rosalind cowardly submits to their violent tyrannies: but alas, this will of "theirs is conformable to the will of my deceased Father, that ought to be an inviolable "law to me, that incites me to the revenge of a Brother slain before my eyes, and at the "same time that it causes me to persecute a Prince that I love, it sustains my honour, and "renders me more worthy the illustrious Prince whom I affect. Am I then driven to that "extremity, (said she, letting fall two Rivulets of tears upon her fair cheeks) am I then "constrained either to renounce my own honour, or the heart of Pharamond.

Upon those last words her sighs interrupted her complaints, and she had hardly ponder'd but a few moments, upon the deplorable condition of her fortune, when not apprehending whence to derive her comfort; she employed all her thoughts upon the King of the Franks, as it were to charm her grief with such a pleasing fancy. Pharamond, (said she sighing) Generous Pharamond, forbear to wage a war in my heart, more cruel than that which they have brought into your dominions. Your services, your obedient respect and the generous offer you made, to sacrifice your life to my displeasure, render me more unfortunate than all the hostile acts of a merciless Enemy could do. Yes, yes, that heart of Rosalind that probably could resist with a constant resolution the rude assaults of fortune, cannot make any resistance against your submissions. You cause such a fatal Combat between my heart which is yours, and my reason which is your Enemy, that my soul is cruelly tormented: For Heavens sake as you are generous, as you love me, restore me that sweet repose that I enjoyed, before I saw those eyes of yours. Cease to love the miserable Rosalind, forget that unfortunate Queen. But do I know what I do, since I do not tremble in wishing for such a terrible Change? would I no longer reign over the most illustrious heart in the world, or could I desire that Pharamond should forget me? Ah no, no, Rosalind, it behoves thee not to deceive thy self. 'Tis better for thee to suffer and to dye, being beloved by Pharamond, than to live without that honour in the tranquility which thou desirest.

While she encourages in her heart, a thought so conformable to her inclinations, and that her fair eyes overflowed with tears out of a despair that she should never be happy, the afflicted Amalazontha finds yet less repose, and so feelingly complains in her Apartment, that it was enough to have mollified the most stony heart. That fair and disconsolate Queen abandons her self entirely to the imperious passion that reigns in her Soul. And if Rosalind found the only cause of her misery in the death of Theobald, besides that the Queen of the Turingiens meets the same occasion in the death of Amalaric, she perceives other grounds to think her self unfortunate. The image of the King of the Franks continually takes up all her imagination, the Pourtraiture of Pharamond is always before her eyes, and that unfortunate Princess labours in vain to expel from her heart that charming object that that causes all her disturbance. She tosses and turns, she sighs, and in short she gives herself wholly up to the vehemency of her grief: presently the tears trickle down her fair cheeks, and her eyes overflowed in such a manner, that the fire which they were wont to dart forth, seem'd to be extinct, leaving to compassion only the power of gaining hearts. Ab Sunnon, said she, what would be thy grief to see those tears? Amalazontha, your charming Amalazontha, who with a dry eye might easily see all the evils that she makes you suffer, weeps for a Prince that no longer has a heart to give her. She weeps for Pharamond, when Pharamond fights for Rofamond; and at the same time when you would purchase with your own blood one of those precious drops which fall from the fair eyes that you adore, your disconsolate Princess pours forth two streams for the King your Brother. Alas! said she very mournfully, am I not sufficiently punished for my past insensibility? Or has not Heaven sufficiently humbled my disdain? If there were need of a Pharamond to render me sensible, if there were need of an accomplish'd Prince, ought that Prince to have slain my Brother, ought he to have given his heart to the fairest Princess in the world? Ah, Pharamond! that the charms of your person should render me miserable! Ah, Rofamond! that your beauty should be cruel to me! And since that beauty, fatal to so many illustrious persons, gives me my death's wound, can I still call you Sister? And for you, Pharamond, can my heart adore you, and yet I wage a war in your Dominions?

At these words the sad Queen sigh'd, and for some time after pondering upon what she had to say, she found so great an impossibility to become the enemy of a Prince that she lov'd; insomuch that resuming her words with some marks of content that she had at length come to a determination in such an affair as that: No, no, she cry'd, no more shall my Soldiers fight against those of the French King. If Amalaric fell, let us bewail him, but we ought not to look upon Pharamond's valour, or his good fortune as a crime. Though the King of the Suevians, though Gondioch, though Briomer become my adversaries, though Rofamond her self ——— But what was I about to say? Do I not see that Rofamond will be satisfied with whatever I do for Pharamond? It is too true that she loves the King of the Franks, and it may be so assur'd of the fidelity of that Prince, that she can suffer me without jealousy to execute my resolution. But alas! pursuing her complaint, unfortunate Princess, said she, canst thou with the same patience brook Pharamond's love to Rofamond? Yes, yes, (said she somewhat more resolutely) I shall behold that love without being jealous, the troubles of my passion shall not smother the inclinations of my virtue: for I will preserve my friendship entire to a Princess, who no otherwise makes me unhappy, but because she is fair, and because Pharamond has seen her. If Beauty be in us the same thing that Valour is in men, why should Rofamond appear to me in a fault, since I cannot take Pharamond for an offender that slew my Brother? Let us not therefore hate the Queen of the Cimbrians for loving the King of the Franks: let us content our selves to send back our Army into Turingia; let us our selves not remove from the Banks of the Rhine, and let us wait til we either die of languishment and anguish; or that by the will of Heaven some change shall befall our unfortunate life.

While the resolution of the Queen of Turingia qualifies her disquiet, the furious King of the Suevians, through the violence of his disposition and his passions, is yet more miserable than those illustrious unfortunate personages whose complaints we have already repeated: so that if to assuage his troubles he represents to himself the fair visage that wounded his heart, he presently falls into a raving despair: "How, said he, must I love the Sister of an irreconcilable Enemy, the Murderer of my dear and unfortunate Viridimir? "Was it not enough for the faint-hearted Viridomar to love her? That the feeble Albifin- " da should give away her heart to Marcomire, but that I must throw away mine upon Po- " lixena? The thought thereof exciting new troubles in his heart, raised certain cloudy and malignant vapours, which overcasting his imagination, and having envelop'd the fair image of Polixena, seem'd to obscure her lustre: "No, no, then he cry'd, I will no longer "love the Sister of my Enemy, nor will I ever suffer the House of Pharamond to triumph "over mine: Viridomar shall break his Fetters ——— But, (replied he, after he had reflected "upon what he was about to say, and that the bright shining Idea of Polixena had dissipated the "clouds of his mind) am I the master of my childrens thoughts, that cannot answer for my "own? Flatter not thy self, unfortunate Prince, thou wilt not easily renounce a passion in- "sinuated into thy heart with so much pleasure: Polixena is the fairest Princess that ever "was; the charmer, and thou hast an inclination to love her to thy last sighs, as thou ought- "est to hate the King her Brother to the last moment of thy life. But must we be eterna- "ly miserable both in regard of our love, and in regard of our hatred? Shall we never be "able to satisfy those two passions, and to find out means to vanquish Pharamond, and en- "joy Polixena? Yes, yes, we shall find them; Pharamond we will ruine by open force, and "then “ then by joyning with Briomer, we will keep Viridomar always in prison, and offering Po-lixens the soveraignty of Suevia and Franconia, we will dazle her eyes with the sight of two Crowns.

Concluding these words he called his people, made himself ready, and went to find out Gondioch: and while those two Kings consult upon the means, to confound that great Prince whom they hated, the two fair Queens, whose thoughts were quite opposite, held a different conversation. Amalazontha went to the Queen of the Cimbrians and found her abed: so soon therefore as she came into the Chamber, she drew near the bed-side, with a look wherein appear'd that little confidence, which her resolution had given her. Rosamond had no sooner beheld her countenance, but that she partook of her comfort, and drawing her fair Arms out of the bed, she threw them about the Queen of the Turingiens, after she had kissed that amiable Princess, with a friendship quite free from all jealousy, and truly sincere, My dear Sister, said she, how joyful am I to see these symptoms of moderation in the midst of your sorrows, and to find by all outward appearances that you have spent this night, more quietly than I have done.

At these words and in the presence of a formidable Rival, the sad Amalazontha sigh'd for the dazzling beauty of Rosamond, perswading her that the heart of Pharamond would never be hers. That forsaken Princess began to feel all her torments to awake with their former violence: For some time she beheld the fatal eyes of the fair Queen of the Cimbrians, without being able to speak. For upon the sight of her charms, there began a cruel combat in her soul between the jealousy that was there fixed, and that little remainder of reason and generosity, that used their last endeavours to destroy it. Amalazontha changed colour, by reason of those contrary motions, whose violence she sustained, and her fair eyes were bedewed with tears, but perceiving Rosamond so much afflicted at it, and that she redoubled her Caresses, the generous Turingien summon'd up all the equity, that she could find in her soul to shew her gratitude. She embraced the fair Queen, and then opening her lips to a sweet dejectedness; Alas! said she, dear Sister, for you are good natur'd, but you do not know that Amalazontha is ingrateful. I will not abuse the testimonies of the good will which you shew me, for I must declare to you that I often make my self unworthy of your kindness, through the injustice of my thoughts, of which I am not always the mistress.

As she was about to continue her speech, the amiable Princess of Suevia entred into the chamber, and hardly had those three illustrious friends finished their usual caresses, when Amalazontha resuming her discourse, made a sincere confession of her passions, and a faithful description of her most private thoughts. Her two associates had pity on her; but the passionate Queen had no sooner declar'd her resolution, to send her forces back into Turingia, but Rosamond appeared like one amaz'd. A certain motion, the nature whereof she could not presently discern, surpris'd her heart: For she could not see without vexation, that obliging proof of affection, which so fair a Rival was about to testify to the King of the Franks. Albisinda studied less upon the matter than Rosamond, for as her inclinations were for peace, she was very well content to see that Army weakned, that desir'd the continuation of the war: presently therefore she confirm'd Amalazontha in her design, wherein she made the less scruple, as believing she had nothing to fear from Pharamond's ill intentions: and that he would never make use of his advantages, but to bring things to an accommodation. While she explained her thoughts to the two fair Queens, and that the Queen of the Cimbrians dressed her self, friendship banishing all ceremony from those illustrious persons; Rosamond was advertis'd that one of Constance's Pages, desired to be admitted into her presence. She had a great value for the famous Roman whom they nam'd to her, so that as soon as she was in a condition to be seen, she order'd Valerius to be brought in.

He no sooner appear'd, but he address'd himself to the three Princesses, like a person that well understood the world: with the same carriage he address'd to the Queen of the Cimbrians, and having made his complements on the behalf of his Master, he told her that Constance would be extremely disturb'd, to see himself engag'd to become her Enemy. But Madam, said he, he is so absolutely perswaded, that your Majesty is altogether an Enemy of violence, that you cannot at all approve of the assaulting the King of the Franks during the treaty: so that he hopes you will no way condemn his proceedings, and that the Queen of the Turingiens, and the Princess of Suevia, to whom I have also the same command to offer my Masters services, will do him the same justice. Not that my Master is absolutely resolv'd to declare himself for the King of the Franks, for he does not pretend to take his part, till he shall be thereto constrained: and as yet I bring the means to settle all things, and to accomplish a final accommodation. Valerius contented himself with only saying these few words, for he durst not speak openly against against the injurious King that had broken the league, both in regard the Princess Albifinda was there, as also out of that respect which he knew, was every where due to the Royal dignity. Rosamond felt a secret gladness from the hopes of making a Peace with Pharamond, either by the mediation of Constance, or else by his joyning a considerable assistance to the Franks: while on the other side Amalazombæ, by the retreat of the Turingians, weakened that Army which refused any accommodation. However she shewed no outward testimonies of satisfaction, so that after she had heard Valerius with all the Majesty befitting a person of her degree, she beheld the Queen of the Turingians with an obliging aspect; thereby giving her to understand, that it was for her to return an answer. Amalazombæ immediately apprehending the civility of the Cimbrian Queen, with a gesture full of the greatest respect she gave her a denial: and having in that manner explained her self, she also signified in words to Rosamond, that she had nothing to offer upon the interests of a league from which she was disengag'd. Whereupon the Queen of the Cimbrians taking the answer upon her self, "We know, (said she to Constance's Esquire) that your illustrious master has no reason to think himself obliged to us, for though there had been no assault made upon Pharamond, yet nothing could hinder the great Constance, from taking which side was most agreeable to his inclinations, without giving any cause of complaint for his proceeding. You may tell him likewise that the choice which he makes, whatever it be, shall never hinder us from having a particular consideration of his virtue, nor from presenting that acknowledgments, that is due to him for the pains he hath taken to reestablish our peace, which yet we cannot attain through the strange misfortunes, that the anger of heaven hath lit upon us.

Amalazombæ and Albifinda returned their particular thanks in few words, but they avoided to deliver their thoughts upon Valerius's commission. The Queen of the Turingians avoiding all occasions in discoursing of a Prince who already too much busied her mind, and the Princess of Suevia not daring to enlarge upon a subject, that would have engaged her either to speak against the King her father, or else to declare her self contrary to reason, Valerius without any more delay departed, and went to the Quarters of the Burgundian King, where he was inform'd he should meet with the King of Suevia. In short he found him there, and being introduced into the Chamber where he was, he presented him a letter from Constance.

The King of Suevia would not take it, before he had demanded leave of Gondioch to receive and read it, and in despite of his natural boldness, not presuming to look upon Valerius, he almost made it manifest that he could have repented, that he had injured the great Constance: and perhaps he felt a secret and inward thame, for having assaulted King Pharamond, after a manner so little conformable to the lovers of honour. Nor can I tell whether his new passion did not make him turn his eyes another way, depriving him of the wonted confidence of his looks, or whether he did not bethink himself, not without some marks of the trouble that exasperated him, that he was desperately enamour'd of the Sister of his Enemy, and his Son's mistress; whom he had not began to love till far advanc'd in years, and at a time that it behov'd him to have no other thoughts, than the revenge of Vindimir. However, the impetuosity of his temper was soon corroborated, by the hatred which he had against Pharamond, which remained in his heart of an older date and better establish'd, than his love for the Princess Polixena, insomuch that his haughty humour immediately refusing its power, that violent King easily forejudging what Constance's thoughts might be, fiercely beheld his Esquire, and opening the Letter which he had received, he there read the following lines.

You have heard that we once commanded the Armies of Honorius, with some reputation, and if after that you have forgot, either the fame or the dignities which we have enjoyed in the world, you ought however to remember that you are a King, and that your word ought to be inviolable. Nevertheless you have failed in that which you gave to me, and in assaulting the King of the Franks, you have broken a Truce which had not been made, but at my intercession, and to which you solemnly accorded. But if you have wounded your own glory, injured Constance, and violated the laws of Nations, repair and make satisfaction for that injustice, by such ways as are in your power: restore peace to so many Nations that ardently desire desire it, grant it to all the Empire that impatiently wait for it, nor deny it to the Lieutenant of Honorius, who still demands it, and requires it from you for your own repose sake. Thereby you will become justified before all the world, you will preserve the Emperour's alliance, and you will reign in peace within your own Dominions; we will come and offer you these advantages in your own Camp, if you are resolv'd to hearken to reasonable propositions. On the other side, if an obstinate resentment carries you still above our reasons, we shall without reluctancy follow our own inclinations; and not looking upon you as an Ally of the Romans we shall embrace the justest side, and take upon us the interests of the King of the Franks. All Germany knows what the valour of that great Prince is; and when to those Forces which he has already, we shall joyn those of the Emperour, commanded by Constance, it may be we shall oppose no despicable power to the attempts of those abused Nations, who to second the violence of your hatred, have blindly arm'd themselves against the life of generous Pharamond.

No sooner had the furious King done reading the Letter, but he tore it in peices, looking upon Valerius with an eye full of provocation, Tell your Master, answered he, that I little regard his menaces, that I renounce his Friendship, nor shall I much endeavour to preserve the Emperour's. Tell him that I never yet heard that Constance sat in the Throne of Honorius, that he should dispose at his pleasure of the Forces of the Empire; or that a Citizen of Rome, in the low ebb of his fortune, should prescribe laws to persons of my degree. Valerius, who was neither amused nor dazled at the sight of Royal Dignity, and he that had seen more than one King humbled before his illustrious Master, undertook to make him an answer with a constancy becoming a true Roman; Sir, said he, there are few Scepters at this time that have been more formidable than the Sword of the Great Constance. And Citizens of Rome, such as he, not subject to any but the Emperour, have privilege to make good their word and faith wherever they give it. What, (said the King of Suevia, impatiently interrupting him) must I behold my Son's Murderer without any disgust; and because Constance loves Pharamond, must I not revenge my Son's death? Valerius not able to suffer a reproach injurious to a King whose virtues he admir'd, and thinking himself bound to justify his Master's proceedings: The great King whom you call Murderer, replied he, overcame the unfortunate Prince of Suevia during open hostility, and in the midst of the hazards of a Battel: and neither Pharamond nor Constance will ever complain, if never any other assaults than those be made upon their lives.

The fierce King perceiving these words to be boldly spoken, had certainly fallen foul upon the Squire of Constance, if Gondioch, as much an enemy of the Romans as he was, had not generously interposed: Valerius seem'd to be nothing mov'd, but having nothing more to say for his renowned Master, he would not by his presence farther provoke a person of that high Dignity, and therefore took his leave; and to discharge himself wholly of his Commission, he went to visit Ardaric, the Prince of the Huns, and the King of the Basternes, not having any more to wait upon in Constance's behalf, having already complemented Varanez and Martian, whom he met upon the Road to Francfort. As he was coming out of the Quarters of the King of the Alains, he saw the people gather together in heaps, that they talk'd with much vehemency and eagerness; and that the complaint of Constance, and the resolution of Amalazontha was no less known to them than the adventure of the valiant Stranger, that had spread it self all over the Town, and through all the Army. Every one related this weighty news according to his fancy; and there were some so confident as to affirm that Honorius and Constance acted by consent, that they would undertake some thing extraordinary, and that the unknown Knight did not go to Francfort but by order of the Emperour, and that Amalazontha was without doubt engag'd in the same interest.

In the mean time that fair Queen sends for the principal Commanders of her Army, and gives them all necessary orders for the execution of her design. On the other side, the King of Suevia and Gondioch repair to Godegesile, and send to the forward Briomer to be there. As it was apparent that they intended to take some violent resolution, Valerius who had already visited the King of the Alains, and of the Basternes went to wait upon Balamir, where he understood that that generous Prince was busie in taking care of the noble Stranger whom he had conducted to his Apartment; he therefore attended in another Chamber, being accompanied with a Squire of Balamir's, till his Master was to be spoken with. But he had not gone many paces when he saw a great company of different Officers, who crouding upon him, appear'd to be very eager to see something that was worthy their curiosity: Constance's Squire having the same longing, the person that attended Balamir opened the way for him, so that he immediately saw that they were certain magnificent Arms that that had drawn all that crowd together, and which he understood were the Stranger's, whose valour had made such a noise in the Camp of the Cimbrians. Though Valerius had led his life either in the Court of Rome, or in the Imperial Armies, he was not a little surpris'd to see the lustre of so many Jewels: he saw them glitter every where as well upon his rich Buckler, as upon his magnificent Helmet; and he no sooner cast his eyes upon the terrible Sword of that unknown Warriour, but he took it up in his hand to take the more notice of it; but he had no sooner well view'd the Hilt, which was remarkable as well for the beauty of the workmanship, as the sparkling of the Diamonds, when with astonishment he cry'd out, "Is it possible, said he, that I should once more behold so glorious an Instrument of Constance's Victories. At these words all the Officers turn'd toward Valerius, and the chiefest among them desiring him to explain his meaning: "The Sword which you see, said he, was design'd only for valiant Owners. Constance, said he, whose fame rings over all the world, when he quartered in the Province of the Romans, gave it to the Renowned Constantine, whose reputation has fill'd the Universe. That illustrious Prince was well worthy of such a present, for ye know that he is one day to reign over both the Britains, that he has enlarg'd the Territories of the Armoricians, that he has gain'd several great Battels, made the best part of Europe tremble, and so shook the Western Empire, that he had without doubt quite overturn'd it, had not Honorius sent the invincible Constance against him, to stop the fury of that fortunate Conquerour. After some Combats, the report whereof has dazled the world, those two great Hero's saw one another, lov'd one another, and mutually interchang'd Swords with a demonstration of so much friendship, that of necessity, that famous Soldier who is yet unknown to you, must be either the dreaded Constantine, or else that great Prince must be dead. Not yet, (said another person that embrac'd him behind) for Dinocus, to whom you once promised some part of your friendship upon the Banks of the Rhine, offers himself to carry you to his Master's Chamber, and to let you see him.

Upon these words Constance's Esquire turning about, knew the person that spoke to him to be a Knight of Britain, of great quality in his own Country. In short, he had seen Dinocus in the Province of the Romans, and he knew that that Britain had commanded the Armies of Aldroec King of Galia Armorica, or Little Britain, and Father of Constantine. Valerius was extremely glad to meet with him so fortunately; but after the first complements usual upon such occasions were over, he seem'd to be somewhat troubled that he had spoken so much, imagining that Constantine it might be had a mind to conceal himself; and therefore excusing himself to Dinocus in that particular, he offer'd him to repair the fault which he had committed, by contradicting what he had said, in such a manner as he should think fitting: No, said the Britain, you have declared nothing but what we our selves were about to have made known. The reasons that oblig'd Constantine to take another name are out of doors through the generosity of Balamir; and if you please, you may see them both. Whereupon Valerius enter'd into the Chamber where Dinocus led him, and was courteously received both by the King of the Britains, and the King of the Huns. While he was giving them an account of the reason of his Journey, the famous name of Constantine flew about as well in the Burchough, as through the Army. All the Kings and Princes were surpris'd at so extraordinary an Adventure, they send to inform themselves exactly, and being ascertain'd of the truth, they thought it behov'd them to pay him that respect which was due to a person of his Dignity and Merit. The King of the Suevians and Herules were the first that went to visit him, as soon as they understood they might do it without inconvenience. And the charming Queen of the Cimbrians led by the King of the Burgundians, and the lovely Princess of Suevia handed by the young King of the Baïernes, coming immediately after; the Society was magnificent, and their converse was admirable. Though there were nothing spoken there but of height and great things, and that there was no person but might have been well satisfied with the Gallantry of the entertainment, the impatient King of Suevia turning toward the King of Great Britain, and casting his eyes upon the fair Rosamond, Sir, said he to Constantine, may we not hope to see you take part with this fair Queen, and for your own interest will you not put a stop to the victories of Pharamond? You know that the Gauls have called him to reign over many fair Provinces, and so it would prove more convenient for your Father as his Territories lie, that he should be vanquish'd upon the Banks of the Rhine, than that he should triumph, and being puff'd up with his prosperity, should go about to make himself terrible to his Neighbours upon the Scin. He is young, he is fortunate; Aldroec is stricken in years, and the Sea separates him from his illustrious Son, who reigns as it were in a world divided from ours. "There is nothing without doubt more honourable, replyed Constantine, than to fight in the behalf of the most incomparable Queen of the Bobemians

“ whether it be a man’s fortune to be a victor in the quarrel, or to die in the service of so “ incomparable a Princess. But, Sir, let us talk freely among our selves, and seeing that “ persons of our degree have not always the opportunity to discourse with our equals, let “ us not make an ill use of that which now offers it self, but for God’s sake let us break our “ thoughts freely. Our Subjects too much disguise the truth of things, they never come “ into our presences but with starch’d countenances, and seeking to please rather than instruct “ us, they rather endeavour to tell us pleasing Tales, than true Storics. In brief, we ought “ to be weary of flattery. And for you, Madam, (said he, addressing himself to Edmond)
 “ I question not but that you are continually environed with complaisant persons, who set “ out Pharamond as an offender, and make a crime of his valour. And thus you suffer your “ self to be led by your prejudice, by your pusillities, or by the opinion of the people:
 “ But, Madam, ’tis time to satisfy you, having satisfied others; it is time to act according “ to your equity, and to shew to all the world that a personage all divine as you are, ought “ to have thoughts more proportionable to the grandeur of your Soul. Your apprehen“ sion ought to be quick and piercing; and while ordinary Geniusses are just enough to “ make a stop, and judge of things by the event, Souls of the first Magnitude are oblig’d “ to ascend higher, and to separate our own dependencies from the capricious humour of “ fortune, that as she pleases, gives success conformable, or contrary to our designs. This discourse did no way dislike the fair Queen, who not daring to manifest the secret delight which she took therein, she undertook the reply with more Majesty than marks of satisfaction, Sir, said she, I confess that the action of the King of the Franks was not criminal when he slew my own Brother before my face; but how praise worthy soever it might be, or how honest soever were his intentions, they could not restore an only Brother to life, nor hinder a dying Father from laying his commands upon me to revenge his death, and not to consent either to have peace or truce with the Prince that slew him. So that if I did not assault Pharamond upon the score of anger, it behoves me to wage war against him out of obedience to my Duty. And I shall be oblig’d to continue it to the last gasp of my breath, since my Father is not living to revoke his orders. “ After all this, Madam, replied the King of Albion, I am of your opinion, that it is “ not for you to desire peace of the King of the Franks; but I cannot tell whether you are “ always oblig’d to refuse that which is offer’d you; if the great Princes who are of your “ party do not rather seek occasions to signify their zeal and their courage, rather than to “ deliver you from the toil of war, and to preserve your Subjects. The Queen of the Cim-brians chuses rather to preserve her honour, replied the impatient King of the Sueves. “ You “ are not ignorant, Sir, replied the King of Great Britain, there is a great difference in ho“ nour, according to the quality of the persons that would purchase it; for a passion of re“ venge, and a violent desire of war, which may be excusable and commendable in a young “ Knight, will add no great reputation to a fair Lady. There are some Ladies, replied Gondioch, so far exalted above others in capacity, that they seem not to be born into the world, but rule after what manner they please. Nor is it methinks a thing prohibited a fair Queen, to seek the Conquests of Nations by the power of her Arms, while the force of her beauty subjects the hearts of so many great Princes. “ Were we to speak of Ladies in general, replied Balamir, “ I could tell you my opinion; but I must hold my tongue while you speak of the conduct “ of a great Queen, who is not to submit to any but the Gods and reason; she will always “ manage things with an admirable prudence, and whether she consents to peace, or will “ continue the war, ’tis for us to do what she thinks fitting. This submission, said Godege-file, seems very obliging, but I find very little advantage in it to the Queen of the Cimbrians; for they may be accounted to have the greatest zeal for her service, that sometimes for her own interest differ in opinion from her.

The young King of the Basternes said nothing to that matter, knowing well that he could not declare either for peace or war, without madding the King of Suevia, or displeasing Albisinda. True it is that he had the happiness to entertain that amiable Princess, who durst not speak before her Father, and thought her self oblig’d in point of civility to hearken to a Prince whose quality and repute deserv’d that common complacence. On the other side, Rosamond not being able to endure to see Albisinda under a constraint, nor to continue a discourse her self, wherein she could not speak her mind freely, she left the Room, and took the fair Princess with her.

They were waited upon back by the Kings of the Burgundians and Basternes, and a while after Amalazontka led by Arderic entred the Chamber, and was received by Constantine with all the marks of acknowledgment and respect, little inferiour to what he had shewed to the Queen of the Cimbrians, and the Princess Albisinda. Hardly had they passed their first complements, when the King of Suevia beheld Amalazontka with a blushing countenance, and and addressing his speech to her with an exasperated smile; Madam, said he, if King Constantine knew what weighty affairs you lay aside, to give him this visit, he would think himself more obliged to you, than to the Queen of the Cimbrians, in regard she has not these great designs that you have. She must remain with her Allies, and may make visits with less disturbance, not having any or less to give for the sending away an Army. “Since mine is suddenly to march, (replied the Queen with some discomposure of mind) there is little likelihood that my designs should be so great as you say, and if it were proper for my sex, to undertake extraordinary enterprises, or that my humour were so much that way inclin’d as yours. I should not forsake a powerful league that might sustain them, and give me hopes of a favourable success. “You forsake it not, (said he with a forced haughtiness) but to wage war by your self, and to have the sole honour of vanquishing Pharamond: For I cannot imagine whatever they say, that you will make a peace with the murderer of Amalaric. That unfortunate King, replied she, fell not but in the design he had to overcome Pharamond, had he not triumph’d in his destiny: and the same Prince has since that shewed respect to Amalazontha, and did her kind offices at the very time, that he proceeded to wage war in her dominions. “You have a very grateful heart, replied the King of Suevia. “At least, replied she, I am more sensible of effectual benefits, than of involuntary offences. To tell the truth Madam, said he, you are a generous Enemy, and you treat Pharamond very civilly——You have treated him so badly, (replied she interrupting him, fiercely incens’d by her prevailing passion) that I know not, Sir, whether your fury be more commendable or my moderation: but however it be, I can dispence, with assailing the life of a Prince that comes to save mine.

Constantine perceiving that the dispute continued so sharp, undertook the discourse to prevent what might ensue: and Balamir, whose inclinations were all virtuous, had the same intention. They both with all civility and modesty, laid before the King of Suevia, that he ought not to be surpris’d at Amalazontha’s intentions, since it was no strange thing that they should be conformable to the softness of her sex: and that they were more inclinable to the pleasing motions of acknowledgment and pardon, than to the violent passions of hatred and revenge. “Let Amalazontha, said he interrupting him, pardon if she have so much a mind to it. Let her dispose of the rights that belong to her person, and let her make what generous use she pleases, of the victory which is almost assured us. “But is it handsome for her, to hinder the Turingiens from revenging the death of their King, or to withdraw her forces from our Army? Amalazontha provoked by his self-will’d stubbornness, “Sir, replied she, you assault your Enemies in such a manner, of which the generous Balamir is a witness, as if you had no need of my forces, nor am I obliged to lend them to an Ally, that would destroy a Prince who had not been expos’d to the danger, but for coming to my relief. “What Madam (said he, impatiently interrupting her) do you quarrel with me for taking the King your Brother’s part? and because I would have you to pay, that which you owe to his memory. “Sir, answered she, I know very well how I ought to receive admonition, and what advantage I can raise either from war or politicks. But to tell you the truth, your advice carries not that weight, when it respects the duties of a family, and the conduct of good manners: for so long as you keep the illustrious Prince of Suevia a prisoner, I cannot tell how you can handsomly tax me, for not being kind to the memory of the unfortunate King of Turingia. In short, Sir, learn to be a kind Father, before you accuse me for not being a kind Sister. “When, said he, interrupting her, the ungrateful Viridomar shall become a dutiful Son, and renounce that cowardly passion that makes him prefer imprisonment before the Command of my Army.

Concluding those words, choler and shame made him blush, and tumultuously considering the noble qualities of Viridomar, as so many obstacles that oppos’d his hopes, he was vexed to see his Son so exceeding handsome, and wish’d that he had had no Son to love. Then perceiving the violence of his disquiet to encrease, his colour changed, and he would have been gone: when Constantine stopping him with a civil entreaty to stay; For Heaven’s sake, said he, permit me to speak in the behalf of the generous Prince of Suevia, and since this opportunity offers it self, which I durst not presume to take, be pleas’d to suffer me to discharge my self of the duty, of a friendship which I enter’d into in the Island of Albion, at that time when he visited the best part of the Courts of Europe. What can you say, replied the enraged King, when you shall understand that he loveth the Sister of my irreconcilable Enemy? That he is unfortunate, replied he, that he is to be bewailed, that he deserves rather your compassion than your anger. Ah, Sir, said he, (pursuing his discourse with a sigh) did you but know the power of love, and were the heat of your impetuous nature, inclinable to that passion, instead of being altogether carried away with a desire of honour, you would easily observe that fate sports with our resolutions, and that it hurries our liberties at its own pleasure, to the fatal point of their destruction and utter loss. At these words the King of Suevia, and the Queen of Turingia both blush'd, and the former undertaking the discourse; I do not, said he, condemn love in general, but I cannot endure that that passion, should compel us to act contrary to reason. I would not have only pardon'd Viridomar, but I should have commended him had he rais'd his thoughts to the fair Queen of the Cimbrians: and I should have been ever joyed to have seen him gone upon a design, that might have been many ways advantageous to him. In short Sir, I would have had the witless Viridomar, have imitated the illustrious Constantine, that like him he had loved a fair Princess, the daughter of a King his Ally, and heiress to a great Kingdom. "Alas Sir, replied the King of Albion, that you should know so few of the particulars of my life, for I knew not presently what I lov'd my self. "How, replied the King of the Herules, was it not with the Princess of great Britain that you always were in Love? And was it not for that charming Princess, said Balamir pursuing the discourse, that you have performed so many renown'd deeds, gain'd for many battels, and renounced so many victories? "Yes Sir, said he, the little which I did and which you overvalue, aim'd at nothing more than the divine Octavia, Gratian's only heiress: And yet I must not forbear to confess, that I never engag'd my self in a design more contrary to reason, nor more distant from any hope of success: Yet was that fatal engagement so sudden and so compulsive, that I was forc'd to love in despite of all my resolution, and to abandon my heart and my will, to the power of my destiny.

The Queen of Turingia hearkened to these words with a redoubled attention, and the King of Suevia in whom the sight of Polixena, had produced the same effect which the sight of Pharamond had produced in the heart of Amalazontha, equally concerning himself in the discourse of Constantine; "How happy should I be, Sir said he, would you but inform me the particulars of a life, which I have so often admir'd. "There are few circumstances therein, replied Constantine, worthy of your curiosity: nevertheless so far as I can, I will not be coy to make you a relation of what you desire, seeing that though you find not all the satisfaction which you expect, I may at least give you to understand, that it is not without ground that I speak for the Prince of Suevia, and that the generous Balamir may see, how strong those obligations are which I owe to Constance, to the end he may advise me in the end, which party I should adhere to. "By what I perceive, replied the King of Suevia, there is little likelihood that you will embrace our side, and since there is less, but that you will speak to the advantage of two persons that favour our Enemies, I must be constrained to bid adieu to that satisfaction which I expected. In short, added he, rising from his seat, 'tis the relation of the noble deeds of Constantine that I would hear, and not the praises of Constance or Viridomar. 'Tis the friendship of the King of great Britain that I would purchase, and not be inform'd that my Enemies have already obtained it. For I must tell you, Sir, Constance and Viridomar are my Enemies; for as long as a disobedient Son, shall foster an unjust passion in his heart, he shall never find that I preserve in mine, the affection of a loving Father.

Concluding these words he went his way together with the King of the Herules, and he was no sooner gone out of the Chamber, complemented by Balamir with the most noble grace in the world; but the converse ceased to be so rude and quarrelsome, as it had been, being again renewed between the Turingien Queen, the Prince of the Huns, the King of the Britains and the King of the Alains. "Sir, said Amalazontha to Constantine, I must confess that I have the same longing that the King of Suevia had, and as I have not the same reluctance, to hear well of Constance and Viridomar, I shall be highly engaged if you will permit me the satisfaction of my curiosity. I would not at this time give you the trouble of such a request, did I not think to be gone very suddenly, or if I had not been inform'd that you have in your train, a Brittish Knight who is able to save you the trouble, by relating the story of your life himself. 'Tis very true that Dinocus can very well perform that task, said Balamir, and besides the delight we shall take therein we shall thereby discover Constantine's resolution, which part he intends to take in this famous war. It would never trouble me without doubt, replied the King of Albion, to find all Germany judge equitably of my proceedings: But Dinocus has so much kindness for me, that I am afraid he will tire you with a hundred unprofitable things, while he labours to turn them to my advantage. "We have no such fear, replied Balamir, for I know the Knight of whom you speak, to be a person so quaint and so judicious, that the Queen of the Turingiens will be well satisfied in his discourse. And therefore I will carry him to her Apartment, when she shall think it convenient, that she may more commodiously hear a long rehearsal, “rehearsal, which before you he cannot so well repeat without prejudice to your health; as also lest your presence should restrain a person from using his freedom, who will be forc’d to speak in the praise of your renowned Actions in your own hearing. You will exceedingly oblige me, replied Amalazombha, by giving your self as soon as may be the trouble which you undertake. And because my Officers have received all the orders which they expect from me for this day, I am willing to employ the rest of the Afternoon to hear a Story that cannot but be very pleasing.

Concluding those words she rose from her Seat, and went away, being led by the King of the Alains to the Castle, that she might retire her self in her own Apartment. Balamir delayed not to go and find him out; so that after he had made it his first business to take care of Constantine, and then found that his presence was no longer necessary, he carried Dionocus to the Queen of the Turingiens, according to his promise. Amalazombha next obligingly receiv’d the British Knight, and having caused Balamir to sit down, and commanded Dionocus to do the same, she requested the Britain to give her that satisfaction which she expected; which he accordingly did in manner following, after he had considered a while to recall the particulars to his mind,

The History of Constantine.

THE Relation whichth you demand, great Queen, is most worthy the curiosity which you have manifested, there being few Histories that better deserve your attention than that which I am going to relate: whether it be that you love to hear of those great changes caused by those revolutions that have their original from ambition, or that you have a heart sensible of Lovers affection, and of the misfortunes to which the violence of that passion often exposes them. But before I begin the Adventures of my Renowned Master, give me leave to inform you, that he is descended from a very ancient succession of Kings; and for that reason cursorily to mention the original of a people that gave the name to both the Britains. Without doubt you very well know, that Great Britain is that famous Island which our Forefathers call’d Albion, either because one of the Sons of Neptune, call’d Albion, had there reigned; or else, according to the language of the Romans, from the whiteness of the Rocks that environ it. And you also as well understand that Little Britain is that part of Gallia which is call’d Armorica. The Britains that possess both Countries are descended from the Trojans, and derive their name from the valiant Brutus, who was the youngest Son of Ascanius, the Son of Aeneas. Lavinia could not bring forth Brutus but with the loss of her life; and he had hardly attain’d to the fifteenth year of his age when he slew his Father with an Arrow by accident as he was a hunting. This second misfortune, though it fell out by chance, renewed the remembrance of the former; and both being considered together, appear’d so strange, that Brutus began to be a terrour to all his kindred, and began insensibly to hate himself. His native Country seem’d so fatal to him, continually putting him in mind of his misfortune, that he resolv’d to forsake it, and to wander from Country to Country, to wear away his melancholy with the pleasing varieties of Travel. He made a halt first in Greece; where several of the dispersed Trojans gathering together, joyn’d themselves with him. So that at length, after some few little Wars with his Neighbours, that Renowned Exile resolv’d to seek out some settled place of Habitation. He embark’d in several Ships that had been presented to him by a certain King that was his Confederate; but being in a great perplexity what course to take, he, as they report, consulted the Oracle of Diana, who ordain’d him to go to the Island of Albion, where she promised him a peaceable possession for himself and his posterity. Brutus willingly undertook a Voyage that was so successful, but after they had been a long time at Sea, coming upon the Coast of Gallia, he was so delighted with that Country, that he landed in Armorica. The Gauls would have repell’d him, he encounters them in several Battels, so that the valiant Turnus, Nephew of our Renowned Founder, was there slain, after he had kill’d six hundred men with his own hands in that War. Brutus afflicted for his death, resolv’d to immortalize his Nephew’s fame, to which purpose he built a Town of his name upon the Banks of the River Loire, which famous name extended it self afterwards over a whole Province, which for its fertility was call’d the Garden of the Gauls. No sooner was this magnificent Monument erected to the memory of the valiant Turnus, but pensive Brutus departed from Gallia, and sail’d away for the Country to which his destiny call’d him.

There

There he fix'd himself, chasing out the Giants that were the ancient inhabitants thereof; and upon the Banks of Thamesis he founded the stately City of Troynovant, or new Troy, Capital of the fairest and biggest Island in the world. The posterity of Brutus reign'd therein very peaceably, till Octavius, who liv'd about fifty years since, who had only one Daughter, whom several great Princes laboured to merit by their Services, or to take away by open force. Conan, a Prince considerable for many excellent Qualities and Princely Endowments, Nephew of Octavius, believ'd that there was no person who could pretend to dispute her with him; however that he might make a league with the Romans, the King was advis'd to give his Daughter to one of their principal Senators named Maximus, the Son of Leonius, a Britain by Birth, and Uncle to the famous and virtuous Helen, Mother of Constantine the Great: Octavius follows this counsel, sends for Maximus, and bestows his Daughter upon him. But Conan not enduring this piece of injustice flies to the Pis, and relies upon their assistance, declares war against Maximus his Confederate. However, his enterprize was not altogether so successful as he desired. Maximus overthrew him in a set Battel, but making a generous use of his victory, he granted him peace, and promised him a Kingdom in lieu of the losses which he had receiv'd by his means. To which purpose they both rais'd new Forces, and imbarquing them, they steer'd away for Gallia Armorica, and there landed. Being both very valiant men, and their numbers very considerable, and because they were assisted by several of the Britains, with whom they had before kept a secret correspondence, they soon became Masters of the Country; and having utterly either destroyed or expelled the native Gauls, they still preserv'd the best part of the women. But, Madam, shall I dare to make mention of a piece of cruelty, which to our shame has made so loud a report in the world? For those Britains more in love, with their language than they needed, cut out the tongues of all the women which they had preserv'd, that by that severe piece of cruelty, their language might keep its native purity free from mixture. After such a horrible way of prevention used, it is no wonder they still retain a peculiar Idiom in that Country, which you would the sooner believe, did you but know the inclination of the people. By this strange and barbarous usage the Britains became so odious to the Gauls, that they were forc'd to send for women out of their own Country; and all the world knows the Story of the eleven thousand Virgins, which were sent thither, of which the chiefest in Virtue, Beauty and Birth, was the famous Ursula, design'd for King Conan, whose memory is yet in great veneration among us.

Thus, Madam, you see that the two people that inhabit both Britains, are but one Nation; and the Sea to repair the injury which it seems to have done them by that separation, joyns together again by frequent Commerce and Alliance. Aldroec King of Gallia Armorica had always kept a friendly correspondence with Gratian King of Great Britain. They mutually succour'd one the other in all difficulties, yet that consideration, how strict soever it were, not being entirely to their satisfaction, they resolv'd to unite themselves by more particular Alliances, as opportunity should offer. The Heavens favoured their wishes in probability, for their children seem'd to be born for no other end but to love one another, and to unite their Father's Kingdoms. Aldroec had espoused a Gaul, though a Princess both wise and fair, named Fregonda; and four years after, Gratian put the Crown of Great Britain upon the head of the fair and virtuous Lucia, born of Roman Parents, inhabiting in the Island of Albion. Constantine the Son of Aldroec and Fregonda had hardly attain'd the fifth year of his age when the Queen of Great Britain lay in of Octavia, and because those two Royal Families were continually renewing or confirming their friendship by one signal of assurance or other, Lucia did not fail to send Fregonda notice of the news, verily believing it would be no way unacceptable. She also frankly offer'd Octavia for a Mistress for young Constantine, so that the Birth of the Princess was in both Kingdoms solemniz'd with publick Plays and Festivals: and if the fair streams of Thamesis some years before were pompously adorned by the Natives at the Birth of Constantine, the Banks of the Loire resounded with acclamations no less portending a universal joy for the nativity of Octavia. In short, Madam, never was there so sweet a beginning, never an infancy so happy, while fate seems to labour the good fortune of Constantine and Octavia, before they were in a condition to be sensible of it. Being thus both admirably beautiful, both Heirs of two fair Kingdoms, and both born one for another, who could now imagine but that they should be both perfectly happy? But alas! for they can never be happy that rely upon two blind powers, that put their trust in the promises of Fortune and Love. 'Tis well known that the former does but raise her Favourites to cast them headlong down into deeper miseries: and that Love poisons with his favourites, and hides the dismal precipices under pleasing flowers that he makes use of to delude our eyes. My Master's life is a conspicuous testimony thereof; and

and in the pursuit of my discourse you will find the many causes he has to bewail his misfortune, and complain of his love. The death of Queen Lucia laid the first foundations of his misery; but not to tell you at this time of a haughty Princess, advanc'd to the Throne some while after; it is only my business to pursue the Story of the Prince of Armorica. This famous Britain was born with all those rare Endowments that form a Hero, nor was ever seen a fairer assembly of noble qualities than appear'd in that great personage. As you have only beheld him a bed, and wounded, methinks, Madam, I am to speak to you, as it you had never seen him before, and to inform you, that his person is admirably compos'd, his behaviour charming, and his aspect so majestick, that it immediately attracts both the love and respect of all people; his disposition mild, yet powerfully insinuating into those affections whither it leads him into acquaintance. And for a Soul, there never was a larger, nor more vast than his. He has embrac'd the whole world, in aspiring to its entire conquest. And if reason had not moderated his designs, and if the power of Love had not acted by Constantine's consent, to stop his progress, Constantine, that Constantine of whom I now speak, had at this day been a greater name than that of Cæsar, or Alexander: all the world agrees, that unless it were the famous Hannibal, the Romans never had a more formidable Enemy; let us go a little farther, and say that if Constantine had not met with those obstacles which I am coming to relate, he had advanc'd his renown beyond the celebrated Carthaginian, who lost himself at Capua, and making a better use of his Victories, had, ere this, brought the lofty Rome her self under his subjection: Aldroec charm'd with the noble qualities of his Son, laboured with his utmost care for his education, and to second the liberality of nature with a Princely Nurture, he sent for the most exquisite Masters that could be found out in the world, as well to instruct him in the Sciences, as in the Exercises of the Body. The Prince learn'd so exactly and so readily whatever his Masters taught him, that there was never known a more active, vigorous, wise and discreet youth. Those Studies however hindred him not from showing himself a brave Courtier, such as one might be that had not experienc'd love; so that he was scarce fifteen years of age when he wrote Letters to the Princess Olavia, and sent her little presents more conformable to her age than Dignity.

This pleasing correspondence continued as long as his exercises, but having completed his studies, though not yet of Age nor in a disposition to marry; he betook himself to the wars, joyning himself to the interest of those Nations, who out of a noble impatience, resolv'd to shake of the Roman yoke. He declared his purpose to the King his Father, and urg'd it with so many reasons and vehement entreaties, that Aldroec was near vanquish'd; but bethinking himself at last, that Constantine was his only hope, his affection for a Son so well belov'd, made him repent that he had already, so far condescended to his laudable intentions. He therefore oppos'd his paternal Authority to the Prince's resolutions, yet to satisfy him in part, and to employ that activity and stirring humour that he saw in him, he gave him leave to travel. And as I had the honour to accompany him, I could inform you of the particulars of his Travels, had any remarkable passage happen'd worthy your attention: Only I will say this, that though Constantine pass'd only for an ordinary Knight, yet he gain'd a reputation in all places where we came. We visit'd the Emperour's Court, where we beheld the dazzling splendour, of Placidia the Emperour's Sister's beauty, the power of the favourite Stilicon and the great merit of Constance. After that taking Germany in our way, we view'd the principal Cities and visit'd the most famous, and most celebrated personages of both Sexes: But, Madam, as I have travelled so far in so short a time, so for the same consideration it behoves me, to finish my journey with the same speed, being only to tell you in a few words, that we return'd into Gallia Armorica, through the territories of the Batavians and Belgians. Soon after our return the Queen Fregunda dyed, so that while Aldroec and Constantine with tears lamented her death, our Court continu'd a long time a most pensive mourner. But to restore their former joy and mirth after so much sadness, Aldroec thought on nothing more than to perpetuate his life, in the succession of his posterity: And to that purpose he renew'd an Alliance which many people desired, though others laboured to break it off, seeing it was accounted the most important in all Europe: Gratian having no Son, nor the probability of having any by his second Marriage. The Prince no sooner understood his Father's design, but he seem'd to be troubled at it, when I, not enduring to see him melancholly without a cause; Is it possible Sir, said I, that you should be sad, when all things succeed so happily for you, and that you should be the only person in the world, ignorant of your own good fortune? Take heed Sir, take heed that heaven be not incens'd against you, by giving you at last a true and just occasion to bewail your calamity. Has it not beflowed upon you, those endowments which it seldom parts with? Does it not design you heir to two Crowns, and the enjoyment of a fair and virtuous Princess? After all this most fortunate Prince, what can you more desire? Honour—replied he with a sigh—Nor can I any longer live, without seeing opportunities to purchase it.

He was about to have continued his discourse, when I was sent for by the King: and I was no sooner come into his presence in the Closet, when directing his speech to me in particular, Dinocus, said he, I have received Intelligence, that the King of the Picts is preparing to invade Gratian's Dominions, threatening to waste his Territories with Fire and Sword, unless he will give him the Princess Octavia in marriage. But, Sir, said I in a surprise, King Gratian has solemnly promised her to you already. You know, said he, interrupting me, the casiness of Gratian's disposition, and that the dread of his enemies may easily make him fail of his word to his Confederate. And I must clearly confess, that were not the Queen his wife much better resolv'd than he; the hopes which I have of uniting the two Britains in the person of Constantine, would be but very ill assur'd. That resolution, replied I, will be strengthened by the fierceness of the Britains; nor can I imagine that a people so haughty as they will ever submit to the Scepter of the Picts. The natural enmity between those two Nations is so great, that there is no fear that they will suddenly come to an agreement; if we then can in the mean time but land an Army in Great Britain, the very sight and presence of a people well seconded, and the terrour of fresh succours will give a new heat to our mutual animity, and fortifie the justice of your pretentions. That which you say is very considerable, replied the King; but Dinocus, I must inform you more than yet I have told you, my Neighbours, to oppose the growth of my power, have enter'd into a league with the Picts, and to make a Diversion, they are suddenly to invade my Territories with a considerable power. The Neustrians and many other Neighbour Nations are levying Forces already, so that it is easie to foresee that we shall quickly have our hands full. Therefore let us lose no time, Dinocus, let us levy Soldiers, visit the Sea-Ports, and see what condition our Ships are in; so that whether we be constrain'd to repel our Enemies, or succour our Allies, let us prepare to maintain the Honour of the two Britains, and give those envious Nations cause to repent, that oppose their union.

Having spoken those words, he began to examine what Expedient were necessary to be made use of in that weighty conjuncture of Affairs; and doing me the honour to leave the sole management of that important service to my care, he promised me the chief command of the Forces which he was about to raise. His intelligence was very true, for we had no sooner raised twenty thousand men, but we were assail'd by more than forty thousand. The Britains were very much dismay'd, and considering the great inequality of number, they dreaded a fatal issue of the War. The Prince was the only person that carried cheerfulness in his countenance, and a brisk fire that sparkled in his eyes; nor did his behaviour less demonstrate the transportment of his courageous mind, which he could not moderate, while he gave thanks to Heaven that now offered him such a favourable opportunity to win Renown. However, in this satisfaction he met with some vexation, for by reason he had not yet attain'd his seventeenth year, the King thought it not convenient to expose him to dangers accompanied with great labour and travel. Constantine more terrified at the resolution of Aldroec, than with all the threats of the Neustrians, throws himself at his Father's feet, and in that submissive posture intermixes with respectful Prayers such generous and lofty resolutions, that he wrested from him, as it were by force, a consent, which he look'd upon as his chiefest happiness. Aldroec knowing how much the presence of a King avail'd, puts himself at the head of his Army, and to strike a terrour into the Enemy, and give new courage to the Britains, he marches against them rather like the first Assailor, than one that stood upon his necessary defence. However, he admirably took his advantages, and were I not to make a relation of more important Wars, I could let you see in reciting the particulars of this, that Aldroec behav'd himself like an experienced Commander. However, I must needs confess, that neither his experience, nor the advantages of those Posts of which he had carefully possess'd himself, nor his election of the ground in Fight had given him that victory which he obtain'd over forty thousand men, commanded by their Prince, who signaliz'd himself by many noble feats of war, had not the valiant Constantine in that very Battel, which was the first that ever he fought in his life, perform'd actions worthy of eternal memory. The King gave me the right Wing, the left to a Knight of Galia, considerable both for his Birth and Valour, and careful of the preservation of his only Son; he kept him near his person in the main Battel, surrounded with all the youth of the Court; Constantine endured it for some time with a horrible vexation, but seeing the Britains hard beset, he felt himself transported with a warlike impatience, and taking advantage of those disorders that generally precede a Rout, he nimbly stole out of the crowd, and ran to the succour of those Troops that he saw most in need.

Presently

Presently he began to encourage them, and throwing himself among the thickest of the Neustrians, he slew three or four of their Officers, and put the rest to flight with a most incomparable valour; afterwards looking every where about to see where his presence was needful, he observed where the Prince of Neustria, whom he knew by the Magnificence of his Arms, and by other marks which had been told him, very sorely press'd upon our men with a fresh courage. At the sight of that illustrious Enemy, and the danger wherein the King was, he felt his strength redouble, and resolving to encounter the valiant Neustrian, after he had given him a loud defiance, he got at him maugre all the resistance that stood in his way, and wounded him in two places in so short a time as was hardly to be imagin'd. The provok'd Prince of Neustria flew toward his Adversary; but while he makes haste to revenge himself, and Constantine prepares to complete his victory, they were separated from one another by the joyning of two Bodies. My Master instead of being satisfied with that first success, accuses himself for want of vigour, and terrible as he was, as well for the blood with which he was all besmear'd, as for the blows which he gave, he makes way through the disin'd Enemies, as a young Lion makes the Hunter flie with the first effects of his fury. On the other side, his Adversary, who fought the fierce Constantine, wanted neither valour nor boldness; and therefore desiring revenge with the same heat as my Master thirsted to complete his victory, it was not long before they met again. The Combat was furious and bloody, and such a one as cool'd the courage of many a Spectator; but the impatient Constantine perceiving his courage and his rage both to increase, by resistance which he had never made trial of before, he flew upon his enemy with that violence that nothing could stop, and letting drive with his victorious Sword where his Curiafs was defective, he thrust it through his Body up to the very Hilts. After the death of the Prince ensued a general rout of the whole Army: so that the valour of Constantine gain'd us a victory so entire, that we were not only Masters of the Field, but of all their Bag and Baggage: and more than that, the Neustrians having drain'd all their Frontier Garrisons to reinforce their Army, we found our selves in a condition to march without any obstruction to their chief City of Roman. Aldroec, who had been an eye-witness of the last action of the Prince, was so overjoyed, that embracing his Son close in his Arms, he kissed him a thousand times with tears in his eyes, which the excess of joy drew from thence; but on a sudden, calling to mind the many dangers that his beloved Son had run through, and seeing the blood trickle down his Arms, he found that the transportment of his content abated in his heart, and gave way for his care to preserve a life of that inestimable value, he immediately caused the young and lovely Victor to be disarm'd, desiring to see his wounds: nor was he without a double measure of joy when he understood that he had but two, and that they were neither great nor dangerous. So that Constantine did not keep his Bed above ten or twelve days. In the mean time, his reputation having wrought a powerful effect over all Armorica, the Britains inspir'd with fresh courage, came and joynd themselves in great Troops every day to the Army: insomuch that it was so numerously reinforce'd that they resolv'd upon the siege of Roman, and our Souldiers, proud of their victory, thought of nothing else but the entire conquest, of all the fertile Country belonging to it. The Neustrians terrified sent Embassadors to the King, very submissively desiring peace, propounding very advantageous conditions: and Aldroec readily sign'd the Articles, that he might bend all his thoughts upon the war of great Britain. To that purpose he pick'd out the choicest of all his Army to succour his Allies, and having given me the command thereof, I perform'd my duty with so much diligence, that I was ready to set sail in a few days. The Prince not willing to lose this second opportunity to signalize himself, besought the King his Father: so that Aldroec whatever care he had not to expose his Son too rashly, was constrained to give way to his desires a second time, and to permit him to exercise that admirable valour, of which some part of the Gauls had already felt the surprizing effects: Besides the power, which the prayers of a Son so infinitely below'd had over him; Aldroec thought it of great concernment, that Constantine should appear in Albion in a condition, fit to gain the Hearts of the Islanders, and that it would be hard to find such another opportunity. He judg'd it also a piece of justice, that the Prince being no less presumptive King of great Britain than of the lesser, as he had fought for the latter, so he also should succour the other; so much the rather because it was chiefly for his interests, that it sustain'd a war against the Picts. Constantine satisfied with the first successes of his Arms, and overjoyed to see himself engaged, in a more famous war than that of the Neustrians; embark'd with a more lively and chearful countenance, than when he march'd against his first Enemies: so that to entertain him in that pleasant humour, and to pass the time in acceptable discourse during our short voyage; You must now acknowledge, said I, that there is more pleasure to go to fight for a fair Mistress, than you found in defending the frontiers of Armorica. The Mistress of which you speak, said the Prince, is not perhaps that Mistress that I am most affected withal: For 'tis another that I adore, whose charms are more powerful over my heart, and not the Princess Octavia at this time. In short, Dinocus, I breathe after nothing but honour, her favours carry a greater esteem and ardour in my breast, than those of the fairest person in the world: and I have so good an opinion of her that she will not prove ingrateful; that I am resolv'd to serve her all the days of my life. I cannot tell, Sir, said I, what delight you take in her favours, but this I know, that her favourites enjoy but little repose and short lives. How, said he, Dinocus, (looking upon me with a kind of surprize) do you speak as you really believe? can you be afraid of that death that you talk of? can there be any thing more pleasing than to dye in the Arms of glory? or can a man dye in that manner without being immortal? do you blame a passion that all the world applauds, and which you have strengthened in my heart, and which you would have inspir'd into my Soul, had not nature prevented you? You judge very truly Sir, replied I, that I cannot condemn that noble passion, but I speak ingenuously, I could wish that you had not devoted your heart entirely to it, but that the charming Princess of Albion, might have some share therein: Surely you would be much more happy, nor would you have any cause to complain of love, if instead of causing you to mourn and sigh, he should crown you with a double crown, while you enjoy another Kingdom, and the charming Princess together. When all this shall happen, answered he, of which there is very great likelihood, it will not occasion me so much perhaps to rejoyce as you believe: For I must confess that I should rather chuse to purchase a happiness, than to be beholding for it to the liberality of fortune. "Is it not sufficient, said I, that we render our selves worthy of that happiness, without taking a great deal of pains to gain what is offer'd us: so that if love be ready to present you with that double crown of which I speak, why should you labour to tear out of his hands, what he so freely offers?" But they say, Dinocus, replied he smiling, that that love of which you are so great a Patron to day, never makes any considerable present, and that for the most part he only gives you a Crown of Myrtle. "You must agree then, (said I with the same countenance) that the Crowns of your Mice are not of greater value, that your Lawrel may have a larger leaf than Myrtle but not more fresh and green: and that after all it is not for a Prince of your Age to speak against love. Nor do I think, replied he, that it becomes a person of your Years, to take his part with so much heat, and I must boldly confess that how terrible soever you describe him to be, I cannot apprehend any great danger in provoking him. Take heed, Sir, take heed, said I, and make your self secure from his assaults by a happy marriage: For in short, continued I very seriously, I am afraid lest your great courage prove fatal to you, and I should fain see you tyed. "Ah! Dinocus, said he interrupting me, talk no more of those terrible ties: I tremble to think that my Father should engage me without advising with me, and that he should give away my heart, although it never yet was touch'd nor it may be never will be. "I cannot tell what it will do, said I, but if the Princess Octavia be not flattered, the effects of her beauty may happen to surprize you. "I must confess, said he, that I have heard her reported, able to captivate the most severe and obstinate liberties, but since we were born one for another, that will be no great trouble to me though she deprive me of mine. But I must tell you I do not expect she should; for as I never yet had the curiosity to see her picture, and have hitherto also preserv'd my liberty both in Rome and in Germany, 'tis not very probable that I should lose it in great Britain. You see how unconcern'd I was when I beheld the beauties of Placidia, and the pleasing lineaments of the amiable Princess of Suevia. You know well that unpunished I beheld the charming Siller of the King of the Franks, and the incomparable Princess of the Cimbrians; and after all this ought I to tear the Power of love, or to speak according to our own fancy; can I expect that Octavia should pierce a heart that all those famous beauties could not wound, or that she should do more than all the Polixena's and Rosamonds? But Sir, replied I, that bright lustre that strikes the eyes is not always that which surprizes the soul: for you have heard talk a thousand times of a beauty, which men have never seen, yet only by report, they have felt something within, which, more powerful than the sight of shape or countenance, has wrought in their heart both great and sudden effects, which without doubt, proceeds from the Sympathy and Temperament of Nature.

You hear Madam what was our discourse during our passage, nor was it very pleasing to me to hear, that the Prince sigh'd after nothing but glory, and was not capable of receiving those thoughts, which I would have inspir'd into him, to moderate that heat which cannot be but dangerous, being violent in the breast of a young man without controul. We were now within the sight of the Towers of Dover, when as I was thus discoursing to Constantine, he seem'd to be in a kind of study: but immediately looking earnestly upon me,

Dinocus,

Dinocus, said he, since the King was so unwilling I should undertake this voyage, and that our embarking was so sudden, that there can be no news thereof in great Britain, I am resolv'd to conceal my self for a time, and go by another name as long as I can. Ob Sir, (replyed I very much troubled, and suspecting his design) you neither can nor is it convenient: Think you 'tis possible to conceal your self, among a people that have daily trade with your own subjects, or that you can ever gain the esteem of a Nation, to which you are obliged to make your self known, and beloved among them by going disguised. If that disguise of mine turn to the advantage of the same nation, replyed he, can you justly blame me if I conceal my quality, only to avoid the pestermment of complements, the expences and formalities that people are constrained to, in the entertainments of persons of my dignity. Really Sir, answered I smiling, your foresight is most admirable, and I think it reaches farther than I have spoken, and if you should only pass for an ordinary Knight, to the end you might be less taken notice of, and less care take taken of your preservation, and in regard you might then fight as often as you please. I must confess, replyed he, that I would not stay at home with Gratian, when the Britains of both Kingdoms were hazarding their lives in my quarrel, for indeed the disposition of that mild King and your exact prudence, are more terrible to me than our Enemies. The life of a great Prince, added I, is of too high a price to be lightly expos'd, and persons who are not born but to sovereign Authority, are so exalted in their condition, that they might not experience the troubles and hazards of the common people. Princes, said he, are set over Nations to protect and not to oppress them, and we are no less oblig'd to fight for them, than they oblig'd to expose their lives for our preservation. In short Dinocus, I am absolutely bent to pass only for one, of the Principal Officers under your command, and if you think good call me Viridonix, or by any other name that you please. I know I shall not be able to conceal my self long in the Court of Troy Novant, but I shall be contented if before I am discovered, and before I am compelled to bear the part of a King's Son, I can find an opportunity to perform some enterprize to satisfy the best of my desire.

To these words he added others more strong and more convincing, and made so much use of his eloquence and his authority over me, as well by reason of his vertue as his birth; that I was at length constrained to give way, that he should take upon him a disguise contrary to my approbation. As we were perplexing our selves, to find out a way to bring about the Prince's design, a Sailer from the top-mast-head discovering a Vessel, cryed out affail, yonder be the Britains. We immediately looked out, and calling our eyes as far as we could discern, we soon spycd what the Mariner had discovered, and to assure our selves that he was not mistaken, we discovered the Ancient of the Vessel that bore up directly to us. Constantine not being willing to be known for the King's Son, instead of expecting those honours which were his due, separating from the rest of the Fleet, bore up toward the Britains, who as we truly conjectur'd were coming to receive us with all civility. It was then less difficult for us to conceal Constantine's quality, for the Prince who was beloy'd even to veneration by all his Father's subjects, having given them to understand that he was unwilling, they should discover who he was, on purpose to hinder the Britains from giving him that magnificent reception, which they were all ready to have done. We all agreed to call him Viridonix, and that he should pass for a Knight in great esteem among the Gauls, and Commander of the Auxiliary forces of that Nation, who then serv'd in the Army of the Armoricans. These directions were no sooner given out, but the two Ships were come up with us, ready to perform the usual salutes: which being done with all the formalities of friendship, which is usual at such encounters; we came up board and board with them, rending the sky with all the shouts and acclamations of a loud joy. Immediately we hoisted out our long boats to go aboard them, when an Islander of a comely presence, and about fifty years of age, came aboard us and complemented us with a very good grace, in behalf of the Citizens of Dover, of which Town he was the chief Magistrate. He pray'd us to go ashore, and rest us the remainder of that day in the Town, and to accept of some refreshments that they had prepar'd for us. I answered his civility with another, not opposing the obliging offer of the Magistrate: but Viridonix had no sooner return'd him thanks on the behalf of the Gauls, which he did very gracfully; but he testified his unwillingness to what I had consented. For my part, said he to the Britain, it beoves me not to partake of any refreshment, of which the Gauls whom I command have not their share. Nor can I let them participate of your civil offer, without hazarding the loss of a great part of them by my landing, which may give them a desire to shift for themselves, when they may so easily do it. Ob Sir, replyed the Magistrate, I beseech you make no excuses, nor deprive our people of so charming a presence as yours. You will afford them an extraordinary comfort, for your countenance alone is able to infuse new courage into them, and to raise their spirits almost ready to droop. We will send refreshments through the whole Navy, as well to the Gauls as Britains: but for you Sir, we entreat you to go aboard with those officers that are with you, and the more you bring along the more you will oblige the Islanders, and the more enlarge their hopes.

To these entreaties he added others more obliging, and made use of so many kind importunities, that at length he perswaded us to put into Deter Road and go ashore. The Town seem'd to us to be very large and magnificent, and shew'd us a fair Range of buildings all along the Sea-side, adorn'd with Balconies all after the same order and fashion. The Balusters were of Copper gild'd, and at such a convenient distance from the ground, that that they who took the Air in their Balconies might discourse with them that walk'd upon the Key. We were no sooner got into the Harbour, but all the Ships that lay there saluted us, and the shouts of the Islanders mixing with the sounds of the Trumpets and other warlike instruments, fill'd the Air with their loud Echoes, and caus'd the very Waves of the Ocean to swell. But the most pleasing object that dazzled our Eyes, was an infinite number of fair Ladies that stood in the Balconies, either to see us land, or to behold the Navy that came to their succour. The Lustre of so many fair women as generally they are in great Britain, had very pleasantly busied our eyes, had not two or three young Virgins that flung their glances upon the Prince as soon as he was landed, attract'd our sight by their postures of wonder and eager observation. When we came so near their Balcony as to hear what they said, where we were likewise forced to make a stop till the rest of the officers came to us, we heard that one of them in pursuit of a discourse, that she had address'd to a Lady somewhat elderly; "Good-now, Madam, said she, let her come hither, she will be highly pleas'd to behold these strangers: And since they shew us, added she laughing, a person of the most noble aspect in the world, it is but just that you should shew him the fairest Lady in the world." "It is not my fault, said the Lady that was spok'n to, that she does not come forth to take the Air as we do, or that she does not leave her work upon which she is so intent. Turning about as she had done speaking she went into the house, and after she had stay'd there a very little time, she returned with a young Lady that rather seem'd to be a Deity. A proportion more streight was never seen nor a freer carriage, and though she had not all that majesty, which riper years might have completed by adding to her height, yet was she infinitely lovely, to the full satisfaction both of the sight and imagination. Were I speaking before any other person than your self, Madam, I could not contain from describing that miraculous beauty to the utmost: But what delight can you take in such a Portraiture, that when you please can behold your self in your own mirror, and who are also daily in company with the amiable Princesses of Suevia, and the divine Queen of the Cimbrians. At those words the fair Queen of the Turingiens blush'd and sigh'd, but no way interrupting Dinocur, he continued his story as follows.

I will content my self only to tell you, that the bright Eyes and the pure whiteness of her complexion, darted such a dazzling Lustre, that Constantine greedily set his eyes with such an enchanting sight: and that the first object that seiz'd upon the eyes of that astonishing beauty, was the person of Constantine: But admire, Madam, admire at the effects of a powerful Sympathy, while the Prince keeps his eyes fixed upon the person of that divine Virgin, with that earnestness which he was never before accustomed to; that admirable Lady stedfastly beheld Constantine, they both together blush'd at the same time, and at the same time you might see a short sigh make its escape from the fairest lips that ever were seen, while at the same time the passionate Prince seems to breath forth a thousand amorous flames. The charming looks of the unknown Virgin dart a thousand glances, or rather a thousand little Cupid's Arrows from her fair Eyes into my Master's: They enter pleasingly, and so far they carry nothing but delight, but descending into the heart there they make a horrible havock. The Prince is in an extasy, stands immovable, and being not able to take notice that the Magistrates were ready to conduct us, I advertis'd him that we were to go on. What, said he, do you expect no more to come. No Sir, whisper'd I to him, for the Officers that are to follow us are already landed. We had best, said he, send for some more to come ashore, be it only to delight the people. Sir, said I smiling, this is only to squander your own time, but I beseech you, Sir, let us march on, and remember your self, that it is not in this Town, that you are to lose this insensibility, which has rais'd these disputes between us. Well then since we must let us go on, said he inwardly perplexed, and whether it be that we are insensible, or that we would cease to be so, let us endure to bear our affections condemn'd, though it be for loving the fairest person in the world.

Pronouncing these last words he march'd forwards, and we were conducted to a house where they had prepared a magnificent banquet, and after the entertainment was over to another, where they left us to repose and rest our selves, before we began to enter upon business. When we were alone Constantine beheld me very stedfastly, and having observ'd me me for some time without speaking. Did you see, said he, Dinocus, the fairest creature that ever Heaven made? Or rather in all our travels did you ever observe any thing that could compare with that surprising Beauty that I am now admiring, unless you call to mind that of Placidia, or that you have not forgot the charms of Polixena and Rosamond. Alas, continued he sighing, that I should be so unhappy, that it is not in my power to tie my self inseparably to her, perpetually to behold her, and enjoy the pleasure of adoring her to the last moment of my life.

He talk'd to himself, walking, as if he had been in haste, about the Room; then stopping just before me, and recalling his words before I could have time to answer him, but why should I esteem my self unfortunate, that have both a heart and a Crown to give? You are promised already both the one and the other, replied I. For the latter, (briskly interrupting me, said he) they may dispose of it without my approbation; but for my heart there is no person shall dispose of it: but that most admirable Virgin that is already Mistress of it. Yes, Dinocus, she is absolute Mistress thereof; and if I must renounce the enjoyment of Octavia, and both Britains, I shall freely forgo them, preferring the fetters of this admirable Beauty, before the Dominion of the whole earth.

Concluding these words, he stood still, he kept silence, he rear'd up his eyes to Heaven, he sigh'd, but after all he gave way to his discontents: Silly Prince, said he, is it this way thou maintainest thy Honour? Is it by such low thoughts as these that thou canst preserve these fair pretensions to which thy illustrious Birth has advanc'd thee, and that grandeur of courage of which thou thoughtest thy self the owner? Dost thou not remember both the Dignity and the happiness to which thou mayst attain? But forgetting that thou art to rule over more than one Kingdom, cowardly and poorly enslavest thy heart to an unknown Damsel. Hast thou not resisted the charms of the fairest Princesses in the world, though they were Princesses? Art thou not capable of any other passion but what is beneath persons of thy Rank? Ah, Constantine! thou art never to act after such a manner, nor to dispose so lightly of a heart which thou owest to the repose and union of many Kingdoms. Thou comest into Albion to succour the Britains; thou dost not cross the Sea at the head of an Army to sigh at the feet of a Virgin without name: for if Constantine ought to carry fetters in Great Britain, he ought to wear those of the Princess Octavia, nor ought he to have them imposed upon him but by that fair and illustrious hand whence he expects the Scepter. He pronounc'd those words with a strange commotion, then walking to and fro without speaking, as if he were absolutely resolving what he had to, he made a stop before me, and looking earnestly upon me, I am victor, Dinocus, I am victor, for my reason has overcome a passion which you have condemn'd: it was too mean, it was too unworthy the heart of Constantine to settle it self there; and if it got thither by such ways as I cannot apprehend, I have expell'd it by my reason, and with a purpose never to receive it more; I will arm my self against it, and never see the person again that was the first occasion of it. Her beauty has a secret charm that presently mov'd me, that enchanted, and doubtless would have been the Sovereign of my heart: I will talk no more of this fatal unknown person, nay, I will not give her the least room in my thoughts.

This resolution which the amorous Prince thought to be strong and solid pleas'd me so exceedingly, that I was about to testify the satisfaction I receiv'd thereby, at which time the Magistrates return'd, and after the usual complements, they inform'd us of the state and condition of their affairs in the Island. Constantine heard them, though very unsettled in his mind; and while his countenance visibly denotes the disturbance of his thoughts, the most considerable of the Dorobèrnians brought us news that the King of the Piës had gain'd a very great Battel; and that upon the entire defeat of the Britains Army he was marching up toward the Metropolis of the Kingdom with sixty thousand men. Nevertheless the Queen prepares to defend her self, in expectation of your assistance, she animates our good King vigorously to bestir himself, and as there is a natural antipathy between the Piës and Britains, and being apprehensive of the cruelty of the war, they have sent forth the best part of the women and unprofitable persons out of Troynovant. In the mean time they labour incessantly in the fortification of the City, Provisions are brought in every day; so that there is nothing omitted that may conduce to the preservation of a place of that importance. Embassadors are also sent away to the King of Ireland, to oblige him to declare for us, who for that he makes great Levies of men, and is passionately in love with the Princess, (replied the Prince, transported with a passion which he could not master) be but as fair as a charming Lady that I have seen, she deserves without doubt to arm all the nations in the world in her defence. All Kings ought to fight for so glorious a reward, and to expect which of them fate will declare most happy, when to render him worthy to enjoy a person so miraculous, it shall establish him the universal Monarch.

He pronounc'd those words with so passionate a gesture, and so earnestly beheld Conosus, for so was the Magistrate call'd, that the Britain appear'd in a manner puzzled what to answer, recollecting himself from that surprize, I easily conjecture, said he, what person it is you mean; but without flattery, or appearing too zealous for our Princess, her Beauty is not inferior to that which you commend. "To justify what you aver, (replied the Prince with a serious countenance, willing to disguise a passion which he could not curb) you are oblig'd to introduce me into the company of that admirable Damsel, that I may be the better acquainted with her charms, that when I come to see the Princess, I may do justice in giving my opinion, whether you be so impartial as you would persuade us you are. It is not very easie to obtain what you desire, replied the Britain, for the person which you request to see, has not been in the Town above these two days, and few people are permitted to visit her: yet I know that such persons as you are, who cross the Seas to our relief, ought to be of the number of her Favourites that pretend the greatest privileges. But, Sir, I shall have more trouble than you imagine, to procure you this small favour; and when you have obtained it, your satisfaction will be very small. Your earnestness, pursued he, smiling, gives me a little suspicion, and if you will credit me, you should carefully shun a visit, which cannot but prove injurious to your repose. That charming Lady which you speak of is extremely to be fear'd, her wit is as extraordinary as her countenance, and in seeing her, you bequeath the rest of your liberty, as there is great likelyhood such a thing may fall out, you will not be over happy. No, Sir, without doubt you would not be so, for whatever rare endowments you possess, how considerable soever your command be, you will find too many and great obstacles in the way of your pretensions.

At these words that little pleas'd him, the Prince blush'd, but willing to conceal those thoughts which he perceiv'd ready to invade his Breast, he laboured to recal into his face some marks of his former insensibility: and by a second endeavour he turn'd the matter in so handsome a manner, and had so much power over the motions of his heart, that he rather seem'd blith and jocund than amorous all the rest of the time that they discours'd together; so that he had no sooner disengag'd himself from the company that inconvenienc'd him, but he abandon'd himself altogether to his turmoiling disquiet; "For what crime, (said he, crossing his Arms upon his Breast, and lifting up his eyes to Heaven) for what crime have I drawn upon me this strange misfortune? Faint-hearted Prince, and unworthy thy illustrious Descent, what is become of thy noble resolution? What Destiny is this of thine? Thou sawest with an indifferent eye the fairest Princesses of the world; the Princess of Great Britain charms more than one Monarch, without giving thee the least curiosity to see her, or so much as to look upon her Picture, and yet the malignity of Fate compels thee to love an unknown person, as soon as ever thou didst but cast thy eyes upon her. Yes, yes, thou lovest her passionately. But, pursued he, after he had ponder'd a while, why shall I not love that admirable person above all others that I have hitherto seen, since I find her more amiable? But, alas! for what cause shall I love her when two great Kingdoms oppose it, if the King my Father have already dispos'd of my affections, and that he has solemnly engag'd them? O Heaven! disperse my irresolutions, manage the motions of my heart, and limit my thoughts. Infinite sighs then issued from his Breast; and the unfortunate Constantine, after he had beheld me with a pensive look, "Ah, Dinocus! that my Soul should be thus cruelly turmoil'd! However, fear nothing, for I remember that I am beholding for my life to the King of Armorica, to you for my education. "My fear is not very great, (replied I with a look as confident as I could fix it) for I am of opinion your passion will forsake your heart as soon as you depart from Dover, or else that the sight of the Princess of Britain will easily vanquish it. Well then, Dinocus, answered he, let us begon with with all speed, and not so much as take notice either of the Town, or of the chief Burgeses, yet I confess, said he, that we ought to visit the Magistrates. "But Sir, said I, ought the curiosities of Dover to stop a Prince that is marching for Troynovant. "I know, said he, that a man may better satisfy his curiosity in that magnificent City than in this Town, nevertheless why may we not see at Dover such things as we cannot find in Troynovant: yet be not suspicious that I mean that person that has dazled me, and whose beauty afflicts us both, though in a different manner: therefore since you are of the same mind, let us visit the chiefest Magistrates of the City, and that with the soonest, to the end we may acquit our selves and come off with the better grace.

After these words forth he went, and I followed him, not having power to contradict his thoughts, though, to say truth, I was very suspicious of his eagerness; and that I saw when he went about to make those visits so exactly, he gave way more to his passion than to his civility, and that he only desired to visit those old Burgeses, out of hopes to meet at some of their Houses with this fair unknown person. To that purpose, in the first place we gave Bonofus a visit: and Constantine was very pleasingly surpris'd to see over the door the same Balcony, where he had seen the Virgin that had enchanted him. The Doverness was not at home, and therefore I perswaded Viridonix to make some other visits, "But, (he replied, "not without being a little nettled) methinks, said he, it behoves us to pay our first respects to the chief Magistrates in the first place. We came with the same intent, but since Bonofus is gone forth, we may ———— We may, said he, go into his House, and stay till he comes. It is no unuseful thing to desire to see a fine House.

He pronounc'd those words with so much earnestness, so that finding he was resolv'd to follow his own humour, we went in. Hardly were we come into the Chamber into which they carried us, but Constantine ran very hastily toward the fatal Balcony. He seem'd to change colour immediately; for though the passionate Prince found himself in a place whence he had seen so many charms of Beauty dart their lustre, he was troubled however that he could not there find the admirable person that reign'd in his heart; and though he were not able to hide the visible effects of his passion, yet being willing to conceal his eagerness, he cast his eyes upon the Harbour, and upon the Sea, and praised the beauty of the prospect; but all this while his disquiet perplex'd him in such a manner, that he stay'd not long to behold it, but on the contrary he return'd to his company, went from Apartment to Apartment, and at length understanding that Bonofus had a very fine Garden, he desired to see that. The door was lock'd, and one of the servants that kept the Key did not seem very willing to open it. Constantine was no sooner enter'd, but (as he inform'd me afterwards) he felt an extraordinary beating of his heart; and being curious to see a Statue that he had in his eyes, he went to the end of an Alley, evidently conducted by his prevailing passion, there was he so strangely seiz'd with a sudden fear, without knowing the cause, at what time he found himself near a very fine green Arbour, without having any way interrupted the company that was in it: he knew by their voices that they were women, and therefore in despite of the trouble that perplex'd his Soul, he found in himself such a strong curiosity, that he was constrain'd to lay his ear to their discourse: he had not listen'd long but he had heard the person that spoke continue her speech after this manner, Do not increase my shame, I must confess that I have been surpris'd, that I have blush'd, and perhaps it is not without reason that thou accusest me to have sigh'd.

Constantine charm'd with the sound of that voice, and spurr'd on by an Imperious Motion, softly puts aside the little Branches to make a passage for his sight, and there discovers the divine stranger; he was thereupon so transported with love and joy, that he could hardly contain himself, nor stand to wait till a young Virgin that was with her made her an answer in these words, For Heaven's sake, Madam, still retain the same liberty, confess that you would not be deceiv'd, and that you never had sigh'd if ———— Confess rather, (said the admirable Beauty, interrupting her) that thou art not very wise at this time, and that I should be as imprudent as thou, should I stand to hear thee any longer.

Concluding those words, she rose and went forth so suddenly, and with that nimbleness, that Viridonix had neither time, nor so much as a thought to retire, so that at the very time that she came forth, they saw one another, and stopp'd full in one anothers way, and if the enamour'd Prince stood like one that were amazed, the incomparable Lady that had enchanted him, look'd upon him with no less surprise. They both blush'd, and in their eyes, partaking both of love and fear, might have been seen variety of passions. Constantine at length broke silence, and with a trembling utterance, I see, Madam, (with all submission said he) that I ought not to have enter'd into this Garden, and that I have to no purpose interrupted the retirement which you seek for your own satisfaction; but I am sensible of my error, and should be much more afflicted if I thought you would not be so kind as to attribute my fault rather to the indiscretion of a young man than to the curiosity of a stranger who was willing to see all that was remarkable in the Town, as he pass'd through, and which he is about to leave, if ———— He could not conclude, such was the anguish of his mind, when the fair person opening her lips, That desire being natural, said she, I am so far from complaining thereof, that I will give you the opportunity to satisfy your self with more freedom, by departing out of a place where my presence may put any constraint upon you.

After those words, she made her Honours to my Master, and walking toward the House she renewed a mortal grief in the amorous Prince: Ah, Madam! cry'd he, when she was gone a good distance off, is this the means you give me to satisfy a curiosity that you have not in the least condemn'd? What, Madam, do you forsake an unfortunate person, and leaving him only to behold a bare walk, do you deprive him of the sight of all that is only fair upon the earth?

Then

Then it was that he found himself seized upon by several violent passions, and coming again where I stay'd for him, he oblig'd me to return to the House, hoping there without doubt to find some opportunity to have another view of the person that reigned in his heart: but as he lost his hopes upon the return of Bonofus, he complemented the Magistrate in few words, and with very much disturbance; and having made all his other visits in the same manner, he retired to his Lodging with a double augmentation of his love. At first he walk'd about the Chamber without speaking a word, but at length looking upon me with a pensive melancholy in his eyes, Dinocus, said he, that the grandeur of my Birth should prove so fatal! That I should now be content that I were not the Son of a King; and that I cannot absolutely dispose of the actions of my life! With that he turn'd away without expecting an answer, and continuing his large steps, But why, said he, must I be miserable because I am a Prince? Ah! no, no, Constantine, renounce thy Dignity, if that oppose thy happiness; and if in quitting a Throne thou canst melt the heart of that admirable person that reigns in thine, abandon, abandon all thy claims and pretensions. Too happy now to possess a beauty so divine, abandon without murmuring both Britains, and those vast hopes that kindle beat and courage in thy Breast. But why should I quit that which may facilitate my design, why should I cease to be Constantine, if Viridonix must find any obstruction? Let us be Constantine, let us continue to be a Prince; and for the hopes of a Crown let us break through all those difficulties which the merit of Viridonix cannot overcome: let us prostrate our selves at the feet of our unknown Beauty, declare our real quality, let us have for her all the respect that Viridonix ought to have; and let us promise her all that Constantine can make good. But, vain Prince, canst thou act as Constantine without the ruine of all thy designs? Will they endure in this Island, that a Subject of Gratian should advance her self in a heart where the Princess his Daughter ought to reign? And will they not presently remove out of the way a Beauty, the sight whereof will prove so disadvantageous to the union of both Britains, as it is really necessary for thy repose? What course wilt thou then take, unfortunate Prince, if neither Constantine, nor Viridonix can be happy! Alas! I cannot tell precisely what to do.

After those words he came to himself, and not giving me time to speak, he address'd himself to me after this manner, "I believe you approve not my passion, said he, if it be so Dinocus, I complain as I was to have complain'd when I condemn'd it; do but consider the power of those charms that caused it, and do not lightly condemn——" I do "not lightly condemn your passion, (said I impatiently interrupting him) But, Sir, I "I wish it had some other object, and that it were more worthy of that Royal heart where "in it reigns.

Thus I eagerly continued a discourse that I thought profitable for my Master, making use of all the authority which my care in his education could make me bold to use, and laying before him that we had no time to lose, but that it was absolutely necessary for us to leave Dover. The passionate Viridonix finding in the extremity of his grief that I spoke reason, and his love being more apt to infuse into him a more noble courage than a superfluous lamentation: "Well then, said he, Dinocus, since it must be so, I will be gone, on this "condition that I may suddenly return; I will go offer my Arms and my life to King Gratian, and if the power of a cruel destiny altogether opposes my intentions, my Sword, "this Sword which I wear shall break through those obstacles that Bonofus would have me "apprehend, and make them easie.

That resolution to be gone made me not a little glad, and for fear the amorous Prince should change his mind, I got under Sail with all the expedition I could. But we did not rejoyne that part of the Navy which Constantine would have divided, because he still desired more vehemently than ever to conceal himself; to which purpose he chose a nimble Vessel; and such as he could trust; and having entreated me to make some excuse for his departure, he left us notwithstanding all the arguments that I could possibly urge: so that not being able to prevail, I resolv'd to second his resolution, and caused it to be spread abroad, that the Prince upon some private design was minded to go for Troynovant, there to see the Princess without being known himself. The report was easily believ'd, and we pursued our Voyage, and we had no sooner landed our men at the mouth of the Thames in the Country of Essex, but we march'd in very good order directly toward Cambridge, where the Enemy lay encamped; there was at that time a cessation of Arms for ten days, and thereupon I went to Troynovant to give the King an account of all that concern'd the success that we brought. The King receiv'd me with all kindness, and the Queen testified her acknowledgment of the King of Armorica's friendship, with more vigour, and a more lofty spirit. And because at that time she managed the Government, and that the credit which you are to give to my Story depends much upon the knowledge of her humour, it will be necessary

necessary for me to describe her, after I have spoken a word or two of the King her Husband. The Prince was one of those persons of whom there is little noise made, when they are but of mean spirits: and though he were accused of cruelty, certain it is that his inclinations were rather virtuous than evil: his endowments were but ordinary, for he had a certain softness that hindered him every foot from determining what resolution to take, but his humour being apt to receive whatever thoughts were infused into him, he then only acted as the Queen his wife mov'd and guided him. She it is then of whom I am to make a description: Loerinia, for so you know that manly woman was call'd, was descended from an illustrious House to which boldness and courage were natural, and which had some pretences to the Sovereign Dignity, though never a jot the more legal, because they were supported by courage and magnanimity. Her face was very fair, her proportion large, her eyes quick and piercing, with an active cunning, and dissembling wit. Her humour was complaisant, and full of flattery when she found it for her purpose; but when she acted according to her own freedom, her looks were bold and confident, her countenance settled and fierce, her language imperious, and her gait was very stately: her carriage was very turbulent; she was soon weary of every thing, she despised what she enjoyed, and ardently coveted whatever was in the possession of others. Though she had nothing to trouble her mind, yet was her mind continually troubled: and love, which oftentimes became Master of her heart, rather incited her to violent precipitations, than to that obliging tenderness, which flows from those persons that are of a more soft and delicate temper. Loerinia being such an one as I describe, was not above six and twenty years of age, and few persons in the world lov'd the noise and tumult of a great Court better than she did. I will not make you a third description, by relating to you the beauty of the most admirable Octavia, only I must tell you that she was not then at Troynovant, when I request-ed to be introduc'd into her Apartment to make my complements to her: Said the Queen, She is not in the City, for as I love her as if I were her own Mother, I sent her away about ten days ago; I have too great a desire to preserve her for the Prince of Armorica, than that she should be under the Guard of sixty thousand men who are coming to our succour, under the command of a King who pretends to be her admirer. And for my self I have firmly resolv'd rather to bury my self under the ruines of Troynovant, than to fail of my word to the Prince. And now, Dinocus, could I soon disengage my self of my promise; for upon the confidence of the succour which you bring, I could recal Octavia to the City, and then the universal joy of our Court for your assistance would give me an opportunity to complete the marriage so much long'd for, and thereby to unite the two Nations by the strict alliance between their two Royal Families.

I was deeply sensible of this obliging and generous language, that made me apprehend more injustice than before in my Master's passion. They augmented in such a manner the indignation that I had against it, that without any more to do I resolv'd to break the neck of such a fantastical affection, and so unworthy the illustrious Constantine: I had no sooner return'd the Queen thanks with all the eloquence that I could summon together, but I went in all haste to the Army, where the Prince was already arriv'd without being openly known. However, he did not omit to take care for all things; he went with the principal Officers to view the Soldiers, their Arms, their Horses and their Ammunition; and the vigour of his wit giving him that knowledge that we acquire by long experience, at the second time of his taking command upon him, he perform'd all the offices of a great Captain. It was not without great satisfaction that I found him in an employment so worthy of himself; and as I was about to applaud him, No, no, Dinocus, said he, sighing, I deserve not yet that approbation which you are about to give me; for though I should continually keep my self in exercise to expel the charming Idea that displeases you, I declare to you that I know not how to accomplish my desires, for it spreads it self through the whole extent of my imagination. Alas! Dinocus, that Idea is always before my eyes, continually in my mind, and controuls my heart with Sovereign power, so that when I encounter it with the love of Glory, when I assault it with all the weapons that my ambition can furnish me with, all my endeavours prove in vain. That proud and lovely resemblance remains always victorious, and makes me repent of my resolution as of some horrible attempt. Instead of repenting, Sir, said I, resist it, and for Heaven's sake more strongly oppose a passion that cannot but do you an eternal injury. To the weapons which you have hitherto without success made use of, add with better fortune those of acknowledgment: you are engaged to the Queen of Great Britain for new obligations, she is willing to perish for your interests, at a time when her life is exposed to danger, she takes all the care imaginable to preserve the Princess for you.

As I was thus aggravating as much as I could the generous proceeding of Loerinia, to render him more deeply sensible of her favour: Ab, Dinocus! answered the Prince, do not argument my troubles, by setting before my eyes the enormity of my ingratitude. I know my self to be guilty, I know I have committed an offence for which you prudently reprove me. But at the same time I feel an imperious power, that compels me to commit that crime, and which environs it with so much lustre, and shines about it with so pure and glorious a brightness, that my dazzled Eyes can see nothing, to be compared with so charming a crime. In short, Dinocus, I find that I am unjust, that I do not see things as you do, that I do not love a fair Princess that I ought to adore, and that I prefer an unknown person, that I know not how to advance to the Throne, if I obey that will which ought to regulate mine. But however I must always love that unknown person, a superiour fate has decreed it, an absolute power commands me: yet if I must part with my blood to satisfy Octavia, and to repair the injury I have done her; I will pour it forth to the very last drop: For I shall be always more ready to sacrifice my life, to the interest of that fair Princess, than to offer to her charms a heart that is not my own.

The innocent Constantine pursued this discourse in such passionate language, that I found my heart rather inclin'd to bewail his misfortune, than to aggravate as I was resolv'd, the dangerous consequences of an Engagement, that already rendred him so unhappy. Not that he neglected in the least, to take care of every thing that concern'd the Army, nor but that at the same time he had conceived a cruel hatred against the King of the Picts: For besides that he looked upon him, as a Prince that went about to supplant him; he had besides a certain Antipathy against him, of which he knew not the cause. This motion of Antipathy, rendred him more fierce and disdainful, and the contempt of a life so miserable, being joyned to the Grandeur of his Courage, made him appear as if he had something supernatural in his deportment, and his Actions. Never was more of beauty seen in a youthful Warriour, nor an aspect more Majestick and Lofly. His Eye sparkled with a fire that shewed the activity of his Temper: so that his noble impatience of coming to fight, transported him in such a manner, that he resolv'd to march directly toward the Enemy, so soon as the Souldiers had refreshed themselves. I durst not oppose my self to his resolution, seeing that he was my Master, and powerfully commanded whatever he pleased. On the contrary I commended it to the General of the Britains, of whom it will be necessary for me to tell you by the way, that Geronces, so was that Britain called, had been rais'd to the most weighty commands by the favour of Loconia, being so devoted to the interest of that fierce Princess, that he was ready to undertake any thing for her service. So brave a person was overjoyed to meet the Picts; to which purpose we kept along the side of the Hill, that divides Essex from the City of Cambridge, and came to encamp in sight of Ely, between two pleasing Rivers that wash the feet of her Walls.

The Army of Gratian and ours, might make about fifty thousand men, and that of the Enemy was about sixty thousand: Constantine took a thousand horse to command himself, and we had no sooner made choice of our ground, and ranged the Army in good array, but he appeared at the head of his own men, with an enchanting grace: He was most nobly mounted, and magnificently Arm'd, his helmet being covered with several fair Plumes of Carnation and white Feathers. Immediately he exhorted his men in a few words, and lifting up the Viser of his Helmet, he spake to them the following speech with a soldier-like Aspect, and a short and pithy Eloquence.

I deny my name and renounce my dignity to be your Companion, rather than your Prince in this great Battel, and to fight with more equality among you: shew your selves worthy of what you see me do, and the precedency which I give you before the rest of the Army. Remember your selves that I shall be a witness of your valour, that you are Britains and that you fight against the Picts. They are your natural Enemies, and come from their cold Countries to rend from you the command, of a flourishing Monarchy under a more temperate Climate. It beboves them to fight and to overcome, you have nothing to do but to follow me to a certain Victory, you have nothing to do but to follow my example, to purchase the honour of a Triumph. After all this, require of me no more superfluous words, when I demand of you brave and heroick deeds.

He had no sooner concluded these words, but he embrac'd the Principal Officers, calling them by their Names: He promised the Horsemen in general fair Rewards, and immediately he flew like lightning upon the Enemy. His deadly spear buried it self in the bodies of all those that withstood the force thereof: And the impatient Prince had no sooner satisfied himself, with the ponderous effects of that weapon, but he threw it away to make use of another, that was more fit to second the Activity of his valour. He drew a stubborn sword the same that had been so fatal to the Neutrians, and which afterwards made the Western Empire tremble, and Arm'd with that terrible weapon he perform'd those deeds, that I cannot cannot tell how to describe, and which deserves Eternal memory. He overturn'd whatever stood in his way, he overthrew horse and man, and having opened a way with the point of his Sword, to the most illustrious of all his Enemies, he cried him with a loud cry: King of the Picts, cried he, 'Tis against such an Enemy as my self that you may turn your weapon with Honour. Whoever thou art, (replied the fiery King, flaming with rage) that seekest to dye by my hand, receive the fatal effect of thy wishes.

He followed these haughty menaces with a furious blow, but Viridonix warded it with an admirable strength, and his valour being augmented by the furious reply of his Enemy, diffused a Heroick heat through every vein. Transported with this heat he threw himself upon the King of the Picts, and taking him up in his invincible Arms, he drew him from the pommel of his Saddle, with a strength more than Humane, and threw him at his horses feet. When he was down he commanded a Brittilsh Officer to take care of him, and flung himself into the thickest of the Picts with a fresh vigour: but his fury having carried him too far, he was born away with the multitude of those, that fled as with the violence of a rapid Torrent. The Britains that were in love with his vertue, so soon as they saw him out of sight, made a hideous noise of despair, insomuch as the report ran through the Army, that Constantine had fought there in person, and that after he had overcome the King of the Picts, he was taken by the Enemy. Our forces redoubled their courage, and running to rescue as well their illustrious Prince, as Viridonix, who was likewise said to be among the Picts; they made a most terrible slaughter, that in less than a quarter of an hour we were Masters of the field, and above five thousand Prisoners, among which was the King himself. The ground was covered with above forty thousand of the Enemies, who were slain in that remarkable battel. The rest fled in disorder, leaving a glorious victory to the Britains with the loss of only six thousand men: only their sorrow was so great for the loss of their Prince, and the pretended Viridonix, that they seem'd rather to mourn than to be revived, with that noble Spirit and Metal, that usually attends a field of Triumph.

The End of the First Book of the Eighth Part.

PHARAMOND.

BOOK II.

Though our victory were of great importance and very compleat, and though I received not so much as one wound in so famous a battel; However I was in a most terrible Agony, to see my self deprived of my Master's company, especially when I called to mind that my complaisance, had contributed to his Misfortune, in seconding the fervent humour of his youth. Insomuch that the orders which I gave for burying the dead, and looking after the wounded were very confusedly given, my ears being all employed in sending and seeking after the illustrious Constantine. I ran my self to hear news of him, stopping the fugitive Picts; but when I despair'd to find him and that it began to grow dark, I retreated full of deadly sorrow. I sent away my people, walk'd alone by my self insupportably disturb'd ; but while I abandon'd my soul to despair, an officer of the Gauls enter'd, and presented me the young Knight or rather the generous Son of Aldroec. The Prince ran to me and embraced me, before I hardly knew who he was, not being able to believe my eyes, so preposited with the sad thoughts of his loss. I no sooner beheld him, but I was transported with a joy which I am not able to express, but instead of losing time in talk, I caused his Arms to be taken off, and then putting him to bed order'd his wounds to be search'd. I was far better satisfied when I found, that he had but one or two and those very slight. They had scarcely made an end of their first dressing, when Constantine called me, and beholding me with some kind of trouble ; Dinocus, said he, I have performed a good part of what I intended, I have fought with success against the King of the Picts, I have been contributory to help the Britains to a noble victory, and perhaps I have obtained some honour by the battle. But I have done nothing all this while, if we cannot yet disguise the Prince of Armorica, and discover no other person than Viridonix. What, Sir, said I, are you not yet satisfied? Has not the design which you had to fight like a private Knight, been more successful in the Event than we expected, and will you adventure into new dangers when there remains nothing for you to do, but to bear the shouts and acclamations of the people, and to receive from Gratian and Locrina the testimonies of a just Recognizance. As for the Princess I speak not a word of her, for fear of renewing your anguish : only I must tell you after my having had all this complaisance for you, in assisting you to conceal your self, the cause whereof has made me tremble a thousand times, I shall never any more give way to anything, that may be in the least injurious to your honour. Though there were no person in the Army that could discover you, though I were not obliged to give an account to your Father, of his only and most renowned Son ; yet I love you so well (permit me to speak it) as to make it my earnest desire that you would lead a publick life, worthy the degree wherein by the order of heaven you were born. “ Ah ! Dinocus, said he sighing, if you love me as you profess, you will assist me to avoid the greatest misfortune of my life. I do not desire you to approve the violent passion that prevails in my soul : I desire you not to take pains to make me happy : That would be too much, Dinocus, and too much in vain to labour for a Prince, whom destiny resolves to persecute : But is there no way in the world for me, by your means to go under the name of Viridonix, for six or seven days only. I will see the Princess, perhaps I shall love her ; yet if her beauty cannot expel from my heart, the Idea which I there preserve so dearly, yet my insensibility of Oſtavia's love, shall never create a subject for report : Viridonix may depart from Troynovant without any notice taken and afterwards consult with you how to resume, the person of the Armorican Prince. He pronounc'd these words with such a wounding look, and I found his request so reasonable, that notwithstanding my resolution never to hearken any more, to any farther requests of his of that nature, I could not be obstinate in refusing what he demanded : However I did not presently give my consent, but after I had ponder'd upon it for some time ; “ Sir, said I, very pensively, have you not some other design conceal'd, that rather concerns your unknown Mistress than the Princess of great Britain ? “ I confess, (said he, with that sweetness and frankness that quite overcame me) that I should be very willing to see that admirable Virgin, that has touched my heart, but that I am in good hopes of meeting with her at Troynovant. I know not how to call to mind, the charming Air that is spread through all her face, and over all her person, without perswading my self but that she belongs to the Court : and though that conjecture be not very certain, may I not have reason to believe, that the publick festivals and solemnities, may draw so celebrated a beauty thither ? Let not this confession scare you, rather believe that that unknown Lady will not long prevail in my heart, against the lightning of the Princess Oſtavia's Eyes, or that her charms will be able to hold out against a Beauty, whose Lustre will not be a little augmented by the magnificence of her Apparel, and the pomp of a most sumptuous and most Royal Court. After all this will you refuse to serve me in a design, which is conformable to your intention, and which you ought to encourage me in : Can you Dinocus, Ah ! can you see me languish in a bed, having in your hands the means to raise me thence ? “ But, Sir, said I, how can you remain in the Court of Troynovant without being discovered ? “ I agree with you, replied he, that I cannot continue long in that private condition, but by reason the report runs that I am a Prisoner with the Picts, since I came hither for fear of being descryed, and that there are but three or four faithful servants that know my mind, what should hinder but that I may remain, some days at Troynovant without being known ? But what must I write to the two Kings, said I, interrupting him. We will give an exact account said he, to the King of Armorica, and if you leave out the passion of my love, I give you liberty to tell him all other things beside, even to the very design which I have to conceal

“ my self, which he will take for no other than a piece of gallantry. We will take another “ course with the King of the Britains, and as we do not owe the same obedience to him,
 “ and for that he will also be prepossessed, by the report that is spread abroad of my imprison“ ment, it will be easie for you to free him from the sorrow which he may conceive upon the “ news thereof, by writing to him without any prejudice to my intentions, that he should “ not be troubled in the least. That you will answer for me that I have received but two “ slight wounds, that I am in a place of security under another name, and that the people “ under whose care I am, know me, are faithful, and will not let me come to Troynovant, “ till I have perfectly recovered my health.

In short, Madam, Constantine made out the business so plausibly, and urg'd the probability thereof with so many entreaties and prayers not to be denied, that I gave way, and dispatch'd several Posts to the two Kings, with such an account of things as I saw convenient. In the mean time we so well forwarded our cares for his recovery, and to hasten him to Troynovant, that in a few days he left his Bed. At the same time Geronces, who was slightly wounded as well as Constantine, began to grow well, having received Letters from the King and Queen of Great Britain, as well as my self. The answer which they sent me was very obliging, wherein they return'd me many thanks, and invited me to come to the Court, testifying moreover their great sorrow for the imprisonment of the Prince of Ar-morica, and Viridonix the Gaul. The Officer that brought me the Letters told me, that there was nothing more discoursed of than the valour of those two famous Soldiers; and that their names had the honour to be in the mouths of a thousand fair Ladies, that had so often sigh'd before at the approach of their numerous Enemies. He inform'd me likewise that there was nothing but rejoicing and triumphs at Troynovant, that the Ladies who quitted the City return'd every day, bringing along with them all those delights and pastimes that together with their persons had so lately absented themselves; and that there was nothing talk'd of but publick Festivals and Divertisements. Constantine's heart leap'd at the news of the Ladies return, redoubling the vehemency of those longing desires that before possess'd it.

As for my self and Geronces; whom I often visited, and whom I found very much disturbed, he manifesting an earnest heat also to go to the Court of Albion, we resolv'd to set forward together, and to leave the Armies under the care of our Lieutenant Generals. The Prince, who was unwilling to be discovered, went by himself, and indeed before us, though we did not stay long behind him. As we were entring into Troynovant we saw Constantine in ordinary habit upon the Bank of the Thames, got among a great crowd that were standing to see a Boat full of women put into the Stairs. Geronces, who had never beheld Constantine but in his melancholy fits, he was very much pleas'd the first time he saw him, and taking him for a person who did not aspire very high, not having had any occasion to be jealous of his valour, found in himself nothing but motions of acknowledgment and kindness toward him, and only remembred the assistance which he had given him in the Battel. Thereupon he rode to the Gauls, while I followed him, whereupon the people retired out of respect, we did alight, and went toward Constantine, who immediately met us, not without some signs of a discontented mind. We testified to him our joy to meet him so happily at Troynovant, especially at such a time when we thought him to be a Prisoner among the Picts, as well as the Prince of Armorica. And Geronces, to oblige a stranger, who had so great a courage, but, as he thought, no great ambition, notwithstanding his natural moroseness, he address'd his speech to him in this manner, Valiant Knight, said he, 'tis only among the Picts that Viridonix should conceal himself, but now since that by his prudence, and the help of ordinary habit he has had the good fortune to escape, and come hither, 'tis all the reason in the world that he should make himself known according to his quality, and shew himself to a Court that has such an esteem and acknowledgment for his noble Actions.
 As for my self, who am particularly engag'd to your valour, I offer you in my own house all accommodations necessary for a Knight who is a stranger, who has made an escape from my Enemies, and to whom I am beholding for my life.

To this civility the Prince return'd as much; but having accepted of nothing, At least, said Geronces, admit that no other person but my self may bring you to kiss the King and Queen's hands: for besides that Dinocus belongs not to our Court, he is so well known for your ancient friend, that he may easily yield me that advantage: of which I can make use with less reserv'dness when I speak in your praise.

He seconded his request with so much reason, that he overcame the Prince's reluctancy, and obtain'd his consent: so that that very day he carried Constantine to kiss Gratian's hand;
 and that good King having received the Prince of Armorica, as if he had been only Viridonix, shew'd

shewed him all the marks of esteem and obligation that could be expected from a grateful Prince. But the civilities of Loctrinia went a little farther, for they seem'd to be much more obliging; and if the modest Prince took no notice that they exceeded the bounds which a fair and great Queen ought to have prescribed her self, Geronces and I that were present, did very much observe it. Besides the handsome aspect and carriage which naturally grac'd Viridonix, the honour which he had won still got before him, and prepar'd all hearts to his advantage, so that they easily yielded to the motions of admiration and affection, which his presence augmented in those that were least sensible. But Loctrinia was too passionate, not to be touch'd with the Grandeur of his Air, and that charming grace which the law so admirable in all his person, and her humour was too great an enemy to reserv'dness, to put her to the trouble of dissembling her thoughts; she blush'd as soon as she cast her eyes upon Constantine's face, she look'd upon him with that earnestness as manifested her astonishment, and having at the same time, and with equal surprize beheld the beauty of the surprize; Valiant Viridonix, said she, by the assistance of your courage we triumph over the Picts: but if you were not content with that victory, such a Knight as your self should not have extended his conquests even to our Court, over enemies less terrible than those that you have vanquish'd in the Field. I have contributed no otherwise, replyed he, to the victory over your enemies than by my Sword, which the meanest of your Subjects might have done: but, Madam, if my good fortune afforded me any particular advantage, by seconding my earnest zeal for the service of your Majesty, I must lose it again without doubt, by assailing those enemies whose eyes are certainly more formidable than all the weapons of our enemies.

At those words the memory of his unknown Mistress causing him to sigh, the Queen blush'd, and I observed that Geronces seem'd to be ashamed, and cast down his eyes. We our selves beheld her without speaking a word; and as every one of us was about to find the cause of such a sudden alteration, the King enter'd, with an intention to tell us some news that he had newly receiv'd. Hardly had he began to speak, but the impatient Loctrinia interrupting him, Either I am very much deceiv'd, said she, with a kind of distaste, or else your earnestness threatens us with a long story: but I beseech you take a better opportunity, and suffer me at this time to testify to our valiant preserver the acknowledgiment of those weighty services which he has done us. But if you think loss of time will prejudice the business which you would communicate, tell it to Dinoc and Geronces, but let me alone to shew Viridonix the high opinion which I have of his noble deeds.

Concluding those words without expecting any answer, she retired to the side of the Bed, and causing the Prince to stand near her, she beheld him with those looks that denoted a violent passion; Viridonix, said she, fame hath loudly reported your renown, and the people of Troynovant have publish'd your praises, but your only presence tells us more than a thousand mouths can utter. You know, Madam, said Constantine very modestly, that fame many times makes things greater than they are. And if your Subjects have spoken to my advantage, it was meerly because they would give to a stranger that fought in their behalf those honours which they believ'd not due to the Natives, who were oblig'd to expose their lives for the defence of their Country.

The Queen beholding then with more freedom the Prince's countenance, felt the arrow peirce more deeply into her heart, that already had wounded it deep enough. So that her humour and her quality giving her greater liberty than ordinary persons of her Sex are wont to take, she began her discourse more obligingly than before, and return'd Constantine an answer in these words, Your modesty, Viridonix, encreases a merit which you labour to eclipse, and confirms me in the resolution I had to keep you in this Court, and to offer you my protection: yes, Viridonix, I esteem you so well as to confess it with that freedom which is usual with me, that my purpose is to give you a sufficient maintenance, and that my heart (of which you have perhaps some talk already) is capable to undertake enough to advance your fortune perhaps beyond your hopes, I say no more but leave you with the King, and do you consider of what I have promised you, while I make it my business to accomplish what I intend.

And with that, casting yet a more obliging and passionate look upon Constantine, she went into her Closet, and the Prince astonish'd and full of meditation, return'd to the King, who was not wanting to repeat what he had already said to us concerning the news: Viridonix, said he, your valour has turn'd the tempest upon the Picts, with which they threatened us; and the King of Ireland, who made those powerful Levies but to raine that Kingdom which the loss of the Battel should render weakest, has declared war against our Enemies, and is about to invade them with a considerable Army. The King of the Picts, enraged at this foul play, offers me very advantageous conditions; and if the Queen be of that mind we will treat with him, to the end he may return to the defence of his people; with such an assistance they will better resist

a Neighbour whose growing power is to be fear'd; and while they with equal force assault one another, we will sit still, after the great success you have obtain'd for us. But when I see to them the best part of your good fortune, replied the Prince, for Heaven that declares it self most commonly for the justest cause, redoubled the strength of that Arm that fought in your quarrel. But, Sir, I beseech you to be just to the end, and since you have a respect to the Royal Dignity, and the prayers of an unfortunate Prince, pursue no longer a war of which your enemies themselves humbly beg a final end. I am very gald, replied the King as he was going away, that you are of my opinion, and that a Knight who may promise himself so many advantages from opportunities to exercise his valour, has so great a kindness for my people, as to prefer their peace before his own honour.

Constantine, Gerences, and I followed Gratian, and no sooner had we left him, but the Prince retired to an Apartment, which was appointed for him in the Court. There after he had devoted his first thoughts, to the most incomparable unknown Lady, he ponder'd very melancholily upon Loconia's obliging words, and soon apprehended the consequences, and whether he suspected a good part of the truth, or whether he attributed the civilities of the Queen, to a pure acknowledgment, he found himself entangled after a strange manner, Loconia's passion menaced his with a thousand obstructions. On the other side the mark of her Friendship, rendred him so much the more unhappy, by how much they made him the more ingratul: For, said he at length, I renounce Loconia's alliance, and though she should offer me with the Crown of Great Britain, that of the whole world, though Gratian, should give me the possession of the Princess his daughter, and that She were the most charming beauty in the whole world, the most exact piece of workmanship, that ever Heaven adorn'd the world withal; I will never forsake that incomparable person whom I love, and whom I will love to the last moment of my life.

The Amorous Prince then recalling to his mind, all those beauties which he had observ'd in his unknown Mistress, the fire of her eyes, the luitre of her complexion, and all these inexpressible charms that reign'd in all the lineaments of her face, and from those pleasing imaginations, passing farther to a desire to have another sight of that wonderful Virgin, to that end fought in his mind a plausible pretence to leave Troynovant, before he came to be discovered, foreseeing very well that he could not pass any long time for an ordinary Knight, what diligence soever he could use, to avoid meeting with those persons that might know him. His love making all things feasible, he resolv'd with all speed to go for Dover, and the next morning as I was in his chamber, while he was rising, he went about to persuade me to approve his design: but he had no sooner began to open his lips to that effect, when several of the most considerable Britains enter'd his Chamber, drawn thither no doubt by their apprehension, of his growing into favour, and after some discourse full of fair protestations, which Courtiers well know how to make, their complements ended in news, which is a thing very usual. They told him how the Queen was somewhat indispos'd, and that the Princess being on her return, would be in town the next day. Whereupon Viridonix being surpris'd he knew not why, with those two things that they inform'd him, perceived that his heart was strangely mov'd without being able to divine the cause. He enquired into the particulars therefore of what they related to him, either to be better inform'd or else to conceal his surpris, at what time a Page came from Loconia, who told him in very respectful language, that the Queen had sent for him about very urgent Business. Constantine immediately obeyed the commands of the Queen of Albion, and the greatest part of the Britains following, they made a stop in a great Antichamber belonging to the Queen's Apartment, while he alone went into her Chamber. Loconia sitting under a magnificent Canopy, and leaning negligently upon a Table, received the Prince with all civility, and after she had very stedfastly beheld him; Viridonix, said she, resolve me one doubt which extremely much perplexes me, and tell me whether you never were at this Court before: I fancy that I have already seen you, for I still carry in my memory a confus'd Idea of your countenance. It is most certain, Madam, replied Constantine, that I never before was in Troynovant, and that yesterday was the first time, that ever I had the honour to see your Majesty. If that be true (said she, after she had made a little pause) your birth is most illustrious, and you are some Prince, among Princes not the meanest. At these surprisng words Viridonix blush'd, and that alteration of his countenance confirm'd the suspicion of the Queen: Assure your self, said she, my intention is not to draw from you any thing, which you have a mind so conceal: For I can resolve my self, without having any need of your confession.

She said no more, but leaving my Matter in great haste, after she had desired him to stay in the Chamber, she went forth and did not return till about a quarter of an hour after. But coming back she manifested her Astonishment, and her perplexity to Viridonix, and giving the full reins to her humour, " Prince, said she, I come to be inform'd of a truth which I would willingly understand; for I find it very strange, that the Son of the King of Ar-morica, that our beloved Constantine should come to our Court under a borrowed name. " Not that it is possible for me to believe that such a disguise can be for any offence committed, you noble Actions, and a certain inclination that I find in my self to interpret all things to your advantage, sufficiently protect you from any such suspicion. But after all this, have you so little respect for us, or do you love Octavia so violently, that you are unwilling to appear what you are in a City where she is not?

Constantine extremely surpris'd, stood in a kind of an amaze for some time, not knowing what answer to make, but at length recovering himself, It is not possible for me, Madam, said he, to fail in my respect to your Majesty, nor to give that testimony of my love which you speak of, to a Princess whom I never saw? And if those persons that declar'd to you that I was Constantine, would have spoken sincerely, they might have also inform'd you that it was an impetuosity of youth only that made me take upon me the name of Viridonix, to the end I might act in the Army, at my first undertaking feats of war with less wariness and circumspection than was necessary for the Heir of a King. " There is no person has betrayed you, replied the Queen, nor have I understood this secret of yours otherwise than by looking among the Pourtraictures of several Emperours, of all the Kings in Europe, and the most considerable persons who are descended from them, all which we have in a certain Gallery not far distant. I wish'd above a hundred times, in going to inform my self, that you had been Marcomire, Sunnon, Balamir, or any other whom I might have fix'd to his advantage in this Island, but my misfortune will have it that you should be Constantine, that is to say, that very Prince, whom of all the Princes in the world, I would not have had you to have been; I could not suffer my self to make a moment's doubt, and I hated the Painter immediately for having been so happy with his Pencil. Nay, I have been displeas'd at your disguise, that has contributed to surpris'e my heart, and I have felt a certain kind of instigation against the Princess, which may not be perhaps altogether exempt from jealousy: Prince, I have told you too much, but the force of my passion carries me beyond the common rules of my Sex, as my Dignity advances me above the ordinary rank of women, and I would give you evident proofs of my love, would you but continue always Viridonix for me, and not again become Constantine for Octavia.

The Prince was so confounded, that he neither could return any answer, nor so much as look upon Loctrinia, when the courageous Queen resuming the discourse, " Speak, explain your self, said she, are you so dazled with the Crown which is promis'd you, (which if I please, I can easily deprive you of) to tie your self absolutely to a person, because in all likelyhood she is to be Heiress that must enjoy it. Constantine press'd by by these last words, " I have already told you, Madam, said he, that I never saw the Princess, and for that reason can easily preserve my pretences for another, if it be not your will that I should aspire to the Daughter of a great Monarch.

He uttered these words with such a gesture, that easily made it appear that he spoke what he really thought: and yet though his heart was possess'd by the Idea of that fair Mistress whom he only lov'd, however it was not without a signal grief that he renounc'd his ambition to reign over Great Britain, and the honour of enjoying a transcendent Lady, that was to put the Scepter into his hand. Nevertheless Loctrinia thereby thought her anguish somewhat appeas'd, for imagining from thence that Constantine's heart was at liberty, they went away very well satisfied the one from the other. The Prince believing he should find less obstruction in his love of that incomparable Virgin whom he ador'd: and the Queen on the other hand believing that she might in time gain a heart that was not already prepossessed by love.

In the mean while you are to understand, Madam, that the Queen had given order that no person should have admittance into her Chamber all that day, unless it were Viridonix; and that Geronces, not having had that favour shew'd him as the Stranger, took so great a disgust at his entertainment, that it was little different from fury: for I saw him in the great Anti-Chamber belonging to Loctrinia's Apartment, where he walk'd in a pelting chafe; and he no sooner perceiv'd me, but he came toward me with a countenance full of discontent, and address'd himself to me in these words, " Your Friend is more happy than we; but as I introduc'd him into Court, and as he is beholding to me for his good fortune, it may happen that I may undo what I have done: I know he has sav'd my life, but besides that commonly men of our calling make but little account of it, they hazard it often enough to find every day opportunities to retaliate benefits of that nature. If you rightly understand Viridonix, replied I, as you will infallibly know him in a few days, you will find that it is not ambition that brought him to Troynovant; for he might appear at Court after another manner, or he will never be your Competitor, or hinder you from the quiet enjoyment of your Commands, and the favour which you have obtain'd.

I pronounc'd those words which were really true, with so many signs of perfect integrity, that Geronces seem'd to be somewhat appeas'd; but he was no sooner gone down stairs, and had made a stop in a wide Court just before the Palace of the Kings of Albion, but he began to ponder, (by what we afterwards understood) upon what I had spoken to him; he call'd to mind at the same time the noble aspect of Viridonix, his disguisement, the favour that the Queen had shew'd him; and composing a poison of the mixture of all these thoughts, he infected his heart therewith, insomuch that it produc'd a most cruel jealousy. While his fury added new violence to his passions, Viridonix goes along well contented in his mind, to see his affection for the Princess dispensed with, and to find less obstruction in the design which he was bent upon. And being taken up with that pleasing fancy, he made no stop at the sight of Geronces, when the Britain observing his countenance, and seeing there all the symptoms of satisfaction, and therefore not doubting but the Gaul was lov'd by Loctrinia, "Viridonix, cryed he, you are madly dazzled with your new favour, since you take no notice that I am here, and tarry for you.

At that hasty language, the great Prince, naturally impatient, began to be in a passion; but being withal infinitely generous and grateful, as one that had forgot that Geronces was beholding to him for his life, that he might only remember the obliging offer which the Britain had made him, he immediately beheld him with more moderation, and addressing his speech to him, My sight is too good, said he, to fear that the pretended favours which you tax me with, should any way do it an injury. "It must be then, replied Geronces, that your converse with the Queen has so put up your mind, that you scorn to look down upon such miserable persons to whom it is denied. You speak after such a rate, (replied the Prince, striving still to keep himself in temper) that I might dispence with giving you any satisfaction, however being very unwilling to differ with my friends, I will tell you that strangers have a privilege every where, and that it is no extraordinary thing for the Court of Troynovant to distinguish Viridonix from the subjects of Gratian. "We have not observ'd, replied Geronces full of impatience, that that quality of a stranger of which you boast so highly, was so much look'd upon in the person of Dinocus; and if out of a fancy it were regarded in that of Viridonix, I wear by my side that wherewith I do dispute with him any advantages which he can claim in Troynovant. And I have wherewith to maintain them, (fiercely said the incensed Prince, laying his hand upon his Sword) and wherewithal to make Geronces repent, and all others that shall assault Viridonix with the same boldness.

They fell to it immediately, and layd at one another with great fury; but while rage transported the jealous Britain, and Heroick Courage animated the valiant Constantine, a great number of persons in the Palace-yard, and from the Palace it self came running in, and parted them. Gratian and Loctrinia shew'd themselves in a great Balcony to appease the tumult; and the passionate Queen understanding the cause, ordered Geronces to be seised upon, though he were her Favourite, and that a person of her humour stood in need of one so bold, so hardy as he was, and apt to undertake any enterprize of her contriving. She sent immediately to desire Viridonix to come to the Court, not a little glad to find that he had received no hurt. And though at the same time she understood that Geronces was wounded in the Arm, she caus'd him to be sent to a Tower, where persons of the greatest quality were imprison'd; so that if the generous Viridonix had not interceded for him, and added his own to the petitions of his Friends, the fierce Loctrinia had absolutely order'd her farther commands to have been put in execution. At length she pardon'd Geronces, and to reconcile that violent and rash person to a Prince whom she lov'd, she told him that it was to Viridonix that he was beholding for the favour he had receiv'd. Those words instead of infusing thoughts of gratitude into the Britain, did but redouble his hatred against the Gaul, which so incensed the Queen, that there was much ado to make Geronces's peace. And indeed there was extraordinary means used before they could perswade the Queen to see him again that Evening.

The next morning all the youth of the Court, and the most considerable among the Strangers took Horse to meet the Princess. And Constantine, incited by a passion that he could easily have yielded to, had accompanied that noble Train, had not the Queen detain'd him with her all that day, shewing him all the time a hundred signs of a most violent passion; but while she freely beholding his beloved face, drank large draughts of a poison with which love had already envenom'd her heart, Gratian enters, Madam, said he, the Princess is come. I cannot believe, Sir, said Loctrinia interrupting him, that her return is so unexpected.

perci'd, that you should surprize us in this manner, or that your happiness is so great, to be so overjoy'd at so small a matter. She was going on with the same sharp severity, when the noise of the Horses and Chariots, oblig'd her to step forth into a great Balcony, together with Constantine and Gratian to see the Princess. 'Twas not that she condemn'd the thought of curiosity, but beside that her humour was very fickle, she found a certain violent desire growing in her heart, to observe the countenance of the Prince upon that first interview. Constantine, notwithstanding the melancholy study, into which his converse with the Queen had plung'd him; cast his eyes upon the noble Train that came toward the Palace, and no sooner did he discern the several objects, but his heart was strangely mov'd, his countenance grew pale, his legs became feeble, by reason of a surprize that suspended all the functions of his soul: insomuch that he was constrained to lean against the Balcony, like a person quite fainting away. In short, Madam, he there beheld his fair unknown, or rather he saw by a miracle wrought in his favour, that the incomparable Princess destined to him, was the admirable person, that had already charm'd his affection.

As her Idea was always present in his mind, he mistook her not the least moment; for the sumptuousness of her habit and the gallantry of her convoy, instead of disguising it, made it shine out with a brighter lustre, and only seem'd to add the magnificence of a Triumph, to the victory of her beauty. The passionate Loecrinia took notice of the alteration of Constantine's countenance, and having easily divin'd the cause, she suffered the impetuosity of her humour to take its full swing. She cast a cruel look upon the innocent Princess, afterward she beheld Constantine with a despitiful eye, and hastily leaving the King she shut her self up in her Closet: either that she might with more freedom, give way to the violence of her passion; or to seek out a remedy against the distemper that afflicted her. While she spins and then again unravels a hundred several designs, while the King, who durst not follow her, feeds his delighted Eyes with the sight of his fair Daughter, and that the enamour'd Prince recollects his spirits; the fair Princess enters into the Court of the Palace: and she was no sooner allighted out of her Chariot, but she goes up into the Queen's Apartment followed by a noble Train. Gratian received her with all the affection of a loving father, and having told her that Loecrinia was busie in her closet, he presented Viridonix to her in a very obliging manner. Princess, said he, the valour of this Knight has restored you to Troynovant, his Arm has delivered you from your Enemies, to preserve you for the Prince of Armorica: so that you see in the person of Viridonix, the defender of your liberty and the tutelar Angel of our dominions: I desire you to receive him with all the acknowledgment that is due to him, and let us labour both together to stay him here in a Court, of which he will without doubt be both the support and ornament.

Concluding these words he leaves Constantine with Octavia, and moving toward two or three strange Princes, that had accompanied the Princess, he gave them that respect which he thought due to their quality and merit. In the mean while Constantine transported with love and joy, stands like a mute person, his heart abandoning it self wholly to his Princess, his eyes being solely employed in beholding her, and if he found himself in a capacity to open his lips, 'twas not so much that he might speak, as to give passage to his Amorous sighs. He said nothing because he had too much to say, for he was at the same time to return thanks to his happy destiny, to relate what befel him at Dover, and to declare himself the fortunate Prince of Armorica. The Princess observ'd that discomposure, and therefore to avoid such consequences as might give her distaste; Viridonix (said she, with a very civil aspect) I believe that you have seen us somewhere else already, and that the surprize which appears in your face, comes from some supposed change of my condition: and because you find all at an instant, that I am the Princess. 'Tis true, Madam, (answered he, with a world of respect and civility) that I saw you at Dover, but I beheld you so fair, shining with the lustre of so many divine qualities, that if I have any reason to be surpris'd, 'tis to see you again the only Princess of Britain, that deserves to be Princess of the whole world.

The charming Octavia was at a stand, and finding in those respectful words of Constantine, something I cannot tell what presumptuously spoken, she said not a word for a good while, studying what resolution to take: But having no ground at all, and perhaps no power at all to give a severe answer, to a Knight whom she esteem'd already more than she thought she did; You turn the matter very obligingly, said she, for I must assure you I had not begun my discourse in that manner, had I expected such a piece of flattery: but instead of drawing it upon my self, I would have given you that applause which your noble deeds deserve. That which I did, reply'd the Prince, deserves not the remembrance of so fair and great a Princess, for had I known that the divine person that I saw at Dover, had been the illustrious Octavia for whom I fought; I had lost my life: or else by Actions far above what you commend, I would have appear'd before you, Madam, less unworthy the honour which I have received.

The

The vexed Loocrinia at that time came forth of the Closet, and in the despite that appear'd in her eyes increased, when she saw so many Princes and Knights, forming a Magnificent Court about the Princess; her choler mounted to the highest degree, when she saw Constantine and Octavia discoursing together, at a little distance from the rest of the company. What thoughts did not then possess the enraged Queen, and how shall I be able to express the violence of her deportment? she returned into her Closet, and there embracing the first designs that offered themselves to her mind, she called the Princess: and instead of receiving her with an affectionate tenderness, upon her return from a journey, the cause whereof had been so extraordinary, she presently cast a most dreadful look upon her: but then labouring to conceal the excess of her anger with a feigned moderation, more to be feared than a passion that madly shews it self; Or I am deceiv'd, said she, or you are very ready to entertain lovers. The modest Octavia blush'd and cast her eyes upon the ground, as if she would clear her self by her respect, of an accusation that surpris'd her. No no, (said the impatient Loocrinia, interrupting her) there is no reason that you should be my superiour, as the great number of men that are always your attendants, give me ground to complain. But I shall put things in better order, and it may be you will be to morrow with people, not altogether so gallant and amorous as the strangers, but with such as will obey me after another nature than I find you intend to do.

Concluding these words she turned hastily away not staying for any answer, and commanded her to retire: Octavia surpris'd with her strange carriage, calling to mind not only all her Actions, but also the very least of all her thoughts, and finding nothing to deserve that furious charge which the Queen had laid upon her, she only contented her self to lift up her eyes to heaven, thence to call witness of her innocency, without daring to accuse the fierce Loocrinia of injustice.

Thus Octavia went away sighing, and she was no sooner come into her chamber, where she settled her self to a serious examination of her past life, but she gave order not to be spoken with that day. A little while after the Virgin in whom she most confid'd of all that attended her, went into her chamber: and immediately observing the melancholy countenance of her Mistress, What Madam, said she, (as we understood afterwards) do you chuse out such a time of mirth as this to afflict your self? For Heaven's sake (said she, pursuing her pleasing expostulation) give more respect to the good fortune that smiles upon us. What would you do if the Picts were besieging Troynovant, and that you were at Dover compell'd to take shipping, to seek a Sanctuary in Gallia Armorica? What would you do, Madam, said she, if you perceived your self inclin'd not to disaffect Viridonix, and that this Viridonix should appear to be but some ordinary Knight. In the mean time your Enemies are overthrown, you are in the Court of the King your Father, and there is nothing more certain but that Viridonix, the valiant and lovely Viridonix, is the Prince of Armorica, as I always thought. I have been to see his picture in the Queen's little gallery: and Dinocus whom I begg'd to clear my suspicion, seeing that Constantine by my advice was about to make himself known, made me no answer but with a smile; whereby I apprehended that he knew not how to deceive me. At these words the fair cheeks of Octavia, were covered with a pleasing blush, while that charming Princess instead of making any answer, continued pondering, and seem'd to be more sad than before. Gadena, so was the Virgin called, having an inconceivable affection for her Mistress, threw her self upon her knees before her: and after she had used all the pretty tricks of female flattery and soothing persuasion, she took her by one of her fair hands, and kissing it; My dear Princess, said she, can you have any disturbing trouble, and not acquaint me with the cause of it? As she was about to say more, one of her companions came to advertise Octavia, that Viridonix desired to attend her.

The Princess was surpris'd, and looking upon that Damsel with an eye, as well denoting melancholy as discontent; Have I not told you, said she, that I would see no person this day? 'Tis very true Madam, said the Virgin, but I did not think that your Orders had concern'd the Strangers, and more especially such a Knight as Viridonix. I did not except him, reply'd the Princess, and you would do well to send him civilly away. Gadena's companion hearing these words, thought that she had displeas'd the Princess: and was going to make amends for her error, when Octavia, after she had beheld her carriage, and knew her design not without some perplexity; 'Tis not seasonable, (said she, looking somewhat doubtfully) for those excuses that would have satisfied Viridonix, immediately return'd, will look now like contriv'd answers, and not be well taken.

Pronouncing those words, she fell again into a study, without absolutely determining what precise answer to give, when Gadena, to free her out of her perplexity, took upon her to speak, addrelling her self to her companion, Since, Madam, the Princess has spoken said she, you do not do well to let a Renowned Knight stand at the door. Let him enter then, (replied the Princess, blushing, and then endeavouring to smile) Gadena will have it so, said she, and I will not have any more contest with her about the interest of Viridonix. She had no sooner obeyed, but the enamoured Constantine appeared with a charming grace, and drew near the Princess in a most respectful manner; Octavia's Damfels retired to the other end of the Room, out of respect, when the passionate Prince, who took no farther care to conceal himself, and had already discovered his real quality to the King, had he not design'd to declare it first to the Princess, observing the alteration of Octavia's countenance, Is it possible, Madam, said he, smiling, that Viridonix should be always a trouble to you? That Constantine should be unfortunate, (pursued he, beholding her with looks of love) if Viridonix be offensive because he resembles the other. We are so highly bound to Viridonix, replied the Princess, that his company can never be displeasing to us: But certainly you will never have any ground, no more than the Princess of Armorica, to complain of us, as of a person upon whom your good or bad fortune depends. "Ah, Madam, replied he, you know Constantine but very little, if you doubt in the least of his being absolutely devoted to your service, or if you think you have not his destiny at your disposal: yes, Madam, the Prince of Amorica adores the divine Princess of Albion, and must expire at your feet, (added he, kneeling upon the ground with one knee) if she become so cruel as not to consent to her Father's will. In brief, Madam, you see a Prince on whom you may bestow all honour and felicity: you see Constantine whom the Heavens design'd to serve Octavia before you were born. I have obeyed that sacred power; I was never sensible of any other but your charms, which I no sooner saw, but I felt those passions which I never prov'd before nor since.

While Constantine expresses himself in this manner, Octavia raises him up. And though she were prepar'd to hear good part of what he had given her to understand, yet could she not forbear from being so surpris'd at first, that she could not make him any answer, which gave the enamoured Prince time to give her a more exact account of what he thought was necessary to inform her. As for the Princess, she hearkened to him with more signs of satisfaction than disturbance, in regard his company and his person was pleasing, but more especially because she knew he was the person design'd for her Husband, so that I believe had she had time to make him an answer, she would have done it in a very civil manner, if not very obliging. But the passionate Constantine had no sooner declar'd his thoughts to her, but two Strangers of eminent quality, to whom they could not refuse the favour which they had granted Viridonix, entred the Room, and broke off their farther converse. My Master was infinitely displeas'd at it, for he thought to have stay'd with the Princess till night, as well that he might have a longer time to behold her, as to continue an entertainment that was so pleasing to him; but it was impossible for him to do it, because the two Strangers stay'd so long that it was time for him to retire as well as they. He found some little kind of perplexity for not having inform'd himself what were Octavia's real thoughts; but on the other hand joy transported him when he consider'd that the fair person he lov'd, was the miraculous Princess that was appointed for him, and that Princess, all enchanting as she was, had hearken'd to him, with fairer marks of esteem than of indifference, and seem'd more inclinable to good will than any aversion.

In the mean time the violent Queen sends for Geronces, who was the person that put all her designs in execution; and she no sooner saw him, but without permitting him to assuage her with any Apology, she told him that he must prepare to leave Troynovant the next morning early, and that he should carry Octavia to a certain house which she appointed; Go, said she, go and make ready for your journey, and without putting your self to the trouble of enquiring into the cause, or studying upon the event, manage this affair with quick discretion; and take care that Octavia's residence at Sotimbra be not made publick. Geronces instead of going his ways, beholds the Queen, blushes and sighs. Loeriniz, who already observ'd it, and had nothing but Octavia in her mind, instead of understanding the Britain's true thoughts by the alterations of his countenance, fancied that it was some effect of compassion in him for the Princess: What, Geronces, (said she, looking upon him with surprize) have you always obeyed me without scruple, now to stand pausing at the most just of my commands? Have you more interest than I in the disposal of her life? Or in short, Geronces, explain your self, do you think of angering the King? "Ah, Madam! said he, forbear to continue a discourse so harsh and terrible. My fidelity is too much injured by it, and I cannot hearken to it without believing my self the most unfortunate of men. Can you, Madam, can you, without wounding me to death, doubt in the least but that I am wholly devoted to your service? Does not what I have already done, answer for me? Have you ever found “found any faint slackness in me, or any scruple in the execution of your commands? And “in the oaths that I have solemnly sworn to you, had I ever any respect to the King or “Princess? No, no, Madam. I never considered them at all; and I am still ready to sacri“fice them to your service, should they go about to make me scruple a submission, that “might give you any trouble in the possession of your Sovereignty. But, Madam, I can“not receive without surprize any command that may abate me from your Majesty;

 “and I tremble when I think, that during my absence, some accident of importance may “happen wherein you may have need of assistance. At these words Loerina chang’d her purpose, for knowing Geronces to be hardy and ambitious, she found that the interest of his fortune made him express himself after that manner, Go, said she, and return again as soon as you have conducted Olivia two or three miles out of Town, provided that by your order she be safely guarded to the place, and that no person living know where she remains.

Satisfied with that last command, the Britann retired; and though his countenance appeared more cheerful than before, he could not leave Loerina’s Closet without sighing.
 Early the next morning he caused the Princess to be awaked, and rudely entred the Chamber, inform’d her of his Commission, and speaking to the Virgins that attended her, and were presently got together, he ordered them to dress their Mistress with all speed. They were so surpris’d at the strangeness of the accident, that they began to complain and murmur at it aloud; but Olivia commanded them silence in such a manner, as shewed the prudence of her mild temper. Afterwards looking upon them with a pensive aspect, and with tears flowing from her fair eyes; Be obedient, I entreat you, said she, dress me quickly, and forbear all reluctancy of which they may make a new offence. Alas! since the Queen removes me from her presence, I must be either very guilty, or very unfortunate; besides that your affection may make you fail in your fidelity to our Sovereign, and render me an Accessary with you.

She concluded these words with a sigh, and wiping away those tears that she could not contain, she so well assisted the diligence of her Servants, that she was presently ready to call for Geronces, who being entred the Chamber, and letting him know that she was ready to be gone; Geronces, (said she, with a sweetness able to melt any heart but his) will you not permit me to take my leave of the King and Queen? You shall be there present, nor will I desire them to recal the orders they have given; for in short, it is only to see them that I make you this request. And if I speak to them, it shall be only to tell them, that I will be obedient as long as I live to their wills and pleasure, with all the respect which I owe them. If you are ready, replied Geronces, interrupting her, let us be gone, and never take care to awake two persons in the morning so early, whose repose you ought to be wary how you disturb, if you have so much respect as you pretend.

Those last words went more near the Princess’s heart, than the refusal of a thing which she so earnestly desired; but instead of breaking into passion against a person that acted by the Queen’s orders, she preserv’d her first moderation, and answered that she would stay till Gratian and Loerina were awake, “That cannot be, said Geronces, interrupting her a“gain, for our orders are so exact, that I cannot tell whether I have not already fail’d in “the preciseness which I ought to have observed in the execution of my Commission, by “wasting so long time in discourse. And therefore if we must go, let us be gone presently, “yet of your self do what you think necessary for you to do.

Instead of saying more he went out of the Chamber, and marching at the head of the Guard which he had brought with him, the Princess followed, suffering her self to be led by the Officers who took charge of her. She was no sooner out of the Palace-yard, but she went into her Chariot ready prepared, and the Ladies that attended her having taken theirs, Geronces immediately led the way for Sotimbra. The people of Troyvant that saw the Princess as she rode along were very much grieved; for besides that she was but carelessly dressed, she carried a pensive melancholy in her countenance, enough to have mov’d the most insensible hearts. The sweetness of her temper appeared more visible, through the severity of Geronces; for that faithful minister of Loerina had something of so much haste in his deportment, and in his countenance, that the ill will which he drew upon him, seem’d to add new charms to the Princess, and to render her more amiable: yet there were none that durst take her part, nor murmur aloud against Loerina, so powerful she was, and so much dreaded: so that they were contented to give the young Lady a thousand praises, and to accompany her with their good wishes, while in secret they uttered as many imprecations against the cruel Queen. In the mean time Geronces had given order to make such speedy haste, that they got to Sotimbra that very night, though it were thirty miles from Troyvant: Olivia was no sooner there, but instead of minding to rest her self, she thought of nothing else but Loerina’s anger, and afflicted her self in such a manner for having been the cause

All the while she is so sad, the whole Court was no less afflicted, astonishment reign'd only there, and every one labour'd to find out the reason of Octavia's so sudden departure. The King, who was no better inform'd than the meanest Citizen in Troynovant, was so surpris'd, that not being able to satisfy those that ask'd him to give an account concerning his own Daughter, he ran to Locrinia's Apartment to learn the news himself. He demanded of that fierce Lady where Octavia was, why she was hurried from Troynovant, and why her departure was so hurried and kept private. Locrinia hearing him speak with that earnestness that is not ordinary in persons of his humour, look'd earnestly upon him, and preparing to answer without being mov'd in the least: You would fain understand things, said she, but I cannot tell whether I am oblig'd to answer you, considering how imperiously you make your enquiry.

Those words seem'd very dreadful to Gratian, so that he was fain to fall to his old submissiveness: For Heaven's sake, Madam, said he, tell me what is become of my Daughter. "Since you call her so, replyed she, 'tis very fitting you should take some care of her, or at least you should not blame me if I deprive my self of her sight for your own good. "This is not all, I make my self odious that you may live in quiet: for since you have layd upon my Shoulders the burthen of affairs, I have met with several occasions, that instead of being rewarded for the pains I have taken, raise the clamours of your Subjects against me, so that I draw upon my self their hatred for exposing my own life to preserve yours. Thus I make no question but all the world cries out against my pretended severity; for when you disrespect me in your carriage, 'tis in vain for me to expect more satisfaction from indifferent persons. But that you may be more just for the future, and may not lightly condemn me, know that I had not remov'd Octavia, but for fear lest some of these Strangers now in your Court should steal her affections, and least your only Daughter should bestow that heart which you have the sole right to dispose, to the prejudice of your authority, and your promise given to the King of Armorica. And thus I have done that which may perhaps render me odious, to keep you from being entangled with your Neighbour Princes, and that you may not be forc'd to follow the inclinations of a young Girl that is not capable of governing her self.

Gratian is overjoyed, he returns thanks to the dissembling Locrinia; and after that, to be fully inform'd, as he thought, of the business: But, Madam, said he, why did you not communicate to me a design so much to my advantage. Because, said she, I would exempt you from being thought ill of by the strange Princes that are in Town, and the clamour of your Subjects, which I could not have done, had you been privy to the design: for the affected surprise which you would have shew'd when you had been discours'd with, or question'd about it, would not have produc'd the same effect as that which you now manifest, which being real and effectual, causes a more confident aspect in the countenance, and far more persuasive than if you had acted by consent with me. "Ah, Madam, cryed he, your prudence is great and very prodigious, and Heaven certainly was very favourable to me, when it put into my heart to resign the Government up to your care. Govern then, Madam, still, and govern absolutely, and never fear lest I should call you to give an account of that administration which you acquit so worthily; for my part, I am resolv'd to submit to your management without putting my self to the trouble of any examination, and to testify the acknowledgment which I owe to a person that sacrifices her repose to the establishment of mine. I do not repent, Sir, said she, of the pains that I have taken in your behalf; for I am glad that the labour and travel which I undergo proves to your ease and quiet; but after all it is but just that I should take care for my own tranquility, and not to draw upon me the hatred of those that envy all such persons as are advanc'd contrary to the common order of things. You will do me a kindness to discharge me of a burthen that will infallibly overwhelm me; and to consider that a woman acts more securely and more becomingly when she obeys, and when she binds her self to—— "Ah, Madam, said the King interrupting her, forbear to have a thought which is no less injurious to you, than prejudicial to me; and be assured that women like your self, when they are to be found, ought to bear the whole sway, where men are of capacity to understand them. Concluding those words, he went his way, fearing lest Locrinia should restore him back that absolute power of which he had declar'd her to be absolute Mistress, and that she would discontinue to act as King.

While the feeble Gratian is thus overjoyed to be dispoil'd of his authority, and that all the Court mourned for the absence of the Princess, Constantine and I slept securely: nature compell'd us to take our rest, over-wearied with long watching, and turmoil of the mind that had lasted all the preceding night. The enamour'd Prince had stayed in my Chamber till a little before day, when he beholding me with a look that easily denoted love and joy, "It is but just, Pinocus, said he, that you should partake of my happiness, who have had so great a share in my discontents; I am, Pinocus, not only more happy than Princes, who are but a small number, but more fortunate than all men. Do you not admire at this strange providence of heaven, that visibly shews it felt in the beginning of my youth, and which seems to lead me to a perfect happiness?" "It is very true, said I, that hitherto it has been very favourable to you, for besides the noble qualities with which it has endowed you, it has always given success to your valour." "Let us, said he, interrupting me, discourse of the greatest of its favours, let us but consider that it made me insensible of the charms of those celebrated beauties, which we saw in our Travels: But then when I met, yet without having any knowledge of her, that incomparable Princess of whom it seems to promise me the enjoyment; Heaven it self guided her looks into my heart, and there established their Empire in my soul. And so firmly is this Empire founded that nothing can move it: nay though destiny were as contrary to me, as she is now favourable, nothing can hinder me from the possession of Octavia, nothing debar me from being happy.

At these words he made a stop, and ponder'd upon the Queen's affection, which he durst not make known to me. The thought thereof happening to moderate the excess of his joy, awaken'd him to think wherein he might fail of his good fortune: so that after he had breath'd forth a sigh; Alas! said he, am I so dazzled with the first beams of my hope, which I see begin to glimmer, to think my felicity so immovably fix'd? Ah thoughts too pleasing! Ah flattering hopes! you cannot disguise those misfortunes, of which I feel such fatal Omens. I know the proud Locrinia to be as fierce and fiery, as the most violent of her impious sex: She thinks that great Princes are beholding to her, if she vouchsafes to accept of their homages. She is fair, she is proud, she is Queen of a great Kingdom, and setting aside these bright shining qualities, she has humbled the pride of her soul before thee, she has compelled thee to understand an affection which thy heart and thy reason cannot approve, and which thou canst not reject without drawing upon thee the persecution of an incens'd Woman and in high power. But this would be but a small thing, had her fury no other object, but the pretended offender who resists her charms. Alas, there is more than too much likelihood, that she will extend it to the fair and innocent Octavia, and that that miraculous Princess will be soon expos'd to the violence of her passion. Let us therefore forget our own interests, that we may take care of the admirable Octavia: let us throw our selves at Gratian's feet, let us cease to be Viridonix, let us appear to be the Prince of Armorica, and let us demand the fair Princess, so long since promised the over-happy Constantine. After he had taken this resolution, he called for Attendants, who were no sooner enter'd into his Chamber, but they inform'd him of the departure of the Princess. The news thereof surpris'd him in a strange manner; for the fear which he had already felt, returning to smite his heart, he grew pale, and was constrained to give free passage to a number of sighs. He caus'd them several times to repeat, the circumstances of that new misfortune: and suffering himself to give way to his former discontents, and an intermingled transportation of fury, rage and choler, he went to the King with so much eagerness, as easily denoted, how much he was concern'd for the absence of Octavia. There was then with Gratian an Envoy from the King of Armorica, who had no sooner cast his Eyes upon Constantine's face, but he seem'd to be overjoyed: and would have cast himself at the feet of his Prince, had not Constantine oppos'd it, out of the reverence he bore to the Father of his Princess. The King of Albion being taught in a few words, the true quality of Viridonix, transported with joy, he threw his Arms about my Master's Neck, and embrac'd him with all the affection, he was able to express: and having kiss'd him he call'd him twenty times his dear Son, his only stay and support, and then bedew'd his cheeks with his tears. Constantine kneels out of respect, embraces the knees of so good a Prince, and tells him the reason of his disguise, with all the sincerity that modesty could permit him. He discourst him afterwards concerning the extreme love which he had for the Princess, of his intention to have discovered himself that day, and gave him an exact account of all things, tending toward the making good his honourable claim. Gratian is overjoyed, and would needs carry Viridonix to the Queen, of whose affection the wary Viridonix had not spoken a word; either that he might be the first to bring such acceptable news to the fierce Queen, or to understand her thoughts, before he would presume to make known his own, though he had sufficiently discovered already what they were, by his extraordinary caresses and transportation of mind. When he was enter'd Locrinia's chamber, he presented Constantine to her: and undertaking to speak with more than ordinary vehemency; Madam, said he to the Queen, behold here the illustrious Prince of Armorica, behold here the generous Constantine, who had not as I am inform'd gone under another name, but only that he might fight with less caution of his person for our interests.

At these words Constantine kneeling with one knee, kiss'd the Queen's hand with all the submission, that any subject of Gratian could have shewn, and he spoke with a respect answerable to his behaviour. Loocrinia blush'd to see her conquerour at her feet, and therefore immediately commanding him to rise, she shewed him all the decent civilities that her love and despite would permit her. However she did not manifest that full satisfaction, which it behoved her to shew at such a meeting, but she excus'd the defects of her perplexity, by reason of the surpris which they had put upon her, and something of an indisposition, which hindred her from shewing those marks of joy, which she ought to have express'd upon the sight of Constantine. But Prince, said she, my distemper will not long endure without doubt: and therefore you may return in a short time, and know the reality of my thoughts. Gratian was extremely troubled at that reception, but not daring either to complain or stay in the Queen's Chamber, after she had told him her mind, Constantine and he went away together.

A little while after Loocrinia sends for my Master, and looking upon him without any reservedness but a great deal of love, she openly discovered to him her passion: she told him moreover that Gratian was sickly, his body tender: and therefore to assure him entirely the Crown of great Britain, she gave him easily to conjecture the violent means, which she was able to make use of. The vertuous Constantine was struck with horror, but for many reasons forbearing to incense Loocrinia, he answer'd to every thing with all submission, nor did he take his leave of the fair Princess, but in a very respectful manner. The Queen far from being satisfied with all the civilities of the Prince, was strangely enrag'd at his carriage: and seeing the spirit of Constantine far from being enclined, to that acknowledgment which she desired, she sent for Geronces, who was no sooner enter'd the Closet, but beholding him with a troubled countenance; Geronces, said she, you must serve me now with a re-inforc'd resolution, you must give me new proofs of that fidelity, which you have always had for me. In short, Geronces, you must absolutely break off the match between Constantine and Octavia: You know and the report is already spread abroad every where, that Viridonix is the Prince of Armorica, but understand however, Geronces, understand, that I cannot suffer him to espouse the Princess of Albion. The very fear which I have of seeing those two persons married, causes a dreadful anguish within me, nor will my soul be ever at rest, unless we can hinder it by some invincible obstruction.

Geronces, at these words was confirm'd in the truth of what he suspected, and feeling the violence of his jealousy increase, his colour chang'd, and his heart seem'd to be turmoyl'd with infinite discontent. And because he did not answer presently, the Queen resum'd her words; What, said she, *Geronces, are you willing that Constantine, who is already but too much beloved in Troynovant, should augment his power, overturn your fortune, and deprive me of my Authority? Think you the generosity which he affects, to procure the esteem of the King and the admiration of the people, be so great as to make him forget your carriage of affairs, or to pass by the haughtiness of a Mother-in-law, too much already hated by him. Let us break off, Geronces this fatal match, let us avoid the yoke of subjection that threatens us: and wonder not at a discourse so little answerable, to the civilities which I have shew'd Viridonix. I knew him to be Constantine by a picture that I have of him, and I would have gain'd his affection, believing that he would soon have a great power in this Court. But Geronces, I find that there never was a heart more disdainful than his, never was conceal'd a pride so haughty, under so appearing a modesty. The Britain finding some likelihood in the Queen's discourse, perceiv'd his melancholy to be in good part appeas'd: and meeting at the same time with an opportunity to preserve his own reputation, to injure Viridonix, and to serve a person whom he passionately lov'd; Madam, cry'd he, as it were in an extasie, *your fear is just, and to rid you of the cause of it, I will sheath my dagger in the heart of Constantine, if your Majesty commands me.

The enamour'd Loocrinia blush'd at so dreadful a promise, and remain'd without speech, whence Geronces conceiving new disquiet; How Madam, reply'd he with some surpris, are you mute and do you change colour? 'Tis true, reply'd the dissembling Queen, that I presently felt my self prompted by the same motive, and the same desire that you did, however, I will consider before I resolve upon the death of Constantine, which may bring us a very great prejudice without being any way advantageous. Aldrocc will take Arms in his revenge, and all our neighbours looking upon us with indignation, and mov'd with the sorrows of the King of Armorica, will league themselves with him to our ruine: and therefore without having recourse, when there is no necessity to that extremity of violence, it will be sufficient to find out a husband for the Princess, whose interests are tyed to ours, and whose alliance may be a support to us : “ Oh Madam if that be all, said he, rest your self satisfied, for I have found in the person of “ Maximus all that you can desire : He is of the same blood as the King, he loves his family, “ and is much concern’d for the Line that now reigns in our Island. He is a brave person, “ powerful at Rome, and one that easily can procure us the friendship of the Emperour. “ That is not all Madam, he has an esteem for your self even to veneration, and believes “ the Princess to be the fairest person in the world : more than that, having a great friend- “ ship for me, he revealed to me his most secret thoughts, when I went by your commands, “ to joyn with him near the head of Danubius, when we marched against Pharamond, what “ time Aurelian oppos’d Gondioch. Maximus during that war was sufficiently able to raise “ in Germany, the Carithnians, the Latobriges, the Tulingians, and the Dandates and the “ Neterians, lying at the feet of the mountains of Meliboe, and the head of Visurgues. Though “ he had no great success against the King of the Franks, yet has he above forty thousand “ men left : and being come into Gallia Belgica, he may easily bring his Army hither in a few “ days. But Madam, added he with some discomposure, what will you do with Constantine, “ shall he dye in Albion by your commands, or will you suffer him to return into Armorica ? “ I have already told you, replied the Queen, that his death will occasion us inevitable dan- “ gers, and you may easily judge what will be the consequences, of his retreat into Armorica. “ He will certainly return like a Lion let loose, he will make havock perhaps of whatever “ opposes him, how valiant soever you are and how warlike soever our people. Why should “ we then neglect those ways of prevention that are in our power ? It behoves us, Geronces, “ to seize upon Constantine, if we would hinder him from spoiling our designs, and if we “ desire to preserve the means, of making an advantageous peace with the King of Armoni- “ ea. Then make no delay, but this very day begin to go about this great affair of ours, “ dispatch a Currier to Maximus, make him a noble proposal which without all scruple he “ may gratefully accept. As for me, I will undertake to govern Gratian’s inclinations, as “ to what concerns the Prince of Armorica. In the mean while do you contrive in what “ manner, we shall bring all this to that pass which we desire.

When she had spoke these words, she sent to request the King to come to her Chamber, where Geronces attended his coming without speaking one word : He found Loctrinia’s Ar- guments very strong, though he were not for all that entirely perswaded, and that he felt as yet a secret anguish, of which he could not divine the reason. Gratian was no sooner en- tered the Queen’s Chamber, but he beheld the Queen with a stedfast look, and perceiving her to be discomposed without knowing any cause ; “ Madam, said he, I believe you yet “ feel the same disposition, which you had when I presented the Prince of Armorica to kiss “ your hands, for methinks I see some marks of it still, besides that Constantine went away “ not well satisfied, with that second visit which he made you. “ He should have been bet- “ ter pleased, replied the Queen, had I not presently discovered that Viridonix was Constan- “ tine : and that I had not been forced to oppose those pernicious designs, which he came “ to put in execution. In short, Sir, we are no longer ignorant of the reason of his disguise- “ ment, that might have prov’d fatal to you. Nor are you to be surpris’d either at the re- “ moving Octavia, nor at any of our other proceedings as you have been. I have received “ Viridonix with those civilities, that were due to the Prince of Armorica, Geronces has blam’d “ me for your interest sake, before he knew what those civilities were, because that Gaul “ would have drawn him into a conspiracy : And I was angry with Geronces only to please “ Constantine, and soften the fierceness of his courage. But as I could no way moderate his “ unmeasurable ambition, I gave him to understand in what manner, I had been inform’d “ of his practices : and then letting him see that I was in a condition, to spoil his plots and “ to destroy his accomplices, it was that which has caused that melancholy in him which you “ have observed. Is it possible Madam, cryed Gratian, that Constantine, who has fought for “ your interest with so much valour, could imagine so unjust a design ? Never enquire whether he “ could or no, said the Queen interrupting him, but rather after what manner he contrived it. “ Such enterprises as this are only for great and haughty spirits, and Constantine could never have “ been capable to undertake it, were he not extremely bold, and that his valour had not given him “ a reputation, with our subjects and in the Army : so that what I have acted has been only to divert “ the fury of an ambitious young man, who thinks your life too long. For if a disguise- “ ment could not render him suspected, if his own proceeding and the testimony of Geronces, will not “ persuade you, however can you suspect the fidelity of any person, the most interested in your “ concerns of any in the world, and who does not reveal you a Crime, but only to hinder the effect, “ nor that neither, but upon certain proofs.

At those words Gratian appear’d like one in an amaze, he could not tell what to do, whether to complain of Constantine, or return Loecrinia thanks, when the impatient Queen refusing her Story, that she might not give him time to examine things; Sir, (said she in great haste) I have already told you, that all your reflections are unprofitable, and that without losing a moment of time you must seek for shelter from the tempest that threatens you. But, Madam, (at length answer'd the astonish'd Gratian) do you think he will not return back again well satisfied, if we give him the Princess to wife? No, (immediately replied the incensed Loecrinia) he will never be so content, for considering the enjoyment of Octavia as a thing already his due, and assur'd him; think you he will be mov'd with a present which is his own already? His design, Sir, his design is only to get possession of your Throne, choose either to quit your Crown, or labour to divert his design, before he be able to overwhelm your power. Ah, Madam, replied Gratian, you well know that Princes never quit their Thrones willingly; and therefore as you, like a person worthy of your Dignity, fill that part which I have given you in mine, I make no question, but that your endeavours will prove successful to sustain and maintain both your own and my place likewise. I see that Constantine is guilty since you accuse him; for since your interest is inseparable from mine, I will not longer consider, but prepare to put in execution those resolutions we shall take together.

The cunning Loecrinia having thus wrought upon Gratian's easie temper, continued in these words, "They who advised you to bestow the Princess Octavia upon the Prince of Armorica, without all peradventure expected to meet with some particular advantages in the alliance which they propounded: But for you, Sir, you can reap no advantage from it; for thereby would our nation lose both its honour and its peace: What must Constantine espouse the Heirefs of Albion? As much as to say, must Great Britain be subject to the Little Britain? What, will you give your Octavia to a Prince who shall no sooner be establish'd in his Father's Kingdom, but the Princess must lose that which the right of nature gave her, and that which you left her? In short, Sir, do you believe that Constantine, who may reign in his own Country, will leave the pleasures of his native Soil for a Country where he was never accustomed to the Air, nor Climate, nor the manners and disposition of the people? Ah! never flatter yourself, he will never forsake Gallia for our Island: nor will the proud Albion ever submit to the Scepter of Armorica: nor is this all yet; for besides the renouncing of her Honour, she will see her self drain'd of all her wealth, either by sending her Tributes to Constantine, or to satisfy the rapaciousness of his Deputy-Lieutenants, whom he shall send to domineer in his room, in this unfortunate Island. If our Britains should suffer the weight of this yoke, they would be truly miserable; and should they take up a generous resolution to throw it off, they would but rend and tear the Bowels of the Nation in pieces with civil broils, and so either become a prey to many Tyrants of their own Nation, or to the first Stranger that should attempt to bring them under subjection to his Laws. But, Madam, said the King, how shall we avoid this mischief? "I do not go about to tire you with an idle story, replied she, in telling you of a mischief without a remedy; for I go about to propose you Expedients which will establish your Glory, and the peace of your life. Give the Princess such a Husband as can pretend to no other Crown but what you leave her; for then as he is to expect all things from you, he will be content to abide with his Benefactors; so will you not only not be deprived of the company of your beloved Daughter, but he also that shall be oblig'd to you for the possession of so fair a Princess, will have all the respect and acknowledgment for you imaginable. Besides, living among the Britains he will labour to gain the people, and coming to know their disposition, he will so instruct himself in the rules of clemency and severity, as to be able to make use of both, according to the necessity of affairs: However, do not think it sufficient for you to render any person happy, that you may so continue your self; there must be other means of prevention used, it behoves this happy person to labour himself for your felicity, and labour to procure you a powerful alliance; nor can you seek a more potent amity than that of Honorius, which Maximus, who is your relation, and friend of our faithful Gerones, can with ease procure to your advantage. He has commanded a long time with great reputation the Armies of the Emperour in Germany: he will accept of the Princess's troth as a happiness beyond his pretences and his hopes. In the mean time, he is of your blood, and he is not the first of the name that has espoused the Heirefs of Great Britain; for give me leave to put you in mind, that Maximus, to whom King Octavius gave his only Daughter, reigned very happily in this Island. Expect the same good hap from him; and since I have no other Kinsman who can lawfully aspire to the honour which I would procure him, but Maximus, who is of the same Family from whence I am descended, which claims its lineal pedigree from Loecrinus the eldest Son of Brutus. I do consent, nay I do heartily “desire that that Renowned Roman may obtain her out of that satisfaction which I forget he will have in her. Then said Geronces, Sir, there is no person living could speak with more reason, nor more to your advantage. I know it very well, replied Gratian, but I would fain understand how shall I shelter my self from the anger of a King to whom I have broken my word. Your Majesty shall be safe from the invasion of his Armies, heicely replied Geronces, if you will vouchsafe me the command of yours. Besides that, Maximus, as I have told the Queen, being in Gallia Belgica with forty thousand men, will presently be at hand to give you aid, and to maintain the glorious claim to which you have advanc'd him. You will also be free from any reproach that he can lay upon you, replied the Queen, by complaining first of the proceedings of Constantine. I need not tell you, Sir, that Kings without scruple may sometimes break their words, seeing that the necessity of their affairs furnishes them every foot with arguments and pretences; so that you may easily dispose of the Princess's inclinations, and forbid her to give her consent, which is absolutely necessary for the consummation of the marriage. It will be sufficient, Sir, that without laying of fault upon the Subjects, or Octavia, that Constantine himself engages you to change your resolution. He disguises himself upon his entry into Albion, while he has an Army ready on the one side, and the Picts are marching against you on the other: before your face he testifies a great love for the Princess, before me he renounces her, and deluding us both, he labours to attain his ends by secret ways, that is to say, such as are altogether to be condemn'd as vile and illegal. Let us ruine those designs which cannot but be pernicious, let us seize Constantine since we have ground enough, and by depriving a nation that will be our Enemies of a valiant Leader; let us not neglect the true means to procure our own safety, by all the ways that we can deal with him.
"desire

Upon this discourse, the King, who had a real friendship for Constantine, was more surpris'd than before. But Loctrinia, who would not endure that the King should hesitate a minute in contradiction of her intentions, resum'd her discourse with a more shrill and loud voice; “Explain your self, Sir, said she, do you love a Stranger so well that you never saw above two or three times, and one that has not appear'd in your presence but under borrowed names, to sacrifice your life and your honour to his ambition? Declare your self, imitate me in the freedom of my speech; if you dare not, follow me in my generous resolution. As for my part, I am strongly perswaded that the marriage of Constantine with Octavia is of dangerous consequence; and I protest I will omit nothing to ruine the alliance; and having gone so far, I will go a little farther, and make sure of the person of Constantine, for fear least through my negligence and credulity he may chance to surprize your person, and triumph over our weakness.

Gratian, who saw Loctrinia's interest intermingled with his, and being otherwise perswaded that he could not reign with honour, nor live in peace, but in following the advice of a Princess whom he thought to be the most politic in the world, I yield, Madam, cry'd he, and leave to you the sole management of this important affair; and assure your self, the orders which you shall issue forth for the good of our Subjects, and our particular safety shall be followed with all exactness imaginable.

Upon the conclusion of those words he went his way; and Loctrinia causing Geronces to stay, paused a little while upon what she was going to undertake, the image of Constantine, which she had always present in her imagination, more than once disarm'd her anger; but at length the fear of losing what she had either by departure, or by the charms of her Rival, made her resolve not to defer the execution of her design: nor but that she had many cautions to observe in so nice a conjuncture; for though she knew Geronces to be a person bold, faithful, and an enemy to Constantine, and that he was too well settled in Troy-nouant to be wrought upon to leave the Court of Gratian to follow the Prince of Armorica into Gallia; yet those other qualities which she took notice of in the Britain, did not a little disturb her thoughts, which he also evidently perceiv'd; and therefore first of all observing his fierce nature, and the consequences of his fury, she studyed nothing more than to avoid all sort of violence, therefore she sleightly commanded Geronces to use the Prince civilly; and speaking to him with an imperious utterance, “Remember, said she, that Vidonix is Constantine, that is to say, the only Son and lawful Heir of a great King, and that your Queen will recompense or punish you, according as you give the Prince cause either to commend or complain of your proceedings. Your life it self also, added she with a strange discomposure, shall answer for his; I have told you the consequences which we are to expect upon the death of Constantine; you know those that concern you at this time, so that you have nothing to do but to take your opportunities, and to act as you shall see convenient for your purpose.

to hear himself fear'd and threatened upon this occasion, and suspecting that which was the true cause, would not have seized the Prince of Armorica, had he not expected some great satisfaction by becoming Master of his design. However, he dissimbled his thoughts as much as a man of his humour was able, for fear lest Loecinia should discover him, and therefore to keep the active spirit of the Queen employed, till Constantine be retired to his Chamber, he wrote to Maximus before her face, and according to her intentions he invited the Roman into Albion, he put him in hopes to enjoy the Princess, he promised him that he should succeed Gratian, and open'd to him the design which he had against Constantine.

The Prince was no sooner return'd to his Apartment, but Geronces being advertis'd thereof, accompanied with several of the Guards went thither, and the Queen who saw him quit the Chamber, changing colour, followed him without delay, transported with the different motions both of love and fear.

The Britain beheld my Master with a malignant joy, and presently giving him to understand his Commission, without putting himself to the trouble of mitigating the circumstances, Sir, said he, I have order not to let you stir forth of your Apartment. Constantine fix'd his eyes upon him with more fury than surprisè, and speaking to him with an utterance that testified his indignation, Who could give, said he——— The King, replied the impatient Geronces, interrupting him. No, no, replied my Master, Gratian is not of a temper to act a violence of this nature: Princes of his Rank understand how to treat Princes of mine; and therefore I cannot imagine that the Father of the Princess Octavia, could ever put such an affront upon the Son of Aldrocc. Would it not be very unjust for him to seize a Prince that came into his Kingdom, and submitted himself to his power only to assist him against his Enemies? So that if Geronces had not forgot what I did in that Battel, he would perhaps have advertis'd Gratian's Counsellours, that it is not an easie thing to stop Constantine's passage, if he have a Sword in his hand. I remember very well, said Geronces, that fortune was very favourable to your courage against the Picts. But, Sir, added he very insolently, I cannot tell whether it be fitting for you to remember it your self. For, to say truth, I find that that good success has too much swell'd your heart, and that such boasting has almost made me lose that respect which I owe to the Prince of Armorica. Oh! 'tis more than needs, said Constantine interrupting him, and laying his hand upon his Sword——— "Hold, Geronces, hold, Guards, (at that very moment cryed out Loecinia, entering the Chamber, and seeing so many Swords drawn) "and if you intend to save your life from the punishment that the attempt deserves, lift "not your impious hands against the Son of a great King. And you, Prince, (said she, addressing her self to Constantine) I beseech you to moderate your anger, I see you have "reason to be surpris'd; but consider, I beseech you, that a King jealous of his Honour, is "apt to follow those ways of prevention which may seem very strange, yet such as weighty "considerations render excusable. You came into our Kingdom after a suspicious manner, which gave his Privy Council the Alarm, and they awak'd the King, so that notwithstanding all the power which they say I have in the Court, they will not so much "as hear me when I speak in your behalf; all that I could do was only to make haste in person, to the end they might only execute Gratian's orders in the most obliging manner that could be, and that they should deny you nothing that was either necessary "or convenient. In the mean time I beseech you, Sir, stay in this Apartment, and I will "employ all my reputation——— I find that reputation of yours is very great, said the Prince, interrupting her, But, Madam, since it behoves me to receive with submission such proofs thereof as a person of your Sex and Quality is pleas'd to give me, at your desire I will stay, and assure your self, Madam, that happen what will, I will never complain of the King of Great Britain; Geronces however will not do amiss to consider who I am, and if he forgets that I am one day to reign over some part of Gallia, I hope your Majesty will not be offended if I put him in mind of it, and that I maintain the rights and privileges of my Birth, at a time when they are least suspected.

Loecinia apprehending without an interpreter the last words which Constantine spoke, went her way, lest she should farther provoke him, "I leave you, Sir, said she, and I promise you that Geronces shall not come into your presence but when you shall think it convenient. "In the mean time, said she with a low voice, I will endeavour to bring to pass those designs which you know concern you; and so that if you will not oppose my intentions, you "shall be suddenly at liberty with a greater increase of power.

The Prince summon'd up all the Generosity of his Soul to moderate his disdain. And though he soon apprehended the ingratitude which they shew'd, and the injustice which they did him, yet instead of being transported, he considered with an admirable prudence who who the person was that persecuted him, and how much it lay in her power to ruine Oſavia. That laſt thought drew many ſighs from his heart, ſo that Loerina was hardly gone forth of the Chamber, but he gave way to an immeaſurable grief. He repreſented to himſelf the hardſhip which the cruel Queen by all appearance, cauſed the fair Princeſs of Albion to undergo. And ſo lively was his affliction, that he forgot himſelf to preſerve Oſavia in his mind. Or it by chance he called to mind the unfortunate Prince of Armorica, 'twas only to redouble his Anguiſh, only to accuſe the Queen for having ſent away Oſavia. In ſhort, Madam, the rigorous uſage which Oſavia was like to endure, touch'd the paſſionate Conſtantine ſo far to the Quick, that his eyes became inſenſibly moiſt, and that very day offer'd the firſt fruits of their Tears to Love. While my Maſter feels them trickling down his checks, and with ſurpriſe took notice of this new proof of his own tenderneſs, Loerina treats hand over head with the King of the Piſts, ſhe put him in great hopes, and obtained an Iſland for him, the poſſeſſion whereof ſo long contended for, had been the occaſion of many Wars between the two Nations. For as concerning the Frontiers, Madam, you know that the Emperour Pertinax had made a ſeparation, and that he had raiſed a great wall from Sea to Sea, to hinder the continual invaſions of two people, always naturally at enmity one with another.

If the King of the Piſts appeared ſo well contented, to return to his own Kingdom to preſerve them from the Hibernians, I departed out of Troynovant nothing ſo well ſatisfied; for ſo ſoon as I underſtood how they had ſerv'd Conſtantine, having no reaſon to be in fear of his perſon, becauſe I already knew Loerina's affliction, without ſtaying to complain or intreat; I made haſt to our Army with all extraordinary diligence: I was no ſooner got thither but I urg'd very zealouſly, the ſtrange violence that was offer'd to our Prince. I ſent a declaration to the Camp of the native Britains, wherein I ſet forth the contrivances of the Queen of Albion, and the inſolencies of her favourite: But not daring to declare what I thought of the paſſionate Loerina, I let them ſee that ſhe had aſſaulted the Prince of Armorica, only becauſe he had ſerv'd her faithfully, and was well beloved in Troynovant. The greateſt part of Gratin's Army were in love with the valour and perſon of Conſtantine, and for that cauſe hating Loerina's injuſtice, a good part forſook their own General, and joyn'd with us. By that means I found I had the command of forty thouſand men, and hereupon I wrote to the King to give him an account of all things, and to deſire him to ſend more forces: and underſtanding that they had ſent for Maximus, I advanced between Troynovant and the Sea toward the mouth of the River Thamſis; both to make my ſelf Maſter of the River, and to favour the landing of the Gauls which I knew the King would ſuddenly ſend me, and to hinder the conjunction of Maximus and Geronces. In the mean time the fierce Queen to moderate thoſe troubles, the violence whereof ſhe could not brook in her heart, returned to viſit Conſtantine: and ſuffering her ſelf to be transported by the heat of her paſſion, ſhe ſpoke with ſo much vehemence and ſo loud; that the jealous Geronces being got to the door, and hearing all very attentively, loſt not one title of that familiar diſcourſe. What Prince, cryed the Queen, are you immoveable? will you have a kindneſs for no other but a perſon that never will be yours? do you not fear the power of a Princeſs of my humour, when once deſiſ'd? "Ah unjuſt Loerina, ſaid Geronces at the ſame time, will you always reſuſe the heart "which I offer you, to aſſail another which you will be never Miſtreſs of? Cruel Queen! "when will you forbear to perſecute Conſtantine, Oſavia, and Geronces? Fate will have it "that the Prince of Armorica muſt enjoy the Princeſs of Albion, and ordains me for you. "Oppoſe not the decrees of deſtiny, and if my ſufferings cannot mollifie the hardneſs of "your heart, fear at leaſt what that perſon can do, whoſe courage you ſo well know, yet "whoſe moſt violent and ſubmiſſive paſſion that ever was, you will not vouchſafe to take "notice of.

While he thus whiſper'd to himſelf, the deſperate Loerina could obtain from Conſtantine, nothing but marks of reſpect and ſubmiſſion: when perceiving her fierceſneſs begin to change into rage; ſhe ſlung out in ſuch a manner, as if ſhe thought to make him apprehend ſome terrible conſequence, of the fury that appeared in her eyes. However ſhe remembered what ſhe had promiſed to my Maſter, that Geronces ſhould not appear in his preſence, but when he approved it: and notwithstanding all her choler, ſeeing ſhe could not forbear to keep her word, ſhe left one of the Officers that guarded Conſtantine, to ſee the Prince from time to time, with orders however to yield an exact obedience in every thing elſe to Geronces, in whom ſhe had the greateſt confidence. And that ſhe might not diſpleaſe that great miniſter of her will and pleaſure, ſhe choſe an Officer who was beholding to Geronces for his being: being alſo brother of that commander, to whom the fierce Britain had given the charge of Oſavia when ſhe was ſent to Syſmbriz, and had left to guard the houſe where that amiable

Princess recided: whereby Locrinia testified to Geronces, that she gave him a Lieutenant and not an observer, and that she did far less suspect him than seek to appease his grief. She made a full interpretation of her meaning, yet in forbidding her conceal'd lover from entering into the Prince's Chamber, she raised in his mind disturbances not to be express'd, nor were her own less violent, for she no sooner shewed her self in publick, but she was inform'd how the people murmur'd, and that I was escap'd from Troynovant and gone to the Army, and that I would soon be upon my march, to revenge the affront and injury done to the Prince.

At that news the passionate Queen was afraid, lest her beloved Viridonix would be taken from her: so that feeling in her soul a mixture of love, despair and rage, she resolv'd to make her last assault upon Constantine, or to lose him rather than yield him up to a Rival whom she mortally hated. In the mean time Geronces walking to and fro, taking large steps and revolving in his mind, all the words that he had heard so cruel in relation to himself; Wilt thou suffer, said he to himself, wilt thou suffer a stranger to come and reduce thee, to the utmost extremity of despair? Tear up that heart from the root, that deprives thee of the heart of that ingrateful Princess whom thou adorest. And since this arm accusom'd to great crimes has perpetrated more hainous deeds upon less urgent necessity, without farther deliberation, sheath thy dagger into the breast of the too happy Constantine. Revenge thy self, Geronces, revenge thy self upon this Locrinia, and deprive her of the sight of a Prince whom she loves, and who may possibly be induc'd to love her. But (said he, pursuing the dictates of his discontent, after he had paused a little while) wherein can the felicity of Constantine consist, and what can be the end of thy revenge? The Prince of Armorica ardently sighs after the Princess of Albion whom he cannot see, and he is persecuted without ceasing by a person whom he cannot love. Constantine is then the cause of my misfortune against his will, and I should be more unjust than Locrinia, should I make an attempt upon his life, at a time when he withstands, with so much constancy, the most powerful charms of a beautiful and great Queen. These arguments however would not move me, since that in him I neither seek my satisfaction nor my grandeur: But what can I expect from the death of Constantine? Shall I commit an extraordinary crime in vain? I that never perpetrated any but what were very advantageous? Locrinia, the passionate Locrinia, has chang'd her love which she has for Constantine, into an implacable hatred of Geronces: and the unfortunate Geronces shall be constrained, to pass the rest of his sad days in exile, or to be tormented to death in Troynovant according to the merit of his crimes. Yet would that death be less terrible, than that which would succeed it: and I tremble when I think that Locrinia should love the memory of Constantine while she lives, and that mine should be by her detested to her last breath. What course am I then to take, shall I suffer Locrinia every day to behold her beloved Constantine? Or shall I wait till that Prince be smitten with a beauty, who can never meet with a heart insensible? No, no, I will no longer guard the Prince of Armorica for the Queen of Albion, no longer will I hold him imprisoned for her to satisfy every day her unjust passion with his company, Nor will Geronces be the instrument of his own ruine, to please the ingrateful Queen whom he adores. Since I cannot be the death of Constantine without destroying my self, I will give him his liberty, and by forcing from Locrinia a Prince who I fear will not long resist her charms, I will facilitate a means as a cure for that unjust person, that persecutes both them and renders me miserable. Let us then no longer consider, but seek out a way speedily to put what we resolve in execution, and let us deceive the jealous Locrinia, if we intend not that she should turn all her fury upon us. Concluding those words he took large steps, pondering till night upon the various ways most probable to bring about his design.

He had no sooner pitch'd upon that which he thought most unlikely to fail, but he went to the Prince of Armorica, and after he had given him such testimonies of submission, as were not ordinary with him, that there was now an alteration in his mind; he thus began. "Sir, said he, I was your Enemy when I thought I serv'd the King my master in being so: "But now I know the Queen's thoughts, and that I cannot any longer assist him or further "his intentions; I come to give the Prince of Armorica his liberty, and to deliver into his "possession the fair Princess who is destin'd for him. This is too pleasing to be refused though "you hated the person that should make the offer, and therefore I hope that you will willingly accept it, and that this last of my Actions will utterly deface the memory of all my former Treasons. Nor do I think that I run any hazard in doing you this service, for you "will doubtless not only keep this secret for me, on which my fortune and my life absolutely depend, but that you will protect me in Gallia, should I be forced to seek for Sanctuary.

This language made Constantine behold the Britain very earnestly, and though magnanimous persons persons are not easily apt to have any distrust; he would not presume presently to determine any thing, being willing carefully to examine a discourse wherein the interest of the Princess was concern'd. He was suspicious lest the cruel Queen should know precisely, what Constantine had in his heart for Octavia through Geronces's double diligence, and lest he might be hatching some new mischief, against that fair and innocent creature. However those thoughts lasted not long, for besides that his frank and generous disposition, was not naturally apt to be suspicious; Geronces spake with such an aspect, as easily perswaded him that he did not go about to betray his thoughts. He told him word for word what he had heard from Lacrinia's mouth, and not being absolutely able to conceal the affection which he had for the Princess, he suffered himself to be guided by the particular interest which Geronces had, that Constantine should depart from Troynovant. My Matter therefore demurred no longer, for instead of considering what caution he should observe for himself, he minded nothing but the Princess: and therefore presently enquired of him by what means he could set her at liberty. Sir, replied the Britain, that you may be quit of all trouble, I will take care of all, and in two hours you shall be free, and in a condition to go see the Princess, of whom they cannot in justice dispute with you the enjoyment. In the mean time take it not amiss that I leave you, that without losing a moment of time, I may use my diligence to prepare all things necessary for your departure.

Concluding these words he went forth of the Chamber, to find out the Officer which Loecrinia had constituted his Lieutenant, and speaking to him in such a manner as testified the weight of the matter, which he had to deliver to him; Silirus, said he, 'tis time for me to discover to you the intentions of the Queen, and the reason which moved her to leave Constantine in your charge. You must know then that now she repents of the injury she has done to the Prince; for hearing that the people murmur at it, she is afraid lest they should rescue him out of her hands, and lest Dinocus, who is gone from Troynovant, should be got to the Army, with an intention to return with his forces to favour the rebellion. She would willingly avoid insurrections which are generally dangerous, especially among us Britains: and by giving Constantine his liberty take away the true occasion of the peoples complaint. However she does not shew any change in her resolution, which would be a sign of fear and weakness, and therefore to preserve the constancy of her courage to outward appearance, she rather chuses to act by a faithful Agent, than appear her self. She casts her eyes upon us, she prefers us before all the rest of her favourites, and seeing that my proceedings with Constantine already dispose him to have a confidence in me, you alone shall put the Queen's design in execution, and alone receive the reward of a service so important: only manage this affair with speed and all the secrecy that she requires: and as soon as Constantine is gone, return hither to this Chamber, to take new orders which I am going to receive from the Queen.

Silirus overjoyed with such an opportunity to serve Loecrinia, greedily hearkned to Geronces, and being both of great reputation in the King's house, seeing both were the Queens favourites who had all things at her command, they had no sooner consulted together but they found the means to bring their contrivance to a good issue. Silirus discharged the Guards that were to wait at the Prince's Chamber door, and afterwards he went to the Palace-Gate to see how he might get out there: and finding no difficulty, having resolved to disguise my Master, and himself to accompany him till he was out of danger, he commanded horses to be brought to a certain place which he named: and in the mean time he wrote to his brother, who commanded at Sosimbra, ordering him in the Queen and Geronces name to obey the Prince of Armorica, to seek his favour, to let him see the Princess, and to permit him to carry her away. The Queen thinking it convenient to conclude the marriage between those two illustrious persons, for reasons of state that had relation to Maximus, and the King of the Picts. So soon as he had finished his letter he went to Constantine, and addressing himself to him; Sir, said he, (not to lose any time which is precious to you) I will not stand to make you any long protestations which are to little purpose, instead of telling you that it is by my means that you recover your liberty: I am only to inform you that the Princess resides in one of the King's houses called Sosimbra, that the Officer that commands that place is my brother, with whom you have no more to do, but to shew him that note to be brought into Octavia's company, and to receive from the Britains who guard her, all the respect which they owe to a Prince of your birth. You are now only to change your habit as soon as you can: Those servants which you have left are ready to attend you, and in a word you are only to let us alone to act, without making any doubt of the issue, and not to give your self the trouble of examining the reason of things. Constantine no sooner read the letter which Silirus gave him, but he perceived his hopes and his joy to increase, and putting on a riding habit, he earnestly desired to leave Troynovant. To that end he lost not one moment, but went forth with Silirus as privately as he could, and he had no sooner mounted one of these admirable Nags which are bred in Albion, but he made all the speed imaginable to that fortunate place where he was once more to see the Divine Princes.

While he is posting away with all expedition, Sylirus returns to the Chamber where Geronces promised to attend him, to give him new orders in the Queen's name; but he was no sooner entred (see what confidence there is, Madam, in a wicked Politician) but the perfidious person whom he went to find, gives him three or four stabs with his Dagger, and lays him dead at his feet, for fear that miserable and unfortunate man should destroy his pretences, and overturn his good fortune by revealing the secret. After he had taken that bloody way of prevention, he goes to the Queen's Apartment, and though it were very late, and the Queen a bed, he desired to see her, the more to testify the earnestness of his zeal; Ab, Madam, said he, with a countenance strangely discomposed, all's lost, the Prince of Arinorica has made his escape. How, (said the passionate Queen, interrupting him, with a look that plainly shewed the trouble of her mind) is Constantine no longer in our power? Ab, Geronces! that's impossible; you did not consider the news that you bring. 'Tis too true, said he, and Sylirus, the Traitor Sylirus, who by your directions had only liberty to speak with the Prince, is ——— Perfidious Sylirus, unfaithful Subject, (cried she, impatiently interrupting him) thou shalt be tormented to death, all the power of Aldroec shall not defend thee from the punishment which the enormity of thy crime deserves. In the mean time, said she with the same impetuous violence, lose not a moment of time, get Horses ready, let him be pursued, and afterwards come and tell me what you know of Sylirus's treason: flee Geronces, flee, and if the people which you send can overtake Constantine, let them bring him civilly back, and lay the offender in chains. The offender is punished already, replied the confident Britain, for I no sooner perceiv'd that Constantine was gone, and that Sylirus had given several instructions to his Guards to let Constantine pass, but my arm, diligently accustomed to serve your Majesty, sheathed my Dagger in his perfidious breast. Thus he vomited up his black Soul with his treacherous blood, just as he was preparing to follow Constantine, that he might make advantage of his crime.

Immediately those words gave some consolation to Loctrinia; but when she began to consider that Sylirus was not in a condition to suffer any farther punishment, she felt a double disturbance, and thought of turning all her fury upon Geronces; however, before she would suffer her self to be transported against a person, who, as she believ'd, bestir'd himself in revenging the injury done to her, she considered that heat of passion might excuse the act; besides that she had need of his assistance at this very time, to make good the pursuit of Constantine; which she commanded him once more to go about; when Geronces after a little pause, Madam, said he, I cannot tell what Road he has taken; but since we have no certain knowledge, let us now study what course to take, without doubt Constantine is gone to the Army, for besides that his warlike humour carries him headlong to revenge, he knows not where else in all our Island to secure himself. He will never take shipping presently to return for Gallia, for fear of being known and stop't in some of our ports, so that I have nothing more to do, but to take Cambridge-Road, and prepare my self to be gone, if your Majesty thinks fit, and take charge of the Army: and to fight, if need be, the Gaulish Britains. There is no need of that, replied she, 'tis better to take Constantine by stratagem, than ingratesfully to assault his life. Go, Geronces, go and dispatch those orders I have given you, and return as soon as may be, that you may assist me either to dispel my cares, or help me to consult what farther course to take.

Upon those words the Britain left her, and while his disconsolate Mistress gave herself entirely up to her tormenting grief, he in outward appearance takes care to execute her orders, causing them that he sent in pursuit to follow a quite contrary Road from that which he knew Constantine had taken. In the mean time a confused noise was spread in Troynovant, that Constantine was murdered: that the Queen and Geronces did but pretend his escape to hide their crime; and that those two ambitious persons desiring to reign without obstruction, had found a means to rid themselves of a virtuous and valiant Prince that stood in their way, and would have opposed their tyranny. By little and little this rumour increased, and besides this, they reported that Gratian's Forces were united with ours, and that I was marching toward Troynovant at the head of a powerful Army; the people grew bold, and no sooner had they found out a considerable person, and an Enemy of Geronces's to head them, but that they took up Arms and required to see Constantine; but my Prince instead of appearing in a City where he was innocently like to be the occasion of great troubles, made what haste he could from it, and rode with all speed to Sosimbra where he arriv'd in less than five hours.

See here a part of the adventures of Constantine, I shall give you a relation of the rest when

when you think convenient, wherein your Majesty shall find something more moving than what you have already heard. The fair Queen of the Tuvingens had a great desire to know where so many extraordinary accidents that composed the History of Constantine would terminate. But she would not presume to request Dinocus to pursue his Relation, fearing it would take up too long time, and keep him too long absent from his beloved Master, who might stand in need of his assistance: therefore she contented her self only to return him thanks; and to testify how attentive she had been, she repeated to him many passages of the History of the King of the Britains, insinuating thereby, that she desired to hear the rest as soon as might be. At length she turn'd toward Balamir, who hearing her so carefully to give him thanks for being himself so punctual to bring Dinocus according to his promise, that obliging Prince well understood what that discourse meant; and therefore having only spoken some few things in honour of the valiant Constantine, with all the generosity that a heart exempt from envy could express, he undertook once more to bring Dinocus again, when she would be pleas'd to appoint her time: so that he had no sooner visited the King of Great Britain, and taken that care which he thought necessary for his health, but he returned in his Chariot together with Dinocus to the Castle, where he found that Amalazontha was retired to her Chamber, having stay'd that Evening but a very little while with the charming Queen of the Cimbrians, and the amiable Princess of Suevia, to the end she might be at leisure to hear the remaining part of the Story of the famous Constantine. To which purpose the Prince of the Huns being seated, Dinocus who was constrained to take a Chair also at the request of the Queen, he continued his recital as follows.

A Continuation of the History of Constantine.

MY Master was no sooner arriv'd at Sosimbra, but he shew'd the Letter of Sylirus, and made himself known to the Officers in chief: thereupon he was received with as much respect as he could have expected in his Father's Court. Presently he enquir'd what time it would be before Ocavia would be stirring, testifying by his earnestness that he counted every minute lost till he could see that incomparable person: Sir, answered the Britain, the Princess having left the Court, she has also left the Court-Customs for the manner of the Country, for she is up very early in this House, and you may find her in the Garden where she is now walking, and taking the fresh air, as she does every morning, and much about this hour.

Upon those words my Master felt a pleasing alteration, and causing the Brother of Sylirus to lead the way, he went to find out the fair Princess of Albion. Presently he saw two of her Virgins who were talking together, as they walk'd slowly toward a Fountain of Marble in the middle of a large Grass-plot. The Prince went to meet them, and he was no sooner come near, but he perceiv'd that he was known as well by their surprize, as by their respectful carriage toward him. He accosted them, and civilly saluted them; but it not being in his power to talk of any other than one person that entirely busied his imaginations: I hope, said he very cheerfully, you will give me leave to inquire after the fair Princess, and to go and make my obedience to her, if you think it be not inconvenient. Sir, (replied one of the Damsels, the same that introduc'd him before into Ocavias' presence, when he pass'd for Viridonix) you have not only that liberty, said she, but I dare presume to say that the injury which you receiv'd at Troynovant, did too much grieve the Princess, to make me believe that she can see you now at liberty with an ordinary satisfaction. She is in that Arbour, (said the Virgin, shewing him the place, and preparing her self to be his guide) and you will find no person with her, but one of our fellow-servants that keeps her company.

At those words the Prince seem'd to be somewhat discompos'd: for the fancy of Lovers being more quick and lively than the imagination of other men, he had a thousand different thoughts came crowding into his mind all at one time, which it would be too troublesome to express, it will suffice to say that he had a great desire to over-hear Ocavia before he had notice of his coming, that he might understand her real thoughts. By and by accusing himself of indiscretion, he repented of that with as of a crime, and his heart begg'd pardon of the Princess; but immediately a quite contray motion caus'd him to change his mind, and all of a sudden he desires the same far more ardently than before. His love inscalous to flatter him, that it was less for his advantage than for Octavia's, commanding him to inform himself of whatever might relate to the fair Princess, to the end he might be able to serve her, without expecting either her entreaty or confession. In short, the modest Prince was thereby in hopes to understand over and above, her most secret thoughts, not presuming to believe that the divine person whom he ador'd, would enter into any discourse of him. but rather of Gratian or Locrinia, it being his design to support with his own Arms and the power of the King, whatever resolution she should take. Thus his reason agreeing with his love, or else being abus'd thereby he determin'd to go alone: to which purpose he had no sooner declared his pleasure to the two Damofels, that they might continue their walk by themselves, but Lisca, who was the person that was said to be the brother of Silvius, caus'd them to stop, understanding his meaning by vertue of that ready and discerning wit, which they that are bred under great personages do acquire above others. He also stay'd himself with Octavia's Attendants, the better to shew his respect to Constantine: for finding the Prince to be disguised, they were of opinion that he had a design to put some merry surpise in gallantry upon the Princess, and therefore let him walk by himself, it not being necessary for them to attend Octavia who had other company.

My Master transported with a secret joy, very carefully mov'd toward the place which enclosed all that could render him happy in the world, but being come pretty near he pac'd it after a different manner and whatever were his curiosity, he could not betake himself to listen without a certain fear that assail'd his trembling heart, so apprehensive was he lest he should displease the Princess. After he had heard certain words of which he did not well understand the sense, by reason of their coherence with others that were before, he perceived the Princess to continue the following discourse. No no, Gadena, I believe nothing of it, forbear to flatter me, I do not find but that I am the most unfortunate person in the world. How Madam, (impatiently replied the Virgin that was with her) will you labour to persecute your self, and when you stop my mouth from speaking of those advantages, which heaven has liberally bestowed in your favour, will you not permit me to tell you at least what you cannot deny? Are you not the only Daughter and Heiress of a puissant King? Are you not ordained for——— I agree with you, said Octavia interrupting her, that the King my Father reigns in one of the fairest Monarchies of Europe, and that nature seems to promise me the inheritance of his dominions. But Gadena, thou knowest Gratian, thou knowest Locrinia, and thou knowest that my rights are not very well assured. Though the Queen were more bold and more unjust than she is, replied Gadena, or that the King were yet more tractable to her, Our people love you too well, Madam, not to oppose themselves to all changes that shall threaten your prejudice. Our Islanders are of a strange humour, replied the Princess, and few Nations have seen so many revolutions in their countries, as our Ancestors have been forced to submit to in this. You will have an illustrious husband, replied Gadena, to whom all the Britains will be overjoyed to submit themselves with one consent, and under whom they will live happily in their Island. 'Tis uncertain, replied Octavia, whether the heart of Constantine——— How Madam, replied Gadena interrupting her, can you question the fidelity of that Prince? Content your self, replied the Princess of Albion, that you understand my weakness, without pretending that I should discover how far it may extend. Have I not confessed to thee that I have no unkindness for Constantine? I should be too much ashamed to tell thee all that I feel, and with what a fear in my heart the affection which I have for Constantine is accompanied. Madam, replied Gadena, never fear for that Prince he will be taken care of no doubt: for I am very much deceived if he be hated, by those persons that caus'd him to be seized upon. I do not fear his life, replied the Princess, but I fear———

As she concluded those words, not presuming to proceed any farther, my Master leaped for joy, and was just upon the point to have entred into the Arbour, to have thrown himself at Octavia's feet, and to have return'd her thanks: But he was so fearful of displeasing her, by surprizing her at a time when her thoughts seem'd to be so favourable to him; that he moderated his transportation: when the dutiful Gadena pursuing her discourse; "Madam, said she, let that be the least of your fear lest Constantine should prove untrue: For the Prince loved you at the first sight, and he will always love you: Nay I am less apprehensive of any change in his heart, than of the humour of those that persecute your Amours. I see very well, replied Octavia, that thou hast not considered so well as I, the carriage of the Prince of Armorica: for thou believest him to be as constant in friendship as in danger. As for my part I judge after a different manner, for I have a certain niceness of imagination, that will not suffer me to think that ever Constantine was in love with me at Dover. Is it possible Madam, said she, that you should speak as you really think? How, replied Octavia with some discomposure, shall Constantine come into this Island to see me, to espouse me? shall he have heard a thousand Encomiums of the Princess appointed for him; for

“it is usual upon such occasions as these to flatter persons of my Sex; and shall this Prince, notwithstanding his pretences and his hopes, notwithstanding all things that were to highly spoken in my praise, no sooner set his foot upon the land, but to please his own humour, fall in love with the first Virgin that he sees, and shall not this be an affront to a Princess, the Heiress to so puissant a Kingdom? But, Madam, readily replied Gadens, are not you the person that Constantine ought to love, and the very person that he lov'd at first sight? I agree with you, replied the Princess, but acknowledge withal that he did not know me, and that there was a bare chance intermix'd with that engagement. Rather, said Gadens, it was your particular destinies that made the same impression upon both your hearts at the same time. Constantine presently singled out his Princess from the Ladies that environ'd her; he lov'd her in despite of all those objections that seem'd to oppose the birth of his passion. And you your self felt for Constantine, as you have had the goodness to tell me, what you never felt before, though you knew him for no other than but a common Knight. Thus am I perswaded it is the will of Heaven that you should be inseparable, for the union and honour of both Britains, and for a stronger tie it has bestowed upon you both those sympathizing excellencies, that it is impossible for Constantine to be taken from you, as it is very improbable that you should prefer any more fortunate Rival to that Prince. 'Tis true, continued the Princess, that I do not find my self inclin'd to change my affections for Constantine. But I am perswaded that Constantine will not be so constant to me; and my heart continually tells me that one day I shall find him unfaithful.

Those words made the Prince tremble, as if he had been struck with a Thunderbolt; nor was he longer master of his passion: he entred into the Harbour, threw himself at Ostavia's feet, and embrac'd her knees before she had time to recollect who he was: Rather, Madam, rather shall this Island be shaken from its foundation by the surges that continually beat upon the Shore, sooner shall the solid mass of earth become the sport of the winds, and all the world be turn'd topsie turvey, before the heart of Constantine shall change. Ah, Madam, (said he, lifting up his eyes toward the countenance of the fair Princess) how could a thought so cruel enter into your breast? And which of my actions has given the ground of so strange a distrust? Ah, Prince, cry'd she, what have you heard? What have you done?

She could say no more, so great was her surprize; but resting her head with a soft and pleasing languishment upon Gadens's Shoulder, she meditated upon what she had to say before she raised her head. The shame that made her blush, and caused her to cast her eyes downward, giving some little addition to her beauty: Constantine, whatever were his fears of displeasing his divine Princess, was transported with love and joy: so true it is, that the presence of the beloved object has those secret charms that are able to expel or suspend all other passions. But my Master made her a hundred protestations of an immoveable constancy; he told Ostavia whatever a most sensible affection could inspire into him. And there was something so respectful and passionate in his gesture, and in his aspect, and the sound of his words, that the astonish'd Princess began by little and little to collect her self: she presum'd at length to cast her eyes upon the enamour'd Prince, and that fear that hung upon her looks insensibly changing into an admirable sweetness, that wonderful person was at last able to pronounce these words, Is it possible, Constantine, said she, that you should constrain me to appear disturb'd for beholding you at liberty, and that I should not be permitted to feel that innocent satisfaction which I hop'd for from such a pleasing sight?

Concluding those words, she rose, and though my Master would have held her by the Gown, and that the obliging Gadens spoke to her, that modest Princess could not resolve longer to sustain the presence of a Prince, whom she believ'd to be privy to her most secret thoughts. Thereupon she went forth, and it was not without some small discomposure that she suffered my Master to lend her his hand, as she walk'd toward the Garden-door, being return'd, she went into her Apartment, desiring to be alone in her Chamber, and intimating to my Master her intention, the Prince found all his joy to languish, and quitted the charming Daughter of Gratan in a manner so respectful, that the too severe and timid Princess was mollish'd therewith. Constantine also receiv'd sufficient testimonies thereof so soon as he was permitted to return to visit her, without displeasing or interrupting her, not being able to defer his visit long, that he might propose her a means to secure her from the persecution of Loecinia. In short, he was so charm'd with the sweet carriage of Ostavia, so encouraged by the justice of his pretences, which Gratan and Aldroec had both authoris'd, and so ventrous withal, out of the fear which he had lest his fair Princess should be expos'd to new troubles, that beholding her with eyes inflam'd, and sparkling with the fire of his passion, Madam, it is time, said he, to shake off a yoke which is too severe and hard to be born: Heaven that created me to carry your fetters, has ordain'd me to break those chains which they who tyrannize over you, would load your limbs withal. The King your Father will be overjoyed that we have taken a resolution that he durst not advise us to, and you shall reign in Armorica with Aldroec, while I return into this Island to make Gratian the true King, and compel Locrinia to act with more advisedness toward you. Never study upon the business, Madam, withdraw your self from a power to which you stoop with too much submission, and no longer let injustice so cruelly oppress innocency. "Ah, Prince! replied Octavia, what is this which you advise me to? "That which I ought to do, said the Prince, and that which it concerns you to do, if you intend to live in peace. "That tranquility which you tell me of, must not be so dear to me as my Honour, and I wonder you should make me such a proposal, to follow you into your Country, before Heaven and my Father have ordain'd it.

At this denial the afflicted Constantine sigh'd; but the passion that inspired him, never wanting an Expedient, "Madam, said he, Lisca shall be your convoy; for the unhappy Constantine refuses that advantage, I will stay in this Island till affairs shall put on a better face; and while you recal me with the consent of Gratian. After all this will you be an enemy to your repose and mine, obstinately to oppose my designs? "Do not you continue so obstinate, said she, in urging your persuasions, I neither will, nor can consent to your resolution; and you would questionless change it your self, did you but know my heart: yet though I am absolutely determin'd to do what it behoves me, I am not altogether so unapprehensive to withstand what you propose so rigorously as I ought; besides that, to tell you ingenuously, I am strangely disturb'd, when I consider that you came hither by night, that you were disguised in my Chamber, and that you discours'd me in private, I know very well that I am not the less innocent, yet these circumstances seem never a jot the less criminal, or at least to be some suspicious mystery, and to create a fear in my Breast. Therefore, Prince, be gone from Sosimbra, leave a Virgin who is too careful both of her own honour and yours, to detain you longer in this House. But when you are gone, remember I beseech you that I am beholding to Gratian for my being, and that you cannot revenge your self upon Locrinia, without offending the King my Father. "It will be no difficult thing, answered he, to obey your commands in relation to the King and Queen of Albion: but, my honoured Princess, can I leave the place where you reside? And to satisfy those groundless scruples that possess your mind, must the real passion that reigns in mine, endure that I should absent my self from you, that I should deprive my self of your sight, and that I should abandon you to the cruelty of an enemy that triumphs over the most gentle and amiable Princess that ever was.

He pursued that discourse with so much ardency, and his language was very persuasive; yet he spent his words in vain, for the Princess continued firm in her resolution, insomuch that Constantine, interrupted by his sighs, could not continue his discourse. He beheld Octavia with an aspect very amorous, but very pensive, he threw himself at her feet, and all to dispose her to a compliance; and as the charming Princess went to raise him, the unfortunate Prince had at least the kind comfort to kiss one of her fair hands, without observing in her eyes any symptom of anger: but as he was striving with himself to bid her adieu, yet had not the power to do it, Lisca entred the Chamber, and presenting an open Letter to the Princess, "Madam, said he, sighing, see there what news I have received; and after you have understood who the Officer is that brought it, be so good as together with the Prince, to give me your orders what to do, in relation to what service I can perform for either him or you. Concluding those words in such a manner as testified both his surprise and his trouble, the Princess took the Letter, and casting her eyes upon it, read these Lines.

Lenox to Lisca.

Sylirus has procured the escape of the Prince of Armorica, and Geronces, too passionate for the interest of the Queen has slain your generous and unfortunate Brother, having given him four mortal wounds with his dagger: expect not however consolatory complements at a time when you must shew more vigour than sadness, only take my advice for your future caution. Know then that the people of this City have taken Arms, that the honest party grows very strong, and that those Forces that fought against the Picts are entirely disbanded. As for your part, keep you the Gates of Sosimbra fast, and without acknowledging Locrinia's orders defend the place, and and keep the Princess safe. Farewel. Fear nothing, we are in a condition to uphold you; and the Officer whom I have sent will give you a farther account of all things.

The Princess had no sooner read the Letter, but she seem'd extremely surpris'd, she was very much troubled for fear of her Father; nor was she altogether unmindful of Loctrinia's safety, such was her Virtue, and her Generosity. The enamour'd Prince knowing part of her thoughts, his colour chang'd, and having fix'd his sight upon Octavia's fair eyes, as it were to take counsel of them: "It had been far better, (said he sighing, and with as much grief as if he had done her some injury) that Constantine had died in Sylirus's stead, than that he should, though innocently, have occasion'd the trouble which he observes in your face. But be confident, Madam, that I will be in Troynovant within these few hours, and soon appease the tumult; and I promise you, your Father shall be suddenly more absolute than ever he was; not that I intend to injure the Queen; your generosity and mine, if I may presume to say so, will sufficiently secure her from our anger; but it may be, I may somewhat limit the exorbitancy of her power, and make her look upon the illustrious Princess of Albion according to her merits. Only before I depart I beg your pardon for the people that love you, and do not hate me, and that you will grant me the favour to believe me guilty of the tumult that has given you any cause of disquiet.

The Princess answer'd Constantine in the most obliging language he could desire, and having given him to understand that she could not so patiently bear his absence as she had a little before testified the firmness of her resolution in that particular. She sent for the Officer that came from Lenox, who was a Britain considerable for his Birth and Virtue; being brought into the Princess's presence, and by her demanded what news from Troynovant: "Madam, said he, your sudden departure amaz'd all that poor City, and chang'd the face of mirth that reign'd there ever since the defeat of the Piars, into a melancholy that gave it a quite different countenance. There was not one word more of pleasure or pastime, only secret murmurings against the Queen. But when she had caused the Prince of Armorica to be seiz'd, they then began to grow bold, and to speak out. The people finding themselves depriv'd of two illustrious personages whom they infinitely ador'd; and that through the injustice and passion of a fierce Queen whom they lov'd not at all, though they saw her to be very high in power, made their complaints aloud, and met together in publick. But no sooner did they understand that Dinocus was escap'd from Troynovant, that he was got to the Army, that he had drawn to his party a good part of the Natives, and that he was advancing toward the City, but they took Arms, chose Lenox for their Captain, of whose experience and integrity they were well assured. By the orders of our new General we march'd to the Palace, demanding to see the King, and the liberty of the Prince of Armorica. The Queen, who obstinately refus'd at first to make any answer to those whom she call'd Rebels, at length caus'd it to be reported to us, that Constantine had made his escape, and had slain Sylirus that guarded him; upon that they expos'd the corpse of that unfortunate Britain to the sight of the people, but though at first they knew not what to think precisely of that accident, they were inform'd at last that Geronces had assassinated the Brother of Lisca. To this news they added that perhaps the Prince of Armorica had not been spar'd; and that Loctrinia had apparently intended to have destroyed him, after she had so much injured him as not to hope a reconciliation. That she had caused the body of Sylirus to be expos'd only to move the compassion of the people upon one of their Fellow-Citizens so cut and mangled, and to render the murderer of the unfortunate Britain odious. But our people, who are apt to believe all things that make to the disadvantage of a Princess whose humour and disposition they know, easily persuaded themselves that she had murdered the Prince of Armorica, and that adding impudence to her crime, she strove only to amuse the Islanders, by telling them that the Prince was in a place of security, and that no mischief had befallen any but Sylirus. In this interim of time two British Gauls coming disguised into the City by order of Dinocus, to observe the posture of affairs, finding how things stood, joyn'd themselves to us, and demanded their Royal Master, heavily threatening Geronces and all his Associates. They were also very diligent in fastening their Chains, and making Entrenchments in the Streets to preserve themselves, and being followed by some of the boldest of our Citizens, they seiz'd upon some of the Avenues of Gratian's Palace. True it is that Geronces made a rally that morning, and vigorously engag'd himself among us. But Lenox, much more numerous in men, and not inferiour in courage or conduct, after he had put a stop to his first fury, easily beat him back, and drove him to the very Draw-Bridge of the Palace.

"However,

“ However, without being puff up with this first success, he humbly besought the King, to pardon his subjects, if they were forced to have recourse to the last extremity, for the preservation of his own Authority: protesting that his Majesty should always find in him, and in all the rest of the Britains that followed him, all the fidelity that he could lawfully claim, and that they had not taken Arms, but to oppose the extravagant power of those persons, that robbed him of the sovereign Authority: and to obtain the Return of the Princess, and the Liberty of Constantine. Gratian seem'd very much concern'd, but as he was about to make answer, favourably enough without doubt, the fierce Loerinia took upon her to speak; telling the King that it did not behove him to hearken to Rebels: that petitions delivered to him with their Swords in their hands, were no more than effectual commands: And that it was their duty to disband and submit, before they could pretend to be heard, in reference to any remonstrances or regulations whatever propounded. As for what remained, that Maximus was not far off with an Army of forty thousand Romans, and that the King of the Picts would bring other succours without delay, and in one word for all, that he ought to inflict the severest death that might be, upon those two deputies of Lenox before the Rebels faces. And she had most certainly put that violent resolution of hers in execution, if Geronces had not opposed it, laying before her the ill consequences of such an unseasonable extremity, and that in all wars how cruel soever, it was but good policy to preserve the means of treating securely.

“ Thus Madam you see the condition of the City of Troynovant, Loerinia and Geronces keep possession of the King's person, that they might make use of his name and Authority: On the other side Lenox demands that he may Act of himself without any restraint, and to provide against all contrivances of the Queen, he dispatched me in all haste to Lisez to engage him in on his side, being the justest cause. He was of opinion that the publick interest, the revenge of Silurus, the advantages which he might reap from the protection of a great Princess, having faithfully defended her, might persuade him to embrace it: nor is he deceived without doubt, since Lisez bids me Act only by your order. In the mean while Lenox and Dinocus, who kept correspondence and both arrived at the same mark, will give him all assistance he shall need: For while our Captain keeps Loerinia and her furious Champion close shut up, the General of the Britain Gauls, prepares to fight Maximus, who as they report is already put to Sea. That Roman is invited out of the glorious hope of espousing you, Madam, and to reign one day in our Isle. We will see (said the enamour'd Constantine, interrupting him and changing colour) what order the Princess will take: But considering the little need she has to fear the felicity of Maximus, I cannot apprehend that ever that Roman will carry away such an inestimable victory, or that he should be more successful in Albion than he was in Germany. Sir, (replied Octavia with a discomposur little inferiour to the Prince's) *I do not pretend to be Mistress of my self in any accident, more especially in the most important accident of my life. I depend absolutely upon the King my Father, but seeing he has often declar'd his intentions in publick, I may confess with more boldness, that it is not in such matters as these that I have in so much obedience dispos'd my heart to follow his will. Let us therefore only endeavour, to deliver the King out of those dangers that environ him, and to free me from that cruel apprehension of his life that torments me: For in short, how faithful and dutiful soever Lenox may be, I cannot chuse but fear every moment, for a Father shut up and besieged in his own house, and methinks it should behove me likewise to be with him, either to divert and prevent mischief, or to take my share of those hazards which he undergoes.* Ah Madam, cryed Constantine, to what purpose should you go thrust your self, into a City which is all up in Arms? Why should you not rely solely upon my fidelity? Is it not sufficient for me to appear in Troynovant? Is it not sufficient—— No, no, Sir, said the interrupting him, it suffices not for my assurance: for I always consider with my self, that a valiant Prince is more apt to infuse a warlike heat, than to calm a popular tumult: and that a person of my sex is far more likely to appease it, besides that to tell you truth, I cannot live at rest being absent from my Father's troubles. She uttered these words with so many marks of inward disturbance, that Constantine being in a great perplexity; Madam, said he, *the people of Troynovant that love your person, will never suffer you to enter into the Palace where the Queen is so powerful: And that commander, said he, shewing her the Officer sent by Lenox, who knows the resolutions of his party, can tell you whether they will accord to what you pretend.* 'Tis certain, replied the Britain, *that the people will never endure to see your life in the power of Loerinia, who looking upon you as the original of her mischief; may be instigated by her passion to use those extremities against our Princess, which we have all the reason to fear from her fierce and bold temper. Nor do I think, added my Master, being so generous as you are, that you would leave the place whither she has banished you, on purpose to be held* bold the dowfal of her Authority, in a City arm'd againſt her. To theſe words he added others more preſſing, and ſo faithfully promiſed in a few days to ſettle all things in quiet at Troynovant, that at length the Princes conſented to ſtay at Sofimbra.

Conſtantine took leave of her with all the reſpect, and all the paſſion that could be ſhew'd upon ſuch a ſeparation; and the charming Princeſs, whom the Laws of modeſty did not oblige to ſhew any ſtrict reſerv'dneſs towards the Prince, gave him occaſion enough to obſerve at that ſeparation a certain languiſhment in her countenance, that my Maſter did not take his leave but with a redoublement of his love and hopes. As he was going out of the Chamber he turn'd toward Liſca, and recommending the Princeſs to his care, promis'd him a Princely Reward. He teſtified after that his ſorrow for the death of Sylrus; but without upbraiding Geronce, of whoſe perfidiouſneſs he was well ſatisfied, he contented himſelf only to tell the Commander of Sofimbra, that he would only change the object of his acknowledgment, and that he himſelf ſhould now find the effects of thoſe intentions which he formerly had to favour Sylrus. After thoſe few words, addreſſing his ſpeech to the Officer that came from Lenox, he entertain'd him civilly, and while he was preparing thoſe things which were neceſſary for his departure, he took a full account of all that had paſſ'd of importance in the Capital City of the Iſlander Britains.

The End of the Second Book of the Eighth Part.

PHARAMOND.

BOOK III.

C*onſtantine* took the Road for Troynovant, breathing out his fears in ſighs; for notwithſtanding the flattery of his hopes, he could not depart from Sofimbra without an extraordinary melancholy. He accused himſelf of that ſadneſs, as of a fancy little conformable to the conſtancy of his mind, but not being able to reach the true cauſe, he apply'd his thoughts to the conſiderations of the future, to trye whether the diſcompoſure of his Soul did not forebode ſome diſaſter to come. Immediately the haughty humour of Loctrinia, the Army which Maximus lead, and the countenance which the Roman Emperour might give him, came into his mind. But inſtead of inſuſing ſo much as a ſlight apprehenſion of him, the fierceneſs of his courage did but the more provoke him; ſo that in the friendſhip of the Britains, in the good will of Gratian, and the kind expreſſions of Octavia, he found ſufficient to overcome all obſtacles that could oppoſe his honourable pretences. However, neither the grandeur of his courage, nor thoſe expreſſions of kindneſs which he had heard from Gratian's mouth, or from the the lips of the Princeſs, could ſtop the current of his anguiſh, nor was the ſight of Troynovant, where he was to be ſhortly received in triumph, ſtrong enough to diſpel the troubles that perplex'd him. So ſoon as he diſcovered the Towers of a City for which he had ſo great a kindneſs, he thought it behov'd him to make a ſtop, that he ought to keep with Lenox's meſſenger; and that it would be neceſſary before he appeared in a tumultuous City to ſend before to ſee how they ſtood affected in their different Councils.

But his generosity soon laid aside this nice way of proceeding, as an effect of fear, or of a prudence too scrupulous for a young souldier: And therefore he rode on with the same speed as before, and he was no sooner enter'd and known in Troynovant, but all the people received him with shouts and universal acclamations, Lenox, the two Britain Gauls that were associated with him, and the most considerable of the Islanders came to pay him their respects, with all earnestness, and all the demonstrations of joy they were able to express: The Soldiers and common people, disclosing their passions with more precipitation, cryed out quite overjoyed, that they ought to create Constantine Regent of the Kingdom, and that they should look upon him as the protector of the Britains.

At those bold words the Prince changed colour, and preferring the interest of the King of Albion, before his own advantages; he caused the Soldiers to assemble in a void place, to whom he represented, that the honours which they were about to confer upon him, were due to Gratian only. My friends, (said he looking upon those that stood about him) Your King has so great a love for you, that you ought to endure under his Gentle government, those little severities, which you would not be sensible of under another more rigid. 'Tis only the clemency of Gratian, from which you expect a continual happiness, that makes small evils seem considerable: But in rebelliously opposing your selves to those evils, you raise greater troubles and tumults, to appease those that are less dangerous. Flatter not your selves, my friends, for it is not for the people to regulate their Sovereign's will, should it prove as exorbitant, as their own according to Rule: 'Tis only for Heaven that anoints Kings, to change their inclinations. And I must inform you, that that Supreme Power, upon which all others depend, being an Enemy to violence, will never look down with favour, but upon your Respect and Submission.

Those words pronounc'd with a commanding utterance and a charming grace, immediately made some impression: For the Soldiers and Citizens feeling the love which they had already, now increase for a Prince so comely and so generous; Let all perish, they cried with one consent, or let the injury done to the illustrious Constantine be reveng'd, and let him reign over the Britains. Citizens of Troynovant, replyed the Prince, have I not already told you, that Gratian is your King, can you disence with your sworn fidelity, without drawing upon you the Anger of that God whom you adore? Let not the injury that I have received at all incense you, perhaps the carriage of a young man might have provok'd it, and you may think that what was done, was rather to instruct me than to do me harm. Let us therefore forget whatever has been cruelly or harshly committed, let us go and cast our selves at the King's feet: Lay down your Arms which you cannot sheath but in the bowels of your Brethren: And I promise for Gratian that he shall lay in oblivion, whatever you have enterpris'd against his prerogative, and receive you again into his favour with a paternal love.

To these words he added others more perswasive and vehement, and making use of that Authority which he had over the people, he appeas'd in less than an hour the fresh beginnings of many Tumults, and dispos'd all things to a fair way toward an accommodation. However Lenox's party were very obstinate to desire, that the Queen might no more have the sovereign Administration of the Government in her hands. And Geronces, would you believe it, Madam, Geronces himself very much contributed toward the peace, by seconding Constantine's endeavours and the desire of the people: For to please Gratian, the Prince of Armorica, and the Britains, he perswaded the King in the first place to give Oëavia to my Master. But Sir, (said he, pursuing the same proposition) it is very convenient that the Princess should be sent to the Court of Aldrocc, and that your Majesty should give Maximus to understand, that they had carried her away during the hurly burly, to unite themselves by a new alliance under the valiant Constantine, so shall you satisfy the Roman: or if he will not yield to lose his hope, however we shall not have the war in our own Territories: For besides that many reasons will hinder Maximus, from declaring himself our Enemy, he will chose rather to assail a Country, where his Riual is one day to sway the Scepter, with the conquest whereof he may obtain a fair and great Princess. But Madam this is not all. Geronces went farther, he applyed himself to the Queen, he threw himself at her feet, and after he had made her new protestations of his fidelity, he conjur'd her to yield to the necessity of the times, and to retire for some time to some one of the King's houses, about a dozen Miles from Troynovant. He promised with so much zeal and assurance, that his words enlivened with a passion that always carries with it a secret charm at last, mov'd Loecrinia and obtain'd her consent: Yet it went to her heart to give it, because her love was such that it would hardly permit her to be absent from the sight of Constantine, and her natural haughtiness scorn'd to satisfy the people that had taken Arms against her. Nevertheless besides the unwillingness she had, as bold as she was, to appear in the presence of a Prince whom she had injur'd, she had a consideration more powerful erful that obliged her to avoid his company. For spite and anger, having added their fire to that of her own temper, had put her into a Fever sufficiently painful, yet finding that in that condition, she had still leisure and opportunity to bewail the loss of her beloved Viridonix, she resolv'd to retire from Troynovant, till the recovery of her health restored her to her former vivacity. The Britains overjoyed with the success of this compoture, surceased their hatred of Geronces, believing that at length he had taken compassion of his Country, and would no longer be the instrument of the injustice of a proud Queen, who was the cause of all the mischief in the Kingdom.

The virtuous Gratian received Constantine with the tenderness of a Father, embracing him in his Arms with tears of joy in his eyes: And having reastur'd him the gift which he had already promised him, he declared him his successor: calling him by the name of his dear Son, and his only support. He sent his instructions to Sosimbra, in order to the Princesses departure for Armorica, not forgetting at the same time to send away to complement Maximus, and to inform him of the pretended conveying away of Octavia, in such a manner as Geronces had advised. In the mean time the Britain particularly entertains the Deputies that were sent to him, and my Master took care to advertise me of what pass'd, and of what I had to do. At length he resolv'd to leave Troynovant to follow his Mistress, notwithstanding the plays and divertisements with which the Britains laboured to entertain him. But the King and the people oppos'd themselves to his design, with such pressing and persuasive entreaties, that they prevail'd with him to stay, testifying their desire that he should be present, at the Assemblies which were to be called for the regulating the Government. These seasonable Honours made the Prince to sigh, but though Octavia was continually in his thoughts, he was nevertheless always present at such councils to which he was called: where he was admired by all persons for his perfect prudence. While he seem'd to be wholly busied in these affairs of weight, a courier arriv'd that brought news, which altogether surpris'd the Court. He inform'd that while the Piis and Hibernians, were ready to come to the decision of a Battel, the latter had received a considerable reinforcement of men: and that the King of the Piis despairing of the Victory, had generously thrown himself into the midst of his Enemies, where after he had perform'd many brave Actions, and received three or four honourable wounds, he was in the end slain. "His Army, said the Stranger pursuing his relation) was quite cut to pieces or put to flight: and that the Piis broken with those two losses, believing also that they could never repair that of their King among the rest, were resolv'd to put themselves under the protection, of the most valiant Prince in the world. 'Tis You, Sir, said he, upon whom they have pitch'd, to whom they are sending six Embassadors, to offer you the Scepter which is wholly at your disposal: assuring themselves, that you will be no less their delight, than the Terrour of their Enemies.

Whatever pleasing surpris'd these words might give to Constantine, the soul of that Prince continued in its wonted constancy, and by an admirable moderation he shew'd himself to be above the thoughts of a Crown. But though his soul had been less elevated, my Master had not been a jot the more satisfied, in the expectation of that profer: for the trouble that he had to think, that he should be obliged to take a journey, quite contrary to that which the Princess had already taken; was as great as the joy which the most ambitious heart, could be sensible of upon the same occasion. However the Prince did not outwardly shew any sign of melancholy, but received the weighty intelligence which they brought him, with a singular acknowledgment, and treated the Piis with all the civility which he could have expected, from a Prince more in love with greatness, than with a fair Lady. However, when the Piis Embassadors arriv'd, he request'd them to make choice of Gratian, under whom he promis'd to assist them against the Hibernians, and that before he left their Countries, he would establish Lieutenants in their Provinces, who being accustomed to their manners; should govern them according to their own Laws. But these Arguments nothing avail'd, the Piis answer'd that they would have a King, that could defend them against many Nations, who had leagu'd themselves together to their destruction: and that Gratian was so far from being able to perform so great an enterprise, that he had much ado to preserve his own Authority at home. "In short, Sir, said they pursuing their instructions, we require a vigorous Active King, whose name is beloved and known in our Country, to the end our soldiers and people may obey his orders, with more confidence and cheerfulness. It is Constantine whom we seek to, who may reside in his new Territories, while Aldroec and Gratian preserve him both his Britains, and when heaven shall call him to a succession more considerable, than that which we offer him, he may leave behind some Prince of his own illustrious blood, or some other Britain-Gaul to preserve these laws, which

“ which he shall make among us. You are necessarily to undertake this charge, and how “ puissant a Monarch soever you are one day to be, will you refuse a Crown which we come “ to add to that of Britain and Armorica, or is it an offence that we desire you to reign du“ ring the lives of Aldroec and Gratian? Besides that we are not willing that one Piſt should “ advance himself above another; for the jealousy of Families pretending to the Sovereign“ ty may prove our ruine; especially having always had a greater veneration for the virtues

These reasons were so undeniable, and what the Piſts offered him so considerable, that my Master was forc'd to yield, and to accept of a present that augmented his disquiet. However, being a person that did every thing with a good grace, he receiv'd the submissions and homage of the Embassadors in the name of their Estates assembled, after such a manner that they were entirely charm'd therewith, and confirm'd in the good opinion which they had before, that the Piſts could not have made an election more pleasing, nor more profitable. Nevertheless, he was no sooner retired into his Chamber, but he abandon'd himself wholly to his grief: What! said he, must I take a march quite opposite to the way that carries me into Gallia? And must I absent my self from my forsaken Princess? Must I for so long a time be depriv'd of the sight of a Star, whose lustre is the cause of all my joy, to thrust my self into a cold and cloudy Country where the Sun seems to shew his Beams unwillingly? Ah, fortune, that thou shouldst be so cruel to thy self, that thou shouldst so betray thy ignorance! Reserve thy favours for thy slaves, keep thy presents for those that adore thy power. They move me not at all, for how bright soever they seem to glitter, they cannot outshine the eyes of my fair Princess: thinkest thou to dazzle me with the gift of a Crown? Alas, I prefer Octavia's chains before the Scepter which thou offerest me: I had rather receive the commands of my Princess, than give commands in a victorious Army, or in a flourishing Kingdom: for the enamour'd Constantine sits with more honour at the feet of the Divine Octavia, than if he should give Laws to all the world upon the most glittering Throne that ever was erected.

He had continued longer in that tedious irresolution, had not the consideration of the Princess, that caus'd all this trouble, qualified him at length, by letting him see, that to refuse a Scepter, was but to snatch it out of her fair hands. He determin'd therefore, and ordering me to rendezvouz the Army, he took no farther care of any thing but the defence of those people that had put themselves under his obedience. Several of the most considerable Citizens of Troynovant, resolv'd to accompany a valiant Prince that was one day to be their King, and under whom they one day hop'd to purchase honour. As for my self I departed from our Camp with above six thousand chosen Horse, and being inform'd that the King of Armorica was sending us more Forces, I left the rest of the Army with the Lieutenant General, with orders to stay till the succours came, to watch Maximus's motion, and to oppose himself to whatever assaults he should make either upon Armorica or Britain. I was no sooner joyn'd with my Master in a Town where he appointed me to meet him, but we drew toward the Wall, which, as I said before, Pertinax had rais'd to divide the Britains from the Piſts, but which both Nations had then demolished, as if they had not been willing it should separate a Dominion which Constantine was coming to unite. But, Madam, though I might here describe many famous Battels, and many strange events, I shall not trouble you with the particulars of a tedious war, more than to tell you the success. You are only then to understand, that the Piſts receiv'd my Master as their Tutelar Angel, looking upon him as the support of their tottering Estate, insomuch that their force and courage return'd at the sight of that valiant Prince.

But while the vigilant Constantine labours to settle all things, and that by his care and liberality he brings all things to the conclusion to which you find them fairly drawing, it behoves us to return to Troynovant, that you may understand the inside of Geronces. You will easily believe, Madam, that he had oblig'd Loecrinia to retire for some time into the Country, on purpose that he might hinder her from the sight of Constantine, and gain the affection of the people. But you shall see, that that Britain, more slye and cunning than the fire of his temper promised, carries his contrivances much farther. To oblige my Master to return into Gallia, he advises Gratian to send Octavia thither, and at the same time advertises Maximus how he might seize her, and carry her away from both. Afterwards when he saw that Constantine's power increas'd, and understood that Maximus had happily receiv'd his advice, he writes to the Roman, and at the same time dispatches Letters to Stilicon and Honorius, he advertises the Emperour and his Favourite, that the Piſts had chosen Constantine King; he represented to him that that Prince was valiant, fortunate, and that therefore before he came to inherit two puissant Kingdoms more, as it was his right to do
